THE day on which this number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is published is to thousands of Christian people on both sides of the Atlantic a red-letter day in the calendar. Though they may not observe "Saints' Days," and date the letters which they may write on that day January 7th, and not Saint Somebody's day, they do not forget that it was on that day, now fifty-four years ago, that the most popular American preacher of this generation first saw the light. How many in this and other lands have cause to thank God for sending Dr. Talmage into the world will never be known until the day when the records of this world are closed and the great account rendered. Our own correspondence, which must show only an infinitesimal part of the preacher's usefulness, contains testimonies truly marvellous of the good God who has enabled him to do. From all our States, from Canada, from Sweden, Africa, New Zealand, China, India, and other countries to which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, week by week, carries his sermons, letters come bearing witness that through his message God has been pleased to bring light to dark souls.

In the backwoods, where there is no preaching, godly men gather their families and helpers around them on the Lord's day, and read the latest sermon by Dr. Talmage, and it is not long since an interesting letter from a mining district reported that, though the men could not be induced to attend a place of worship, they would come together and listen while one of their number read Talmage's sermon. Thus the preacher's audience is multiplied indefinitely, and he speaks every week to millions of attentive hearers. Nor is this audience confined to the English-speaking peoples. Every week the sermon published is translated into French, German, Italian, Swedish, and Russian, and sent on its beneficent errand.

The value of Dr. Talmage's work is not confined to the religious world. It is a salutary social influence. Not long since, in a quarter very unlikely to yield a word of praise to a Christian minister, the editor of this journal heard a tribute offered to Dr. Talmage. "I tell you," said a worldly, irreligious man, who was remarking on certain captious criticisms at the time being industriously circulated by an envious foe of Dr. Talmage—"I tell you, that whatever they may say of Talmage, he is a power of the best kind in this country. I have watched him, and though I do not believe in his doctrines, I admire the man. He pays no attention to these snarling curs at his heels, hardly notices them, but goes right on with his work. It is grand, the way he marches along. And I have noticed this, that in every great crisis, when the opinion of the public is suspended, or when it is tending the wrong way on national affairs or commercial or social subjects—at the critical moment Talmage speaks out, and says the right word. The people listen, too. He don't dictate, but he reminds them of the great principles, and shows how the case in hand is affected by the principles. He is a power, and I tell you he is doing more than anybody is aware of in guiding this nation."

Much more might be said of the same tenor without giving an adequate idea of the extent of Dr. Talmage's influence, but it is unnecessary. Our readers, wherever they may be placed, have opportunity of seeing it for themselves. They will, however, take pleasure in seeing Dr. Talmage's portrait on the first page of the ninth volume of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and joining with us in tendering to the great preacher the congratulations and good wishes appropriate to the day.

BIRTH AND EARLY LIFE.

Bound Brook, N. J., has the honor of being the birthplace of the eminent divine. In a Christian home in that town he was born, January 7th, 1832, and he is therefore now fifty-four years old. He was the youngest of twelve children, and it is easy to see, from many incidental references in his sermons, that the duty of providing for, training, and educating so large a family taxed the energies of the godly father and mother to the utmost. Their distinguished son, in the course of his sermons, often refers in words of heartfelt love and veneration to their self-sacrificing piety. Of whose influence over him was of the best kind, he often speaks in terms of filial reverence. In one of his sermons he said, with that characteristic frankness which leads him to take every one into his confidence and regard every hearer as a personal friend: "My father started in life belonging to the aristocracy of hard knuckles, but had this high honor that no one could despise—he was the son of a father who loved God and kept His commandments. What is the House of Hapsburg or Stuart compared with the honor of being a son of the Lord God Almighty? Two eyes, two hands, and two feet were the capital my father started with. For fifteen years an invalid, he had a fearful struggle to support his large family. Nothing but faith in God upheld him."

"His recital of help afforded and deliverances wrought was more like a romance than a reality. He walked through many a desert, but every morning had his manna, and every night its pillar of fire, and every hard rock a rod that could shatter it into crystal fountains at his feet. More than once he came to his last dollar; but right behind that last dollar he found Him who owns the cattle on a thousand hills, and out of the palm of whose hand all the fowls of heaven peck their food, and who hath given to each one of His disciples a warrant deed for the whole universe in the words, 'All are yours.'"

"In the neighborhood where he lived for years he held a devotional meeting. Oftentimes the only praying man present, before a handful of attendants, he would give out the hymn, read the lines, conduct the music, and pray. Then read the Scriptures, and pray again. Then lead forth in the Doxology with an enthusiasm as if there were a thousand people present, and all the church members had been doing their duty. He went forth visiting the sick, burying the dead, collecting alms for the poor, inviting the ministers of religion to his household, in which there was, as in the house of Shunem, a little room over the wall, with bed and candlestick for any passing Elisha. He never shuddered at the sight of a subscription paper, and not a single great cause of benevolence has risen within the last half century which he did not bless with his beneficence."

"There were only two years' difference between the death of my father and mother," he says in another discourse. "After my mother's decease my father used to go around as though looking for something, and he would often get up from one room, without any seeming reason, and go on to another room, and then he would take his cane and start out, and some one would say, 'Father, where are you going?' and he would answer, 'I don't know exactly where I'm going.' Always looking for something. Though he was a tender-hearted man, I never saw him cry but once, and that was at the burial of my mother. After being sixty years together it was hard to part." Of

he speaks in terms of the most touching tenderness. Speaking of the heaven unto which she had ascended, and comparing it to a palace, he says: "I have a mother in the palace window waiting for me. I was the child of her old age, and I remember how her voice used to tremble in evening prayer, with what kindness she started me out in life, and how she watched me and cared for me all the way through; and then, giving each of us a blessing, she went away to the palace window, where she is waiting for good news from us. I suppose it would be no harm for me to say in public what is my secret ambition, and that is, when my work on earth is done, to go up and meet her, saying, 'Here I am, mother, and all the spoils of my earthly pastorate. I have come to spend eternity with you. Here are the spoils of the Saviour's conquest.' Ah! methinks that would pay her for the pangs of the birth-hour, and for the watchings when I was sick, and for her anxieties about my eternal welfare."

THE MINISTRY.

T. DeWitt's earliest preference was for the law, for which he studied a year after graduating with honors from the University of the City of New York. But the prayers of his parents that he might be a preacher of the Gospel, and the drawings of grace toward the pulpit, could not be overcome, so in 1853 he entered the Theological Seminary at New Brunswick, and after the usual course became a licentiate. His first charge was at Belleville, N. J., where, after laboring for about three years, with remarkable success and with much benefit to himself in experience and training, he removed to Syracuse, N. Y. Even in these early days of ministerial effort there was not wanting decided evidences that a high career of usefulness was before him as a preacher. Large congregations assembled to hear him, and he preached with a fervor and power that deeply stirred the hearts of the people. Three years were spent in earnest work at Syracuse before he would listen to the calls, every month becoming more importunate, that he would go to a larger sphere of labor. At length he accepted the invitation of the Second Reformed Church of and removed there in 1862. During the seven years that followed his popularity grew with astonishing rapidity, and the young Philadelphia preacher became known throughout the country.

While here he was well known as an eloquent lecturer upon a variety of subjects, being always ready to give sound practical counsel on secular topics, especially to young men, in whom he has always taken a deep interest, and who have accepted him as a wise mentor. These lectures, however, were always secondary to his labors as a pastor. His vivid style, his affluence of illustration and of anecdote, his outspoken honesty in applying the truth to the consciences of rich and poor, gave him a position in Philadelphia, where he continued for seven years, second to none. His church was always crowded to the very doors, and the divine blessing largely rested upon his faithful proclamation of the truth as it is in Jesus.

CALL TO BROOKLYN.

In 1869 Dr. Talmage unexpectedly received calls from three churches, each anxious to secure him as their minister—one from Chicago, a second from San Francisco, and a third from Brooklyn, N. Y. To be invited to leave his enviable position in Philadelphia by a mere handful of people at the Tabernacle at Brooklyn, to leave a certainty for an uncertainty, would have been a question which some would in an hour have answered in the negative. Not so, however, in the case before us. The Philadelphia pastor had to answer the old query, "Can these dry bones live?" Can a church and congregation so lamentably reduced be revived? There was a large, empty building, and around it there was a large population; so, after consideration and prayer, he decided to go to Brooklyn. As events have proved, the decision was a wise one. He went to Brooklyn in March, 1869, and began his work in a building which, although large, soon became too small for the crowd of people flocking from all parts to hear him. He was in the prime of life, of splendid elocutionary powers, and deeply, it sometimes seemed even terribly, in earnest.

In a short time he became so popular that every Sunday the church would be crowded in every part where even standing-room could be found half an hour before service, and numbers would be seen around the doors and in the street in the hope of gaining admission. His success was undoubted, and it was not long before his friends had resolved to erect a large tabernacle capable of seating at least three thousand persons.

This building was begun in 1870, and while it was in course of erection Dr. Talmage visited Europe.

THE NEW TABERNACLE FINISHED.

He preached the opening sermon himself, from the text, "Compel them to come in." There seemed, however, afterward an inaptitude in the text, so far as the Tabernacle was concerned, for the people came in such numbers that they were compelled to stay out, and in 1872 additional accommodation had to be provided for about five hundred persons. A disaster was in store for the thriving church, however, of which no one ever dreamed.

THE TABERNACLE BURNED.

On the morning of December 22d, 1872, the Tabernacle was discovered to be in flames. On Dr. Talmage arriving as usual for the service, he found his people outside, watching the burning of their noble place of worship. Regrets, however natural, were useless, and as the pastor and his friends stood looking at the conflagration, he is said to have comforted them with these words: "Well, the building never was large enough! Now the people throughout the country will help us to build a more roomy structure." Prompt local sympathy was immediately extended, and several places of worship were offered to the pastor and his flock.

THE NEW TABERNACLE.

Plans were at once made for erecting the largest Protestant Church in America, Gothic in style, cathedral-like above, amphitheatre-like below—a massive structure of brick and stone, capable of seating five thousand persons, and with standing-room for one thousand more. This edifice was dedicated January 22d, 1874. His audiences in this immense building correspond every Sabbath with its capacity, while hundreds are sometimes outside for whom there is not even standing-room within. Dr. Talmage himself often gains admission only by aid of the police. Before this vast throng he stands upon a platform without a desk, and without notes. Both his matter and manner are evidently his own, and both are made to produce wonderful effects upon his hearers. Sometimes the hush of death seems to pervade the house, while tears are visible upon every cheek, and anon the brightness of hope and the sparkle of joy light up every eye. As none know better than our readers, the great themes of the Gospel applied to the phases of every-day life form the staple of his preaching. These themes are always treated with freshness, beauty, and power, with wondrous versatility of talent, and with illustrative resources none but a defamer would caricature. He never ceases to cultivate the awakening and revival spirit, and hence the additions to the membership of his church are large and frequent. The original "nineteen" who signed his call have become three thousand two hundred and seventy-one—an increase which certainly proves how God is using him for His glory and the good of the world; but even that large number, as we have before said, does not more than represent the throng who owe to the blessing of God on Dr. Talmage's labors their deliverance from the power of Satan. The services throughout are impressive, solemn, and enlivening to a degree rarely witnessed elsewhere, and no unbiassed hearer, we think, can depart from the Tabernacle without feeling that Dr. Talmage has an evangelistic mission of his own, and that he is thoroughly alive to his responsibility.

THE TABERNACLE SERVICE.

Our readers who know Dr. Talmage, only through these pages will be interested in a peep into the Tabernacle itself. They shall do so through the vivid picture of an able writer for the press, whose report was printed last month in the New York Metropolitan. That writer, after describing the crowded house and the hearty singing, said of his sermon: "Dr. Talmage starts out with a narration of incidents told in Scripture in connection with the text. His voice is conversational in tone—he talks just as he would if at a fireside, describing scenery visited in foreign travel. With his hands folded behind his back, he leisurely promenades his long platform, about which there is neither railing nor the usual pulpit frontage to intercept a full view from the audience. He has neither manuscript nor note of any kind. Walking up and down, facing now one, now another section of the house, his unaffected narrative proceeds. He passes from pleasing narrative into entertaining history. He throws upon an imaginary wall before us a map of ancient Jerusalem and the country surrounding, and, while pointing to the entertaining features of it, also discloses with marvellous clearness the characters of the personages involved in his theme. So exhaustive in research, so vivid in delineation are his views of the storied country and people, that Professor Analyzer concludes it is as a recounter of history that Dr. Talmage commands and delights his great audiences. . . . But before his analysis has been recorded, a curtain falls over dazzling hall, resplendent decorations, and art treasures, and in their stead is opened up a view of a mountain and a cross upon it, with the Son of God being offered a sacrifice for the sins of the world. The charming converser, historian, and artist has magically lured his audience on, enchained its fancy, spell-bound its attention, only to fit it for the transcendent glories of the divine scene he here presents. Now his thoughts glow, his words burn, and his gestures emphasize the ardor of his soul in the cause of salvation. On and on, from height to height of divine eulogy he leads his listeners, while they tearfully follow. Once more Professor Analyzer changes conclusions, and his final one is that it is as a preacher of the Gospel of Christ that the Rev. T. De Witt Talmage has attained the greatest renown of any Christian minister of the world of to-day."

on the first page represents a scene that will always be a memorable one with Dr. Talmage and all who witnessed it. It occurred on Sunday, August 16th, 1885, in the heart of the city of London, England. Dr. Talmage, during his trip to Europe, had promised to preach in the City Road Chapel, the venerable building known as the Cathedral of Methodism, for it was in that building that John Wesley proclaimed the Gospel in tones that thrilled the whole country, and aroused a force that has been ever since growing and deepening. The chapel holds, at the utmost, sixteen hundred people; but on that Sunday three times that number tried to get into it. When it was packed to the utmost, the open windows were besieged by hearers anxious, at least, to listen, and the great courtyard in front was occupied to its last available inch. At the conclusion of the service Dr. Talmage and his congregation were prisoners. There was no getting through such a crowd as the one that confronted them. With a good-humored recognition of the desire of the people, Dr. Talmage accepted the situation, and from the steps of the historic edifice he preached a second sermon to the waiting assemblage.

Dr. Talmage has always had a regard for that church in London. He has spoken repeatedly of the quickening stimulus he receives from its surroundings. To be in the very pulpit in which John Wesley stood is much, but that is not all. In the burial-ground in the rear of the building the ashes of the great preacher lie awaiting the resurrection, and withing sight is the house in which he lived, and the monument of his sainted mother (see page 12), and associations of him and his work cluster around. To all these a man so sensitive as Dr. Talmage is very susceptible.

We have already fully described in our issue of September 24th, 1885, the ovation Dr. Talmage received on his return from his European trip. The vast assembly, the intense enthusiasm, and the ardent affection manifested by his church and congregation made an ineffaceable impression on every one present. As we think of it on this day, we cannot but realize how large a number of people in Brooklyn, where the Doctor is best known, and how much larger a number in other lands, who know him only through his work, will cordially and heartily join with us in wishing him "many happy returns of the day."

GOSPEL WORK ON THE CONGO.

THE interest the public of America takes in the vast work being accomplished in the great Congo Free State by our distinguished countryman, Mr. H. M. Stanley, is fully shared by the Christian; but he is also concerned for the spiritual welfare of the land now coming under civilization. Mr. Stanley has given a warm welcome to the missionaries, and places a high estimate on their labors as a means of civilization. One of them, Rev. H. E. Crudgington, who has left his field of labor for a brief period to arouse Christian interest in the mission, gives a cheering report of its progress. He said in a recent address that the Baptist Missionary Society began the work in 1879, and he had the honor to be one of the first to go out. San Salvador was at one time a fine flourishing city, but nothing remained of Christian truth when they went there. The people had a few crucifixes, but no intelligent idea of God or of Christ as a Saviour. They went to the other side of the river, to Stanley Pool. The river Congo was navigable for small steamers for one hundred and fifteen miles from the sea; then there were cataracts and rapids for two hundred and fifty miles; above which there was a clear navigable course of more than one thousand miles. After a short obstruction there was another thousand of navigable water, with large rivers branching off in all directions, giving more than five thousand miles of navigable streams, with forty millions of people, none of whom had any idea of God.

They tried to put a steamer on the upper portions of the river, to carry the Gospel into the interior. There were many difficulties. Though slaves were not now captured wholesale, he could tell of things which might well make them cry to God for vengeance upon the slave-traders. At first he constantly heard the screams of the poor women slaves who were thrashed for trifling offences. He had known slaves to be chained in gangs, or floated down the river in barrels as targets to be shot at. A man crucified a slave for a trivial offence. On expostulating with the man, he said, "Why did you missionaries come? We did not send for you; we did not want you."

That was the dark side of the picture. He was happy to say that as the result of their labors he had seen the horrible traffic in human life stopped to a large extent. Their work on the Congo was among the boys. They believed in removing the boys from vice and superstition, and so mould their characters that they might grow up to be useful men, serving God, and ready to tell their people what God had done for them. He had arranged for some noble women to go out and devote themselves to this work. Though his life had been in danger, God had preserved him, and now the people welcomed them, saying, "Get out of the road! The white man is coming! Bring him a mat and some water." The people had an idea of God, but it conveyed no conception of a loving Father. Their notion of heaven was having plenty to eat, and of a day of rest as a time for dancing. They thought that death was the end of them. It was a great thing to have gained their confidence in so short a time. They only went six years ago, and the people were then dreadfully afraid of the white man.

LONG LIFE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached Last Sunday Morning, Jan. 3, 1886.

"That thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee"—Ex. 20 : 12.

Religion an Aid to Vitality—A Chariot not a Hearse—Good for the Human Organism—Promotes Longevity—I. By Making the Care of Health a Duty—Why the Body should be Respected—God's Calligraphy—II. By Prohibiting Dissipation—Religion Abandoned before Morality—III. By Eliminating Worry—About Business—A Fast Friend—About Reputation—IV. By Removing Dread of Death—Three Experiments—The Certain Cure—A Rainbow—Eternal Longevity.

[BEFORE commencing his sermon, Dr. Talmage gave notice that he would shortly begin a series of Sabbath morning discourses on the Marriage Ring, treating from a religious standpoint the following topics: The Choice of Husband and Wife; Clandestine Marriages and Escapades; Duties of Husbands to Wives; Duties of Wives to Husbands; The Wrong Ways of Women; Costume and Morals; Competent Housewifery; Sensible Young Womanhood; Women Who Will Pass Life Single; Influence of Sisters over Brothers; The Modern Novel and Woman; Boarding-Houses and Hotel Life, and the Treatment of Man-Servant and Maid-Servant.]

January 3d, 1886! The old almanacs and the old memorandums flung aside. Everything to remind us of the fact that another volume in the history of time has begun, and every thoughtful man and woman at such time discusses the length or the shortness of human life.

Faithful discharge of duty is in my text set forth as having much to do with the length of our earthly stay. Through the mistake of its friends religion has been chiefly associated with sick-beds and graveyards. This whole subject to many people is odorous with chlorine and carbolic acid. There are people who cannot pronounce the word "religion" without hearing in it the clipping chisel of the tombstone cutter. It is high time that this thing were changed, and that religion instead of being represented as a hearse to carry out the dead, should be represented as a chariot in which the living are to triumph. Religion so far from subtracting from one's vitality is a glorious addition. It is sanative, curative, hygienic. It is good for the eyes, good for the ears, good for the spleen, good for the digestion, good for the nerves, good for the muscles. When David in the Psalms prays that religion may be dominant, he does not speak of it as a mild sickness, or an emaciation, or an attack of moral and spiritual cramp; he speaks of it as "the saving health of all nations;" while God pronounces long life to the pious, saying: "With long life will I satisfy thee."

LIFE ABBREVIATED.

The fact is that men and women die too soon. It is high time that religion joined the hand of medical science in attempting to improve human longevity. Adam lived nine hundred and thirty years. Methusaleh lived nine hundred and sixty-nine years. As late in the history of the world as Vespasian, there were at one time in his empire forty-five people one hundred and thirty-five years old. So far down as the sixteenth century Peter Zartan died at one hundred and eighty-five years of age. I do not say that religion will ever take the race back to antediluvian longevity, but I do say the length of human life will be greatly improved. It is said in Isa. 65 : 20: "The child shall die a hundred years old." Now, if, according to the Scriptures, the child is to be a hundred years old, may not the men and women reach to three hundred, and four hundred, and five hundred? The fact is that we are mere dwarfs and skeletons compared with some of the generations that are to come.

Take the African race. They have been under bondage for centuries. Give them a chance and they develop a Frederick Douglass, or a Toussaint l'Ouverture. And if the white race shall be brought out from under the serfdom of sin, what shall be the body? What shall be the soul? Religion has only just touched our world. Give it full power for a few centuries, and who can tell what will be the strength of man, and the beauty of woman, and the long life of all?

RESPECT THE BODY.

I. My design is to show you that practical religion is the friend of long life, and I prove it first from the fact that it makes the care of our physical health a positive Christian duty. Whether we shall keep early or late hours, whether we shall take food digestible or indigestible, whether there shall be thorough or incomplete mastication are questions very often deferred to the realm of whimsicality; but the Christian man lifts this whole problem of health into the accountable and the divine. He says: "God has given me this body, and He has called it the temple of the Holy Ghost, and to deface its altars, or mar its walls, or crumble its pillars, is a God-defying sacrifice."

He sees God's calligraphy in every page, anatomical and physiological. He says: "God has given me a wonderful body for noble purposes." That arm with thirty-two curious bones, wielded by forty-six curious muscles, and all under the brain telegraphy; three hundred and fifty pounds of blood rushing through the heart every hour; the heart in twenty-four hours beating one hundred thousand times, during the twenty-four hours overcoming resistance amounting to two hundred and twenty-four million pounds' weight; during the same time the lungs taking in fifty-seven hogsheads of air; and all this mechanism not more mighty than delicate, and easily disturbed and demolished.

The Christian man says to himself: "If I hurt my nerves, if I hurt my brain, if I hurt any of my physical faculties, I insult God and call for dire retribution." Why did God tell the Levites not to offer to Him in sacrifice animals imperfect or diseased? He meant to tell us in all the ages that we are to offer to God our very best physical condition; and a man who through irregular or gluttonous eating, ruins his health, is not offering to God such a sacrifice. Why did Paul write for his cloak at Troas? Why should such a great man as Paul be anxious about a thing so insignificant as an overcoat? It was because he knew that with pneumonia and rheumatism he would not be worth half as much to God and the Church, as with respiration easy and foot free.

PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY.

An intelligent Christian man would consider it an absurdity to kneel down at night and pray, and ask God's protection, while at the same time he kept the windows of his bedroom tight shut against fresh air. He would just as soon think of going out on the bridge between New York and Brooklyn, leaping off, and then praying to God to keep him from getting hurt. Just as long as you defer this whole subject of physical health to the realm of whimsicality, or to the pastry-cook, or to the butcher, or to the baker, or to the apothecary, or to the clothier, you are not acting like a Christian. The care of all your physical forces—nervous, muscular, bone, brain, cellular tissue—for all you must be brought to judgment.

Smoking your nervous system into fidgets, burning out the coating of your stomach with wine logwooded and strychnined; walking with thin shoes to make your feet look delicate; pinched at the waist until you are nigh cut in two, and neither part worth anything; groaning about sick headache and palpitations of the heart which you think come from God, when they come from your own folly! What right has any man or any woman to deface the temple of the Holy Ghost?

THE WONDERFUL BODY.

What is the ear? Why, it is the whispering gallery of the human soul. What is the eye? It is the observatory God constructed, its telescope sweeping the heavens. What is the hand? An instrument so wonderful that when the Earl of Bridgewater bequeathed in his will $40,000 for treatises to be written on the wisdom, power, and goodness of God, Sir Charles Bell, the great English anatomist and surgeon, found his greatest illustration in the construction of the human hand, devoting his whole book to that subject. So wonderful are these bodies that God names His own attributes after the different parts. His omniscience—it is God's eye. His omnipresence—it is God's ear. His omnipotence—it is God's arm. The upholstery of the midnight heavens—it is the work of God's fingers. His life-giving power—it is the breath of the Almighty. His dominion—the government shall be upon His shoulder. A body so divinely honored and so divinely constructed, let us be careful not to abuse it.

When it becomes a Christian duty to take care of our health, is not the whole tendency toward long life? If I toss my watch about recklessly, and drop it on the pavement, and wind it up any time of day or night I happen to think of it, and often let it run down, while you are careful with your watch, and never abuse it, and wind it up at just the same hour every night, and put it in a place where it will not suffer from the violent changes of atmosphere, which watch will last the longer? Common sense answers. Now, the human body is God's watch. You see the hands of the watch, you see the face of the watch; but the beating of the heart is the ticking of the watch. Oh, be careful and do not let it run down!

AN ENEMY OF LIFE'S FOES.

II. Again, I remark that practical religion is a friend of long life in the fact that it is a protest against all the dissipations which injure and destroy the health. Bad men and women live a very short life. Their sins kill them. I know hundreds of good old men, but I do not know a half dozen bad old men. Why? They do not get old. Lord Byron died at Missolonghi, at thirty-six years of age, himself his own Mazeppa, his unbridled passions the horse that dashed with him into the desert. Edgar A. Poe died at Baltimore, at thirty-eight years of age. The black raven that alighted on the bust above his chamber-door was delirium tremens:

"Only this and nothing more."

Napoleon Bonaparte lived only just beyond mid-life, then died at St. Helena, and one of his doctors said that his disease was induced by excessive snuffing. The hero of Austerlitz, the man who by one step of his foot in the centre of Europe shook the earth, killed by a snuff-box! Oh, how many people we have known who have not lived out half their days because of their dissipations and indulgences! Now, practical religion is a protest against all dissipation of any kind.

"But," you say, "professors of religion have fallen; professors of religion have got drunk, professors of religion have misappropriated trust funds, professors of religion have absconded." Yes, but they threw away their religion before they did their morality. If a man on a White Star Line steamer bound for Liverpool, in mid-Atlantic, jumps overboard and is drowned, is that anything against the White Star Line's capacity to take the man across the ocean? And if a man jumps over the gunwale of his religion and goes down never to rise, is that any reason for your believing that religion has no capacity to take the man clear through? In the one case, if he had kept to the steamer his body would have been saved; in the other case, if he had kept to his religion his morals would have been saved. There are aged people in this house to-day who would have been dead twenty-five years ago but for the defences and

THE EQUIPOISE OF RELIGION.

You have no more natural resistance than hundreds of people who lie in the cemeteries to-day, slain by their own vices. The doctors made their case as kind and pleasant as they could, and it was called congestion of the brain or something else, but the snakes and the blue flies that seemed to crawl over the pillow in the sight of the delirious patient showed what was the matter with him. You, the aged Christian man, walked along by that unhappy one until you came to the golden pillar of a Christian life. You went to the right; he went to the left. That is all the difference between you. Oh, if this religion is a protest against all forms of dissipation, then it is an illustrious friend of long life!

ELIMINATES WORRY.

III. Again, religion is a friend of long life in the fact that it takes the worry out of our temporalities. It is not work that kills men; it is worry. When a man becomes a genuine Christian he makes over to God not only his affections, but his family, his business, his reputation, his body, his mind, his soul—everything. Industrious he will be, but never worrying, because God is managing his affairs. How can he worry about business when, in answer to his prayers, God tells him when to buy and when to sell, and if he gain that is best, and if he lose that is best?

Suppose you had a supernatural neighbor who came in and said: "Sir, I want you to call on me in every exigency. I am your fast friend; I could fall back on twenty million dollars; I can foresee a panic ten years; I hold the controlling stock in thirty of the best monetary institutions of New York; whenever you are in any trouble call on me and I will help you; you can have my money, and you can have my influence; there is my hand in pledge for it." How much would you

WORRY ABOUT BUSINESS?

Why, you would say: "I'll do the best I can, and then I'll depend upon my friend's generosity for the rest." Now, more than that is promised to every Christian business man. God says to him: "I own New York and London and St. Petersburg, and Pekin and Australia and California are mine; I can foresee a panic a million years; I have all the resources of the universe, and I am your fast friend; when you get in business trouble or any other trouble, call on me and I will hear, and I will help; here is my hand in pledge of omnipotent deliverance." How much should that man worry? Not much. What lion will dare to put his paw on that Daniel? If you could take a thermometer and thrust it into Shadrach's furnace, it would never go up over seventy-five degrees. Is there not rest in this? Is there not an eternal vacation in this?

"Oh," you say, "here is a man who asked God for a blessing upon a certain enterprise, and he lost five thousand dollars in it. Explain that." I will. Yonder is a factory, and one wheel is going north, and the other wheel is going south, and one wheel plays laterally, and the other plays vertically. I go to the manufacturer and I say: "Oh, manufacturer, your machinery is a contradiction. Why do you not make all the wheels go one way?" "Well," he says, "I made them to go in opposite directions on purpose, and they produce the right result. You go down-stairs and examine the carpets we are turning out in this establishment, and you will see." I go down on the other floor and I see the carpets, and I am obliged to confess that, though the wheels in that factory go in opposite directions, they turn out a beautiful result; and while I am standing there looking at the exquisite fabric, an old Scripture passage comes into my mind: "All things work together for good to them who love God." Is there not rest in that? Is there not tonic in that? Is there not longevity in that?

Suppose a man is all the time worried

ABOUT HIS REPUTATION?

One man says he lies, another says he is stupid, another says he is dishonest, and half a dozen printing establishments attack him, and he is in a great state of excitement and worry and fume, and cannot sleep; but religion comes to him and says: "Man, God is on your side; He will take care of your reputation. If God be for you, who can be against you?" How much should that man worry about his reputation?

Not much. If that broker who a few years ago in Wall Street, after he had lost money, sat down and wrote a farewell letter to his wife before he blew his brains out—if, instead of taking out of his pocket a pistol, he had taken out a well-read New Testament, there would have been one less suicide. Oh, nervous and feverish people of the world, try this Almighty sedative; you will live twenty-five years longer under its soothing power. It is not chloral that you want, or more time that you want; it is the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

REMOVES CORRODING DREAD.

IV. Again, practical religion is a friend of long life in the fact that it removes all corroding care about a future existence. Every man wants to know what is to become of him. If you get on board a rail-train, you want to know at what depot it is going to stop; if you get on board a ship, you want to know into what harbor it is going to run; and if you should tell me you have no interest in what is to be your future destiny, I would, in as polite a way as I know how, tell you I did not believe you. Before I had this matter settled with reference to my future existence, the question almost worried me into ruined health. The anxieties men have upon this subject, if put together, would make a martyrdom. This is a state of awful unhealthiness. There are people who fret themselves to death for fear of dying. I want this morning to take the strain off your nerves and the depression off your soul, and I make two or THREE EXPERIMENTS.

Experiment the first: When you go out of the world it does not make any difference whether you have been good or bad, or whether you believed truth or error, you will go straight to glory. "Impossible," you say; "my common-sense, as well as my religion, teaches that the bad and the good cannot live together forever. You give me no comfort in that experiment."

Experiment the second: When you leave this world you will go into an intermediate state, where you can get converted and prepared for heaven. "Impossible," you say; "as the tree falleth so it must lie, and I cannot postpone to an intermediate state that reformation which ought to have been effected in this state."

Experiment the third: There is no future world; when a man dies that is the last of him. Do not worry about what you are to do in another state of being; you will not do anything. "Impossible," you say; "there is something that tells me that death is not the appendix but the preface; there is something that tells me that on this side of the grave I only get started, and that I shall go on forever. My power to think says, 'Forever'; my affections say, 'Forever'; my capacity to enjoy or suffer says, 'Forever.'"

THE CERTAIN CURE.

Well, you defeat me in my three experiments. I have only one more to make, and if you defeat me in that I am exhausted. A Mighty One on a knoll back of Jerusalem one day, the skies filled with forked lightnings and the earth filled with volcanic disturbances, turned His pale and agonized face toward the heavens, and said: "I take the sins and sorrows of the ages into my own heart. I am the Expiation. Witness Earth and Heaven and Hell. I am the Expiation." And the hammer struck Him, and the spears punctured Him, and heaven thundered: "The wages of sin is death;" "The soul that sinneth it shall die;" "I will by no means clear the guilty."

Then there was silence for half an hour, and the lightnings were drawn back into the scabbard of the sky, and the earth ceased to quiver, and all the colors of the sky began to shift themselves into woven out of the falling tears of Jesus, and there was red as of the blood-shedding, and there was blue as of the bruising, and there was green as of the heavenly foliage, and there was orange as of the day dawn; and along the line of the blue

I saw the words: "I was bruised for their iniquities" and along the line of the red I saw the words: "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin;" and along the line of the green I saw the words: "The leaves of the tree of life for the healing of the nations;" and along the line of the orange I saw the words: "The day-spring from on high hath visited us." And then I saw the storm was over, and the rainbow rose higher and higher until it seemed retreating to another heaven, and planting one column of its colors on one side the eternal hill, and planting the other column of its colors on the other side the eternal hill, it rose upward and upward, and behold! there was a rainbow round about the throne. Accept that sacrifice and

QUIT WORRYING.

Take the tonic, the inspiration, the longevity of this truth. Religion is sunshine; that is healthy. Religion is fresh air and pure water; they are healthy. Religion is warmth; that is healthy. Ask all the doctors and they will tell you that a quiet conscience and pleasant anticipations are hygienic. I offer you perfect peace now and hereafter.

What do you want in the future world? Tell me and you shall have it. Orchards? There are the trees with twelve manner of fruits, yielding fruit every month. Water? Scenery? There is the River of Life from under the throne of God, clear as crystal, and the sea of glass mingled with fire. Do you want music? There is the Oratorio of the Creation, led on by Adam; and the Oratorio of the Red Sea, led on by Moses; and the Oratorio of the Messiah, led on by St. Paul, while the archangel with swinging baton controls the one hundred and forty-four thousand who make up the orchestra. Do you want reunion? There are your dead children waiting to kiss you, waiting to embrace you, waiting to twist garlands in your hair. You have been accustomed to open the door on this side the sepulchre; this morning I open the door on the other side the sepulchre. You have been accustomed to walk in the wet grass on the top of the grave; I show you the under side of the grave. The bottom has fallen out, and the long ropes with which the pall-bearers let down your dead let them clear through into heaven. Glory be to God for this robust, healthy religion! It will have a tendency to make you live long in this world, and in the world to come you will have eternal longevity.

THE SERVO-BULGARIAN WAR.

In a letter from Philippopolis, Bulgaria, dated November 27th, Pastor J. A. Tonjoroff writes to a Christian friend:

"This war with our brethren, the Servians, has put us under greatest distress. It was not expected; it was begun without any cause whatever, and it is with our own brethren. To be conquered would be woeful; to be the conquerors we cannot rejoice.

"All our Protestant communities have been praying and fasting, that the Lord may be gracious to us and to our country, and spare us the abominations of this terrible war. But after it began the Lord has strengthened our soldiers, and they have succeeded in expelling the enemy from our country. Several hundred Servian soldiers have been captured, and some of them brought here. Hundreds are killed and thousands wounded. As the Servian army in every battle is compelled to retreat, most of the wounded fall into our hands, to care and to provide for them. I am happy to say that the Bulgarians, so far, have behaved with the wounded and captured very humanely and kindly.

"Our Women's Benevolent Society have done, and are doing, all they can to buy materials, and to work and prepare some clothing for the wounded. Some have gone to the seat of war to help the wounded. Some are going by and by with more supplies. My wife intends going, but the children have not been very strong. If they are better she will soon start. Let all our friends pray for us in this our great affliction."

THE OLD SHOEMAKER'S TIDINGS.

It was a cold raw morning, and Charles Martyn shivered as he stepped into his father's carriage, in which he was to make his two-mile journey to the village station to catch the nine o'clock train, by which every morning he travelled to the city. The smart groom accompanied him, and would drive the carriage back when it had deposited "young Mr. Charles" at the station.

On the way they had to pass a cottage, in which lived an old shoemaker, an experienced Christian man of sincere piety, though of little education. As the carriage approached the cottage the old man could be seen sitting at the door, evidently on the look-out.

"Pull up, Tom," said Mr. Martyn, "old Harry Blackwell wants to speak to me, I think."

Tom pulled up, and the old shoemaker hobbled as fast as his rheumatism would let him to the side of the vehicle.

"How are you, Harry?" said Mr. Martyn, holding out a hand cordially to the old man, who had known him from his infancy, and thought him the best and smartest young man in the world.

"All right, thank you, Mr. Charles. I made bold to stop you because of something my daughter Mary told me last night. I thought mayhap you, being a lawyer, and knowing city ways, might do something for the poor creature."

"Poor creature! Harry, what do you mean? You don't call a fine handsome girl like Mary a poor creature, I hope."

"Oh, no, Mr. Charles, it is not Mary I mean. It's Miss Paulet, the lady's-maid at the Hall. Mary works there, you know. Last night she came to see her old father—she never neglects me—and she said that Miss Paulet was in great trouble, crying and sighing, as women do, you know, sir, and she's been like that a week or more; but no one seemed to take much notice of it, for she's a kind of nervous, excitable person. But yesterday afternoon she never said anything to anybody but Mary, but she just went right away, not even taking her boxes with her. And before she went she called Mary into her room and kissed her, and told her to be a good girl. And then she wished her good-by, for she said she should never see her again. And soon after she walked out, dressed in her regular clothes, and she did not come back. I'm afraid, sir, and so is Mary, that some harm will come to the poor creature. She's no doubt gone to the city, and perhaps you could hear of her, and advise her to go back."

"I'm glad you told me, Harry. I will see what can be done. Drive on, Tom, or we shall miss the train."

Mr. Martyn's start when Miss Paulet's name was mentioned did not escape the old shoemaker's observation, nor did he fail to notice the concern plainly written on his face as he learned the facts. "I hope Mr. Charles has had nothing to do with it," he muttered, as he limped back to his cottage. "I hope not, for both their sakes. But I'm afraid. I'll tell the Lord about it."

The old man was right. Mr. Charles had a great deal to do with it. During the long summer evenings, when he wandered by the river banks, fishing, he had made Miss Paulet's acquaintance. At first it was but slight, comprised in a nod and a friendly remark about the weather. But it grew, and before the winter set in it was quite an intimate friendship. That is, as Mr. Martyn regarded it; but he became convinced that Miss Paulet thought it much more than that, and one evening, some ten days before, he had thought it his duty to tell her clearly that they could never be more than friends, owing to the difference in their social position. He saw then that the mischief was done. Though she said little her lip quivered and tears rose to her eyes. He had not seen her since, and the old shoemaker's news alarmed him. He made it his first business that day to try to gain tidings of her, but failed. His mental distress was acute, for he could not acquit himself of the base sin of trifling with a woman's affections, and winning a love he never intended to gratify.

What he could not do, however, was done through the old shoemaker's prayers. Many a time that day he prayed for the poor wanderer, and committed her to the Lord. His prayers were heard. A few days later, in a little mission chapel, a pale, sad face was seen by the small company of Christians gathered together, and a low, trembling voice was heard giving thanks to God that when, heart-broken and rebellious, she had stood on the river's bank, intending suicide, He had mercifully interposed and sent one of His servants to point her to One who loved her with more than human love. To Him she was plighting her troth and consecrating all her future life.

THE JUDGMENTS OF THE SEVENTIETH WEEK.

By T. B. Baines.

Daniel's Prophecy of the Seventy Weeks—Unequally Divided—The Last Week Cut off—A Week of Judgments—I. On the Whole Hebrew Nation—Through Trouble to Nationalization—II. On Babylon—The Beast the Agent—III. On the Beast—The Associated Gentile Dominion—IV. On the Armies Besieging Jerusalem—The Millennial Judgments—The Last Outbreak of Wickedness.

THE prophecy of the seventy weeks communicated to Daniel by the Angel Gabriel (Dan. 9: 24-27) is divided into three parts, of seven weeks, of sixty-two weeks, and of one week. During the first part, of seven weeks, the city was rebuilt. The second part, of sixty-two weeks, comprehends the time from the completion of the city to the cutting off of the Messiah. The third part, of one week, which yet awaits its accomplishment, carries "the times of the Gentiles" to a close, "finishes the transgression" of the Jews, and brings in "everlasting righteousness," the desolator being destroyed, and the Messiah's kingdom established.

During the coming in of the Gentiles, the stream of prophetic time ceases to run. It stagnates, so to speak, after the sixty-ninth week, when Messiah was cut off, and will not again begin to flow till after the fulness of the Gentiles has come in, and God once more takes up the thread of His purposes concerning the earth.

During this last week of Daniel's seventy weeks still unfulfilled, there will commence the judgments which precede the "day of the Lord," or the establishment of Messiah's kingdom. These judgments may be broadly divided into four different classes.

ON THE HEBREW RACE.

I. The Jews and the rest of the Israelites will be restored, but only after fearful troubles, from which but a portion will escape. The Jews, who rejected the Christ, will receive the Antichrist, will enter into covenant with "the prince that shall come," the last phase of Gentile power, and will worship his image, "the abomination of desolation," set up in the holy place. The remnant of faithful ones who refuse to have part in these last scenes of wickedness and lawlessness will be persecuted with fearful persistency and malignity, many of them killed, the rest driven into exile. The time will be one of untold tribulation, so that, but for its shortness, no flesh could be saved.

Then the Lord Himself will appear in power and great glory, destroying with the sword out of His mouth the followers of Antichrist, easing Him of His adversaries and avenging Him of His enemies. The effect on the nation will be "like a refiner's fire, and like fullers' soap." Those who "abide the day of His coming," the purged remnant who "come out of the great tribulation," having "washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb," shall be a holy people, their dross purged away, their judges restored as at the first, and their counsellors as at the beginning, and Jerusalem shall be "called the city of righteousness, the faithful city."

Thus shall Zion "be redeemed with judgment and her converts with righteousness," while "the destruction of the transgressors and of the sinners shall be together, and they that forsake Jehovah shall be consumed." The elect remnant of Israel also will be brought back, and made to inhabit the land.

II. But besides the purging judgments referred to, there will be other acts of righteous government, and retribution reserved for that dreadful period. Babylon, especially,

THE CORRUPT CARCASS OF CHRISTENDOM, will come into remembrance. The blood shed and the crimes committed in the name of Christ will then be righteously avenged. The beast and his confederates, themselves following a still more fearful delusion, will hate the scarlet woman and make her desolate; the very power which has supported her will turn against her; and the cup which she hath filled shall be filled to her double.

ON THE BEAST.

III. The fall of Babylon shows the doom of that soulless profession of Christ and that lifeless ecclesiastical organization which will survive when all true believers have been removed to the Father's house. But by whom is this apostate, corrupt system destroyed? By the beast and his coadjutors, that is, by that wicked head of the Gentile powers whose pride and blasphemy will at length draw down the lightnings of God's avenging wrath—the impious chief of those kings of the earth who shall "take counsel together against Jehovah, and against His Anointed."

This associated Gentile dominion is the third class dealt with in the judgments of the last week. The confederacy, headed by the prince and energized by Satan, will form a league with the mass of the Jews and their false Christ, and will gather together their forces to battle; when Christ will appear in His glory, followed by the armies of heaven, take the beast and the false prophet and cast them alive into the lake of fire, and afterward destroy their followers with the sword that proceedeth out of His mouth. So end "the times of the Gentiles."

ON THE THREATENING POWER.

IV. But there is another class of judgments. The Gentiles who successively held the reins of government as a trust from God do not include the whole body of the peoples of the earth. This sceptre passed from the Babylonian to the Persian, from the Persian to the Greek, from the Greek to the Roman, and at length to the wicked king whose doom we have just seen. But the confederacy between the Jews and the Roman dominion will be directed against a power which at that time threatens Jerusalem with destruction.

This power, which God uses, like the Assyrian of old, as a scourge to the unfaithful Jews, will, when the hour for judgment comes, itself also be visited. When half the city has been carried off, Christ will appear for its deliverance, the besieging host will be cut off, and the remnant of the people saved.

MILLENNIAL JUDGMENTS.

This will close the preliminary judgments. The nation having been purged, Babylon consumed, the last Satanic form of Gentile dominion overthrown, and the enemies who sought to destroy Jerusalem scattered, Christ's kingdom will be established on earth. The saints, who have come purged out of the great tribulation, will receive dominion under Him.

The rest of the Gentiles will be divided into classes, and rewarded or punished according to their treatment of "these My brethren," the feeble remnant of saints harassed and wasted by the persecution of the beast and false prophet. But the great feature will be the fulfilment of all God's earthly counsels in the person of the Second Man, the Lord from heaven, who alone is worthy to receive the dominion, and who alone can exercise it for God's glory or for man's blessing. Satan will be cast into the bottomless pit, while the Bride, the Lamb's wife, seen in figure as the New Jerusalem, will reign with Christ a thousand years.

THE LAST OUTBREAK.

It is a solemn thing to trace the incurable hatred of the human heart to God. A thousand years' experience of Christ's righteous and blessed rule will not suffice to change the nature of man. No sooner is Satan loosed from his imprisonment than the nations rebel, but only to be at once destroyed with devouring fire from heaven. This last outbreak of human wickedness brings the world's history to a close. The earth is burned up, the elements melt with fervent heat, and no place is found for them.

Then the dead, who had no part in the first resurrection, are raised, are judged according to their works, and are cast into the lake of fire. Satan, death, and hades are all similarly destroyed. And now, the last enemy having been vanquished, the work of reconciliation, founded on the blood of the Cross, is completed; a new heaven and a new earth are created, in which righteousness not only reigns, as during the thousand years, but permanently dwells; Christ, having ruled "till He hath put all enemies under His feet," delivers up the kingdom to God, even the Father; and God, being now all in all, and no longer estranged by human guilt, makes His tabernacle with man.

Such, as traced out in the Word of the living God, is the prospect before the world. Are these the things which Christians are looking for?

A CONVICT'S EXPERIENCE.

THE work accomplished through Mr. Dunn, the late Jerry McAuley, and others in America in the reformation of the outcasts of society is continually coming to the surface in unexpected quarters, where men living decent, honest lives suddenly surprise their friends by admitting that once they were thieves and law-breakers generally. God brought them under the influence of some earnest Gospel worker, and saved them to the Church and to society. One such case has come to light recently in England, in connection with Mr. George Hatton's work at the St. Giles's Mission Hall, London. The rescued man thus vividly described his deliverance:

"My father was a thief, sir; I know'd nothing else but thieving. I began when I was about ten years old, picking little things earlier than that. I'd never seen a Bible, never in all my life; churches I knew only from the outside, though I was but a lad when I heard as some on 'em had something inside—plate of some kind—worth nabbing. I was in prison when I were just turned fourteen; and no sooner out than in again. I believe in the next twenty years I spent well-nigh eighteen in quod—doing two long terms. At Dartmoor I heard tell of the mission, and how there was some chance for a fellow like me. The fact is, I'd got tired of it, and lots of 'em are, but I'd been trained to it, and didn't think there was anything else for me. However, I thought I'd give them a try, and sent in my name to the governor as wanting to be discharged to the mission. Very well; when I comes to the Home, Mr. Wheatley, he makes me stare. Why? 'cause he spoke about pardon. Now, I'd never dreamed of such a thing. I thought I might do better, and live honestly, but I'd never thought about sins being pardoned. He took me into the Home till I could pick up a trade and get a job somewhere. All the time I was working I kept turning over in my mind what he could mean about a Saviour for me. One of the fellows there—as I know'd had turned religious—came, and he says to me, 'Look here, turning over a new leaf won't do; you've got to cry to God for pardon, to take Christ for your Saviour.' Says I, 'Take Him; why, how can I take Christ?' So he spoke plain to me, and showed how Christ saved the thief on the cross, and how He died for me. I'd never heard the like before; for, more shame to me, I'd paid little attention to what the chaplain said. Well, from that day I began to see things different, and 'twern't long after till He saved my soul. He did, and now I don't want to steal, I don't really, sir. I believe He's made a new man of me."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Dying Man's Idea of the Gospel.—At a recent meeting an evangelist said: "At one time I called to see a man who was dying, and he said to me, 'When you preach the Gospel be sure you preach the whole Gospel; there are so many who do not preach the whole Gospel.' 'What is the whole Gospel?' I asked. 'A dying Christ for dying men, and a living Christ to live in men,' was the dying man's reply, and since that time I have endeavored by God's help to preach the whole Gospel."

The World Preferred to Christ.—Mrs. Osburn related the following incident: "I was speaking to a young woman the other night about the danger of putting off salvation to a more convenient season, as so many do, and I said to her, 'When is the time to accept Christ and the truth of His glorious Gospel?' 'I do not know,' she replied. 'When is God's time?' I then asked. 'Now,' was the short reply. 'Well, then,' I said, 'will you accept of it now and be saved?' But she would not, and she is still unsaved, not because she does not know the way of salvation, but because she prefers the world to her Saviour. Oh, pray that her eyes might be opened to see her awful state!"

A Mother's Last Text.—An Evangelist observed: "I took up a young man's Bible the other day, a friend of my own, and opening it I saw written inside the following: 'Mother's last text, This is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief.' Those were his mother's last words, and the text she rested her soul upon as she went home to be with her Redeemer. And now her boy treasures it above all things, and claims it as his, because he says it reminds him of his mother. Friends, might I ask, when you leave this world, what will you be remembered by? If you have not yet thought of it, ask yourself the solemn question."

Why the Boy Whistled.—Mr. Sanford Related: "There was a little boy in the State where I lived whose mother was very nervous, and could not bear to have the slightest noise made in her presence. One day the little boy was whistling, and she said, 'Really, you must stop whistling.' The boy at once obeyed, but it was not long before he began to whistle again. Again he was checked, and again he heroically stopped. A third time he began, and the mother said, 'Now, there you are at it again.' 'Why, mother,' said the little fellow, 'I cannot help it; it whistled itself.' That I say to you. Be filled with the Holy Spirit to overflowing, and you will speak for Jesus, not because you think it is a duty, but because you cannot possibly help it; the Spirit will speak of itself."

Spinal Injury Healed by Faith.—Mrs. M. Baxter said: "A touching incident of a child's simple faith came under my notice lately. A little boy was playing with some companions, when he accidentally received a kick from one of them, and the result was that the poor child's spine was very much injured. Now, the little lad had read in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD instances of sick folks being healed by faith in the Lord Jesus. So, full of faith, the little fellow asked his mother to write to Bethshan, and desire us to pray for him. To please her boy the mother wrote, beginning the letter with, 'I write with a very sad heart.' So I thought if she had believed she would have written, 'I write with a very joyful heart.' But if she had not faith, her little boy had. At the foot of her letter was written, in trembling and scrawling handwriting by the boy himself, 'Dear, kind lady, I want you to pray for me, for I believe Jesus will heal me.' So some of us agreed to meet on the following Friday and lay the case before the Lord, and the boy was to unite with us in prayer at the same time. A lady called to see the little lad, and both put an earnest prayer to God. A few days afterward we received a letter, written in beautiful round letters by the boy himself—all trembling had gone from his hand. He was telling us that the Lord had healed his back, and that he was completely cured. He much wished to come and give his testimony, but it was too far for him to come alone, and his mother was not willing to undertake the long journey."

Throwing Away a Good Chance.—Mr. Lapsley said: "I was speaking to a man some time ago who was standing at an open-air meeting, and I learned that he had a good education, and that he was very well connected, all his relations holding good positions, and there he was a perfect wreck, and all through sin. 'If you decide for the Lord,' I said, 'I will be surety that you too will hold a good position in society in a few years, for the Lord is good to them that love Him.' He was highly talented, and I knew if he gave up drink he would get on in the world. 'I believe you,' he said, 'but I cannot break away from the power of sin.' 'But,' I said, 'the Lord will give you power to withstand the temptation, for He has promised to undertake for us.' 'I believe all you say, but I cannot give it up,' he replied, and, sad to relate, he turned away, still clinging to his sin and his poverty. Dear friends, Jesus wants to lavish His matchless love upon you; will you come to Him?"

A Man Honest with Himself.—Mr. Ferrie said: "I took a friend of some years' standing to an evangelistic meeting, thinking he had not peace of mind. I asked one of the workers to speak to him, and I heard some of the conversation afterward. He had been well brought up; his father was one of the leading men in the temperance movement in Edinburgh. From his childhood he had been taught to pray and honor God, and he had been a Sabbath-school teacher, and was really earnest in good work. Still, when the worker put to him the question, 'Do you believe in the Lord Jesus Christ?' the reply was, 'No; I do not believe that I do.' He was honest with himself and with others, and therefore found peace that night. How many lack that honesty and will not even admit that they are lost, and thereby perish! But all who come to Jesus in honest sincerity may accept Christ's word, 'Him that cometh unto Me I will in no wise cast out.' There are many people who have their faith misdirected. Napoleon said, 'God is always on the side of the big battalions. Have faith in God, for He is our refuge and strength, and a very present help in time of trouble.'"

There is Sorrow on the Sea.—"I Remember the minister of Newhaven telling me of the saddest day he ever experienced. He told me many sad incidents which happened on that sorrowful day that the fishing fleet went down. He got telegrams the whole day telling him to go to this house and that and break the sad news that a father, a husband, a brother, or a son had been taken from them. He said, 'There was one house which I went to in the morning and told the mother that her second son had been taken away, and in the afternoon I had to go back to the same house and tell her that her eldest son had also been drowned. When I broke the news she looked at me, but said not a word. Falling into a chair, she put her apron over her face and sat as one stunned. She did not cry; we wished she would. We feared her reason was going when her sister-in-law came in, and, putting her hand on her shoulder, kindly said, 'Annie, do you remember what you said to me when I lost my fine boys two years ago? You told me not to mourn for my sons, that I would meet them in heaven.' Those few words of comfort brought consolation to the poor woman. Like Paul, I think to those who are in Christ tribulation ought to be a cause of thanksgiving. Friends, I say, have faith in God, for 'all things work together for good to them that love God.'"

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Cordial New Year's Greeting to all the readers of the CHRISTIAN HERALD is tendered on this the first visit it makes them in the year 1886. As a large number of them are old friends, between whom and ourselves there is mutual esteem, they will be glad to learn that, in spite of the general depression in business, the paper is prospering. Every year since its commencement has witnessed an increase in its circulation. Last year the number of its subscribers was larger than it has ever had before, and this year the proportion of renewals already received, and the numerous new names we have had the pleasure of adding to the list, warrant the expectation that even the large figures of last year will be exceeded. For this prosperity we are chiefly indebted to our readers, who have thought so well of the journal as to introduce it to their friends. We thank them sincerely for their past kindness, and for their promises to continue their exertions. They will also be pleased to learn that during the past year the usefulness of the paper kept pace with its increased circulation. We have been deeply thankful to learn during the past two weeks from letters received from all the States and Territories of the Union, from Canada, and from foreign lands, that God has used the paper everywhere for the conversion of souls, and for the comfort, and encouragement of His people. This, after all, is the object of its publication. Will our readers who are taking so warm an interest in the welfare of the CHRISTIAN HERALD pray that a still more abundant blessing may rest upon it this year? This is now the eighth time that it has been the editor's privilege to tender a New Year's salutation to its readers, and to make this request. He is cheered by the warm words of appreciation which come from all quarters, but with increased opportunities, and the increased responsibility they bring, there is a more urgent need than ever before for the prayers of God's people that the paper may continue to be an instrument that God can use for His purposes and the public good.

The Business Record of the Past Year, as summarized by the New York Times, from the exhaustive report of a mercantile agency, encourages the hope that we have passed through the worst of the business depression. It appears that though the number of failures during the year was nearly as great as in 1884, the aggregate of liabilities was little more than half as large. The ratio of failures to the whole number of traders was largest on the Pacific Coast, but there the average of liabilities was lowest. In the Western States the ratio of failures was smallest, and the average of liabilities was also low. In the Middle States the liabilities average highest, but the ratio of failures was little greater than in the West. While the Clearing House and the Mercantile Exchanges show an aggregate of transactions smaller for 1885 than for 1884, the figures for the last month of the year show a considerable increase, which is a hopeful sign for the future. The statistics of production of the leading staples furnished by the exchanges show an increase for the last over the preceding year in corn iron and coal, and a falling off in wheat and petroleum.

The Presidential Succession Bill which passed the Senate last year, but failed in the House, has again been passed by the Senate. There seems to be an almost unanimous feeling in the country that it ought to become a law. It is strange that some provision has not been made before this for the contingency it is intended to meet. If President Cleveland had died at any time between November 26th and the meeting of Congress there would have been no person properly qualified to succeed him in the administration of national affairs. Even now that a President pro tempore of the Senate has been elected, the succession, in the event of Mr. Cleveland's death, would be one certain to excite ill-feeling, and would involve a serious disturbance in public affairs. The bill which has now passed the Senate places the members of the Cabinet in their order of precedence next in the line of succession after the Vice-President. There are many sound reasons for this arrangement, of which the chief is that the Secretary of State and his colleagues, being selected by the President, may naturally be supposed to be adherents of the President's policy, which the people at the Presidential election made the policy of the nation. It is not a perfect arrangement, but it is in harmony with the spirit of the Constitution.

A Number of Amendments to the Civil Service rules were promulgated last week. Before the old Commission went out of office it embodied the results of its experience in ten propositions for changes in the rules. They were submitted to the President, and by him laid aside for the consideration of the new Commission, which has now indorsed them. The President also approved them, and they have gone into operation. All the amendments are in matters of detail, but they are clearly designed to carry out the spirit of the law and simplify the duties of the Commission. It is worthy of note that this much-abused law appears to be studied and amended as though it was being observed. Judging from remarks made in certain popular journals it might be supposed that it was a dead letter.

The Example of Georgia is Exerting an Influence in New Jersey. We learn that a temperance committee has been formed to promote the passage of a local option law, a bill for which it has prepared for introduction in the Legislature at the coming Session. The bill provides for a special election in any county upon application by a petition signed by one tenth of the legal voters, at which election the question of prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors shall be voted upon.

A Significant Proposal Has Been Made to the Attorney-General by William S. Warner and J. Henry Work, who are under indictment by the Grand Jury, and are also defendants in a civil suit. The latter is brought by the trustees of the Marine National Bank for the recovery of $152,800, which they drew out of that bank on the day before it failed, by a cheque of Ferdinand Ward acting for Grant & Ward. It is charged that Warner and Work received from Grant & Ward $1,300,000 as "profits" on their investments, but in a published statement the accused men claimed that their investments had exceeded their profits. The offer made last week was to pay voluntarily the sum called for by the civil suit, on condition that the criminal indictment is withdrawn. The proposal was rejected, the defendants were informed that the law must take its course. It may be hoped that the attempt to ascertain what became of Grant & Ward's money may not languish. It is an interesting question the answer to which may lead to some financiers being put where they cannot prey on the community.

The Newark Children who were Sent to Paris to be treated by M. Pasteur for the bites of a mad dog, sailed for America on January 2d. The French scientist is confident that they are now safe from hydrophobia. On the day before they sailed he injected under the abdominal skin of the eldest three the most poisonous virus in his laboratory, which, used on a well man, would make him raving mad in seven days, and kill him in ten at the furthest. The youngest was inoculated the last time on Friday. When the three others were inoculated on Saturday they showed no signs that they had ever been treated. Not even the marks of the point of the syringe were visible. Dr. Billings, the New York physician who accompanied the children, is returning with them. He carries home several boxes of scientific instruments, numerous vials of virus of several kinds, but he could not take rabies virus because it will only keep four or five days, but he knows how to prepare it. He is fully satisfied that the discovery is a perfect one.

Mr. Gladstone's Seventy-Sixth Birthday was celebrated on December 29th. The first mail brought him over four hundred letters of congratulation. He left Hawarden Castle, where he resides, at daybreak, and walked to the village church, where special services were held. Notwithstanding that sleet and snow were falling, the walk did not seem to fatigue him, as he appeared quite hearty when he had returned home after the services. Mr. Gladstone requested the press to convey to his friends his thanks for the congratulatory letters and telegrams received by him, and to express his "appreciation of the beautiful gifts which have been showered upon him from every class and quarter, and which in many instances were accompanied by the most touching expressions of regard and affection." Mr. Gladstone says it would be absolutely impossible for him to acknowledge them personally. Among the congratulatory telegrams received by Mr. Gladstone, was one from the Prince of Wales. Mr. Herbert Gladstone presented his father with a bust of the Earl of Beaconsfield. Among the other presents were an American axe.

The Congo Region Has Been Explored by Lieutenant E. H. Taunt, of the United States Navy, who was commissioned to examine it by the Navy Department. He visited the whole of the Congo from the mouth to the falls, between Bangala Station, on the Upper Congo, and Stanley Falls. His journey was made partly on the Baptist missionary steamer and partly on a steamer belonging to the Free State, which had a white commander and a crew of Zanzibar natives. Having landed from the latter and encamped between Upoto and Haguwini River, the captain and crew were attacked by the natives, who killed seven of the crew, wounded six, and severely wounded the commander. Lieutenant Taunt had not landed, and, although attacked, he escaped unhurt. He believes the attack was made because the natives mistook the Zanzibar men for slave-drivers. During the whole of the journey up the Congo, Lieutenant Taunt had not the slightest attack of fever, and his health only suffered when on the return journey. He agrees with other explorers as to the dreariness and worthlessness of the Lower Congo up to Stanley Pool, but finds the climate, scenery, and fertility of the upper region quite marvellous and capable of yielding immense wealth to European and American commerce.

Subscriptions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD were received last week to the amount of $7.50. They were: From Hamorton, Pa., $1; Akron, O., $1; Westfield, Ind., $1; Pleasant Plains, Ill., $1; Minneapolis, Kan., 50 c.; Niagara, Ont., $1; Wilson, N. Y., $1; Antrim, Ont., $1.

The Annexation of Burmah, by England, was formally proclaimed at Rangoon, on Friday. The proclamation simply announced that the Territories formerly governed by King Theebaw will no longer be under his rule, but will become a part of the dominions of the Queen of Great Britain, and Ireland, and Empress of India, and that the government of the country will be administered during Her Majesty's pleasure by officers appointed by the Viceroy of India. There was a grand parade in honor of the event, and a large concourse of natives gathered to hear the reading of the proclamation. England cedes to China part of Upper Burmah in order to make the Chinese and Indian frontiers continuous. Also, it may be presumed, to disarm Chinese jealousy, and to avoid the experience of France in Tonquin.

M. Grévy was Re-Elected President of the French Republic on December 28th for a second term of seven years. The election was by joint ballot of the two Chambers of the Legislature. The scene during the balloting was one of the wildest excitement. The Monarchists, though impotent to affect the result, seemed mad with passion. One observer says that the space around the President's chair at times resembled a prize ring. Insults and oaths flew about freely. Two young deputies, who had begun a regular hand-to-hand engagement, had to be forcibly separated. Much of this excitement was caused by the somewhat doubtful action of the Government in calling the Legislature together without waiting for the re-election of several invalidated Monarchists. M. Grévy's majority was 135. He is seventy-eight years old.

An Interesting Building has been Opened in Chelsea, Mass. Mr. Thomas Martin, a well-known Christian citizen of that place, was some time ago bereaved of his eldest son, Horace. The young man was a follower of Jesus, and the parents, while grieving over his departure, were thankful to God for the consolation derived from his conversion. It was in a little mission chapel that he was led to decide for Christ. Opposite to that chapel the sorrowing father has erected as a memorial to his son a noble hall which he has consecrated to Christian and philanthropic work. Mission work, Bible-classes, and temperance meetings are to be conducted there. At the opening service Mr. Martin feelingly expressed his conviction that in no better way could he honor his son's memory than by providing for an extension of the work through which that son was brought to Christ.

The Need of a Sabbath is Being Realized by people who are not concerned about the religious aspect of the day. At a recent crowded meeting in the Opera House of Denver, Col., which was called as a secular movement, it was resolved, as "every man needs for his highest physical, intellectual, and moral development" a day of rest, to request the merchants of Denver to close their places of business one day in seven.

Special Evangelistic Services in the Re-formed (Dutch) churches of New York have been arranged. The Classis has divided the churches into four groups for the special work. The services will continue for two weeks for each group. The first one commences on the 10th of January, and the last one ends on the 7th of March. The special meetings are to be held on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday evenings; but we understand that in the Collegiate Church on Twenty-ninth Street, which is in the first group, it is contemplated to hold service every evening in the week for the entire fortnight, with the aid of some well-known and efficient evangelist. This is another remarkable sign of the movement which is spreading through the Christian churches of all denominations in the city. Like the Episcopal Church, the Reformed Church has heretofore been remarkable for its quiet, decorous work rather than for special revival services.

Evangelistic Services of a very Successful character have been held during the past two months in New York by the Rev. George C. Needham, the Evangelist. Last month the services were in connection with the Reformed-Catholic congregation worshipping in Masonic Temple, Sixth Avenue and Twenty-third Street, of which Rev. James A. O'Connor is pastor, where he again preached on Sunday, December 27th. Mr. Needham also preached every evening from December 21st to 24th in Union Tabernacle, Thirty-fifth Street, west of Broadway, Mr. George J. Mingins, pastor, and in Berean Baptist Church, corner Bedford and Downing streets, Dr. Judson, pastor, December 28th to 31st. The meetings have been well attended throughout, and much good has been done.

A Dishonest Drover's Amusing Punishment is reported by the Cleveland Leader. It states that a farmer recently sold a flock of sheep to a man on Snake River, and lent him his dog to drive the sheep home—a distance of thirty miles. The drover promised to send the dog back, but finding him very useful, resolved to keep him. He kept him shut up on his place for some time to accustom the dog to the idea of making it his home. The dog, however, had apparently no intention of assisting the drover in his dishonest design, for he succeeded in getting loose one night and started for home. He seemed to think that there was something wrong also in the sheep bargain, for he collected all the sheep that had belonged to his master and drove them home again. The dishonest drover was thus involved in a second journey, in which he did not have the dog's assistance. He is not the first man by very many who has found that crime is folly (Jer. 17:11).

A Man Who Had Never Seen His Wife and children was introduced to them recently in Cincinnati. Several years ago a man residing in the suburbs of that city lost his sight through a cataract forming on each of his eyes; soon afterward his wife fell ill, and after a long illness she died. During her illness she was waited upon by a young nurse, a stranger to the family, and after her death the nurse remained in attendance. The blind man's heart was won by her uniform kindness and affectionate disposition, and he persuaded her to become his wife. In spite of the husband's affliction the couple were happy, and the union was blessed with two children. Early last month the blind man consulted an oculist, and an operation was performed upon him. It was successful, and for the first time in years the man saw. Shortly afterward the surgeon brought a lady into his room, and asked the man if he knew her. He did not, and was overjoyed to learn that she was his wife. When his two children whom also he had never seen were brought to him his gladness was pathetic to witness. What the Christian's joy will be when his eyes open in heaven, and he sees for the first time the Saviour whom he has loved by faith on earth the human mind cannot conceive (1 Peter 1:8).

Why a Senator Changed his Mind was Ex-plained by himself in a Washington hotel last week. He said that he was determined to bring the President to an account for the dismissal of a certain official, who was in no sense "an offensive partisan." He was resolved, too, on working to prevent the confirmation of the President's nomination of the official's successor. In order to make his effort successful he went to a member of the House who was personally acquainted with the decapitated official, and told him of his resolve to be "the injured man's" champion. "That's right, Senator," said the member. "I hope you will succeed for my own sake." "Why for your sake?" asked the astonished senator. "Well, he owes me a considerable sum of money. See here," and he produced a promissory note dated three months back for over two thousand dollars. "How did you get that?" asked the senator. The reply was: "One thousand of it was for two loans of $500 each, made at various times within a year, to keep him out of the sheriff's hands; the rest was for losses at poker, all played away in one evening." So the senator changed his mind, and decided not to champion the cause of a man who lost more than a thousand dollars in gambling in one evening. The senator was right; but while we approve his decision, we remember thankfully that past misconduct, if sincerely repented of and forsaken, does not deter the sinners' Advocate from undertaking for them (1 John 2:1).

A Home on the Top of a Reed is Constructed by ants on the banks of the Amazon. A traveler in that region states that while journeying by the river he noticed large balls of earth on the tops of the reeds which grow near the river—immense growths, some of which attain the height of twenty feet. He was curious about these earth balls which seemed to be artificial, and at length succeeded in inspecting one of them. He found that it was the home of a swarm of ants, who were thus safe from inundations while possessing through the hollow reed a safe highway of ingress and egress for themselves and their food. It is a singular way of securing safety, but it would seem that the ants have displayed considerable ingenuity in the selection and construction of their home. The peace and security they enjoy renders their condition a type of the blessedness which will be witnessed on the earth during the Millennium (Isa. 35:7-10).

A New Test for Leather Belting is Described in the current number of a scientific magazine. The editor says that such a test has long been needed. Many accidents have been caused by belts for machines being made of leather that is not strong enough to bear the strain to which it is subjected. Before it is fit for belts it must be thoroughly well impregnated with tannin. In order to ascertain whether it is in that condition a piece of it should be immersed in vinegar. If it is imperfectly tanned the fibres of the leather will swell and become a gelatinous mass. Perfectly tanned leather does not change, though it may remain in the vinegar for months. Young Christians who will have to bear the strain of temptation in prominent positions in the world, often have to pass through such a testing process in college or at home. It is those who are thoroughly impregnated with the Holy Spirit and given up wholly to God who are fit for service (James 1:12).

Every Dog is Entitled to One Bite before Its owner can be held for damages. This was the ruling of Chief Justice McAdam in deciding an appeal case in New York on December 24th. The case was an application for a new trial of a suit in which a woman claimed damages for the bite of dog belonging to the defendant. The Court below had awarded her damages, but the owner of the dog appealed, on the ground that it had not been shown at the trial that he knew of the dog's vicious propensities. The Judge held that such evidence was unnecessary, but Judge McAdam reversed the decision, and ordered a new trial. He contended that the owner of a dog was not bound to ascertain its character, and before he could be held responsible it must be proved that he knew the animal was inclined to do the particular mischief that had been done. One previous case was sufficient. He quoted a former ruling in reference to a dog worrying sheep in which it had been decided that every dog is entitled to one worry, and said that the same rule would apply to bites of mankind. Every dog was entitled to one bite before the owner became liable. Nevertheless, in spite of Judge McAdam, a right-minded man would be at some pains to ascertain the character of his dog, lest he unwittingly expose others to peril. The same principle should guide us in other matters. A Christian man should not be satisfied with proving that a course of conduct is lawful for him; he ought to ask himself whether it is liable to injure others (1 Cor. 10:23, 24).

DRINK FOR THIRSTY PEOPLE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"In the last day, that great day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried, saying, If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink."—JOHN 7: 37.

A Preacher's Answer to a Soldier—Christ's Patient Pleading—His Last Opportunity—Used it for Special Teaching—I. The Inquiry for the Thirsty—Thirsty Souls Rare—The Invitation to Them Only—Is being Repeated—What the Thirst is—II. Direction for Relief—In Jesus Personally—The Supply Unlimited—Varied—III. Full Permission Given—Not Forfeited by Wrong-doing—Or by Deficiency—IV. The Entreaty.

The officers were after our Lord, and He knew it. He could spy them out in the crowd, but He was not therefore in the least afraid, or disconcerted. He reminds me of that minister who, when he was about to preach, was stopped by a soldier, who held a pistol at his head, and threatened that if he spoke he would kill him. "Soldier," said he, "do your duty; I shall do mine;" and he went on with his preaching. The Saviour, without saying as much in words, said so by His actions. If they were sent to take Him, let them take Him; as for Himself, the time was come to speak boldly, and therefore He stood and cried, saying, "If any man thirst, let him come unto Me, and drink."

You see, it was the last day of the Feast of Tabernacles. From the middle of that festival the Lord had been present, and had openly taught the people, and they had seen Him in the midst of the throng, lifting up His hands, and proclaiming holy doctrine. But the feast was over; the boughs were cleared away, and the tents, in which they had dwelt for a time, were taken down. It was the eighth day, which was spent as a Sabbath; but the Saviour did not cease to preach because the festival was almost over. Till the last day He continued to instruct, invite, and entreat. How this reminds us of His constant patience! It is but one instance, out of very many, of of loving-kindness. Though the Jews had often refused Him, He is still pleading with them. There are times when it would not be becoming to the honor of a king to press his favors upon those who have distinctly despised and refused them; but it is ever the singular glory of our Lord Jesus Christ that He continues to entreat, even when we continue to resist. Even to our own last hour does the Lord of mercy sweetly cry, "If any man thirst, let him come unto Me, and drink."

It is the last time that He will look into some of their faces. They are going back from Jerusalem, where they have kept the feast; they will get back to their farms and to their merchandise, and if He does not strike the iron while He has it on the anvil, He may never have another stroke at it. If at this time an invitation be not pressed upon them, they will forget the teaching they have heard, they will probably never hear any more, and they will die in their sins. I think I see the Master's face beaming with holy affection, and His eyes streaming with tears, as He pleads as for His life with the throng which is so soon to melt away. It is now or never with Him, and with them. He must once more free Himself of the blood of them all, and therefore on that "last day, that great day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried, If any man thirst, let him come unto Me, and drink."

I think it is noteworthy that, when the Master had gathered up all the forces of His soul, and His whole spirit was moved with intense anxiety for the good of men, then He especially preached the Gospel of salvation. I do not know that He had before so publicly declared Himself as the great fountain and source of salvation. He had taught this truth to the woman at the well of Samaria with special plainness, and He had spoken of it to different little companies with great distinctness; but now almost for the first time on this last day He brings it all out before the multitude, and cries, "If any man thirst, let him come unto Me, and drink." Now is the invitation given most freely; now is the cry sounded forth most loudly. O ye that are perishing, O ye that are lost, O ye that want salvation, here is the place where you can find it—"Come unto Me, and drink!"

THE VITAL OBJECT.

It seems to me that the Lord Jesus was driving only at this one thing—the getting of men to come to Himself. At another time He would teach them deeper doctrine, or truth of a wider range; for His ministry dealt with many things for edification and holiness; but now, on this last day, He seems to put other matters on one side, and His one object is to win thirsty souls to come to Him and drink. I have deep fellowship in that spirit this morning. I remember that I shall not have another morning's discourse with you for some time; and perhaps I may never have another. I go from you for a season, and my voice will be silent among you. Therefore I said within my heart that I would preach this morning upon the one subject of coming to Christ, and upon nothing else.

If you make mistakes about a thousand things, it will be very sad that you should do so; but not so sad as if you fell into an error upon this matter. If, peradventure, you should not know this or that, it may be greatly to your detriment, but nothing compared with not knowing the Lord Jesus. My brethren, my sisters, if you really come to Jesus, and assuage the thirst of your souls by drinking of that living water, which He so freely giveth, the main thing will be right, the chief thing will be secured. We will hope that all the rest will come right by and by, but just now we will look alone to that vital point. O you that thirst, come unto Christ, and drink; and if you do so, our morning's work will be fraught with untold blessedness to you! In my absence this shall be my solace, that my last word won your souls for Jesus.

I. Notice, in the text,

THE INQUIRY FOR THE THIRSTY.

Jesus stands amid that mass of people from every land, the mingled tribes, scattered far and wide, who came up to Jerusalem to keep the feast, and He cries among them, "If any man thirst." Evidently, He is seeking out needy, restless, longing hearts. Observe that He starts with a very wide inquiry; He seeks for any man, and consequently for every man, that thirsts. So does the Gospel at this hour come with a generous and wide appeal. Hast thou any desire after God? Hast thou any will to be rid of thy sin? Hast thou any anxiety to escape from the wrath to come? Hast thou any weariness after Jesus, and the rest which He alone can give? Dost thou desire to be made pure? Is there a heart in thee which sighs after better things? Dost thou long after a higher, and holier, and more heavenly life? Well, whoever thou mayest be, Jesus saith, "Come unto Me, and drink."

Yet there wails through our text an undertone of grief by which it is anxiously narrowed down. "If any man thirst"—as if He had said, "The mass of you do not thirst; do any of you thirst? The multitudes do not thirst; only one here and there is doing so." Our Lord's glance sweeps over the throng; He reads their indifference, and spiritual death, and in plaintive accents He expresses His fear that none, or at least very few, are thirsting. Alas! a spiritually thirsty soul is a choice rarity. Where shall I find him? With what joy will I salute him! He is the man who will gladly receive the tidings of Jesus and His love.

SADLY FOCUSED.

The invitation is in itself wide, and is only focused by the deep sorrow of the Preacher. If any man thirst, he is bidden to come to Jesus. If thou, O man, hast stolen in here this morning, discontented with the pleasures of the world, thou art bidden to come to Jesus for rest and satisfaction. If thou art rich and increased in goods, and yet art quite unable to enjoy thy riches, because thine heart cannot be satisfied with the world, thou art he to whom this invitation comes. If thou art heavy with the burden of sin; if thou wouldst give thine eyes to be rid of it; if thou art despairing, and ready to die, because thy struggles after better things have all been failures, thou art he whom the Lord Jesus invites.

Do you ask me again, "What is this thirst?" Thirst is nothing actual, or substantive; it is a lack, a want, a crying out of its emptiness. It is the absence of a necessary. Sinner, thou needest not look for any good thing in thyself; the thirst which is sought for is the absence of a good thing. Now, soul, if thou art suffering from fear or despondency; if thou endurest heaviness of heart and disquietude of spirit; if thou hast a longing, a sighing, a pining after something better and holier, then thou art thirsty. If thou hast this thirst in any measure or degree, thou art bidden to come to Christ and drink. If thou hast not as yet a burning thirst, nor a fever, but if thou hast any sort of thirst, thou mayest come and drink. If thou dost in any measure long for mercy and renewal, thou art included in this invitation, "If any man thirst, let him come unto Me, and drink." Do not look within thyself to find any good thing. Is thirst a good thing? Nay, thirst is an evil thing, to be removed; and if thou seest in thyself only evil things to be removed, thou hast all that Jesus sets forth in this text as the description of those whom He permits to come to Himself. He saith so much, and no more—"If any man thirst, let him come unto Me, and drink."

II. Here is, secondly,

for the relief of all such thirsty ones: "Let him come unto Me, and drink." There is one direction, and that one direction points solely to one source. All who would have their thirst assuaged must come to one fountain, to one Jesus. Observe, that Christ, who gives the water which quenches spiritual thirst, directs us to come to Himself personally. Do notice this. "Let him come unto Me, and drink." Oh, my hearer, whatever thy spiritual desire is, Jesus will grant it; whatever, in fact, thy soul requires between this place and glory, He will give it thee; but thou must come to Him for it, and to Him alone. Thou must come distinctly to Him, and not to ceremonies, or sacraments, or priests, or churches, or assemblies, or creeds, or services, or doings, or feelings. There lies thy hope, and there alone. In that Person, I say, and in that Person only there is salvation.

All that a sinner wants is to be found in abundance in Jesus. The Lord Jesus invites all who feel their thirst to come to Him and partake; feeling no diffidence as to His ability to meet all their cases. "If any man thirst, let him come unto Me, and drink." Though thy thirst be like that of a panting ox upon a sultry summer's day, who putteth down his mouth to the brook, and drinks as though he would leave it dry—thou mayest come, and feel no trembling as to the sufficiency of the living waters. He said, "If any man thirst, let him come unto Me, and drink," without stint or measure; there is nothing to limit the draught or question the supply. In Jesus there is such a fulness that it never will be exhausted. Sin may be exhausted, the race may be numbered, time may be finished, and need may be ended, but mercy endureth forever.

There is in Christ Jesus

A VARIED SUPPLY.

The thirst of the soul is not like the thirst of the body, which is readily quenched by any one liquid, for the thirst of the soul is for many things. Whatsoever many things the soul thirsts for, Jesus will supply them all; our wonderful variety of wants is met by His wonderful variety of excellences. Here is a soul that wants peace: "this Man shall be the peace." "I am unhinged, I am almost driven to distraction, I am sore troubled, so that I cannot sleep." Thou shalt have rest by coming to Jesus: "He giveth His beloved sleep." "But I am so guilty, I have sinned past all pardon; I blush to think how grievously I have trespassed." Thou canst have pardon for all thy sins, though they be as glaring as scarlet, and though for number they be as many as the sands of the sea. In Jesus the penitent finds perfect pardon for all his offences. Believest thou this? It is certainly so. God will cast all thy transgressions into the depths of the sea, if thou believest in the Lord Jesus. How happy is the man who, by faith in Jesus, knows that the Lord has fully and freely forgiven him!

PURITY.

"But I want purity," cries a third. "I am troubled with horrible thoughts. I have a strong passionate nature, which draws me into wrong desires. I have been a drunkard, I have been unchaste, I have been given to the use of foul language; and these things are a source of continued defilement." Oh, my friend, thou canst get rid of all this, if thou desirest to do so, by coming to Jesus! He will give thee a new heart, and a right spirit; He will change thy nature totally, so that this evil shall never more have dominion over thee; but where sin abounded, grace shall much more abound. Dost thou hear this? All purity is in Christ for thee.

"But I," says one, "desire to make PROGRESS.

I hope I am right, and I want to be more right. I want to make advances in the divine life, so as to honor God, and bless my fellow-men." Come, then, to the Lord Jesus, and drink, for He giveth life, and giveth it more abundantly. "But I want," says a Christian, "power in prayer, and power to convince and convert my fellow-men." Come, then, to Jesus for it; concerning this also He saith, "If any man thirst, let him come unto Me, and drink." He will make thee strong upon thy knees, and mighty in holy service, if thou wilt but surrender thy will to Him. If any man thirst for anything that is really desirable, let him come to Jesus, in whom all right desires are provided for. Do but trust Him, and thou hast come to Him. This coming is not so much an exercise of power, as the resignation of power. Submit thyself to Jesus, yield to Him, be willing that He should be everything to thee; and thou hast truly come to Him.

Then thou art told to drink. That is not a difficult action. Any fool can drink; in fact, many are great fools because they drink too much of poisonous liquors. Drinking is peculiarly the common-place act of sinners. "Drink!" Surely thou canst do that! It is all He bids thee do; it is, in fact, to do nothing but to receive thy God. If any man thirst, let him receive Christ. This, then, is the one direction for the assuagement of the burning thirst of all sin-sick souls.

FULL PERMISSION.

III. Consider, in the third place, the permission here given for their participation. I have told you where the water is, but the question comes, "May I drink of it?" If thou thirstest, drink. No limit is placed in our text. "Who-soever will, let him take the water of life freely." There is no limit as to what thou hast formerly done. "Oh, but I have been so guilty, so hardened; I have uttered bitter words; I have even spoken against God and His Christ; I have denied the deity of our Lord; I have gone aside into all manner of crooked ways!" Whatever thou hast done, if thou hast now any longing after God and thy Saviour, come thou freely, just as thou art, for He bids thee come and drink. "But I dare not say what I have done, sir." Thou needest not say it to me; it were better thou shouldst not. Confess it unto God alone; and though thou be black as seven midnights, and foul as seven hells, thou mayest come to Jesus just as thou art, and receive from Him complete absolution. "If any man thirst, let him come unto Me, and drink."

There is no limit because of any kind of lack. "Oh," says one, "I am deficient in tenderness;

I am deficient in penitence!" Whatsoever you are deficient in, so much the greater is your thirst; but the Lord meeteth that thirst in all respects. If any man lack anything, the Lord will supply that lack; if any man be conscious that he has a great and grievous lack of that which is most essential, as when one has need of water which is essential to life, let him come to Christ, and drink.

AN EASY CONDITION.

"Surely," says one, "I cannot be intended, for I am in peculiar circumstances; I am very old." Come and drink, if thou hast any thirst, though thou be as old as Methuselah. "But I am so poor." The poorer thou art, the more welcome thou art. Come thou, in thy smock-frock, and drink. "But I cannot read." Never mind; the text does not say, "Read," but "Drink." At the polling-booths many are met with who cannot read, but none who cannot drink. I have known some that could not read a letter who could drink a churnful; drinking is an ability which is very widely distributed. The power to receive is scarcely a power, and yet it is the only power needed for salvation. Come along, and take what Christ doth freely give you.

Sorrowfully I notice that some are ingeniously trying to lock the door against themselves with the very key that was meant to open it. "Alas," one cries, "I am afraid I do not thirst!" Tell me, then, what is the matter with you. "Sir, I have not such a sense of need as I ought to have;" that is to say, you are sensible that you are more needy than you think you are. If you are conscious that you are not fully aware of all your need, then I urge you to come to Jesus, just as you are, for if ever there was a thirsty soul, you are one. You even need a sense of need, and this proves that you are horribly in need. You are neediest among the needy, and should be among the first to come. The more unfit you feel yourself to be, the more are you invited to come; your very unfitness is your fitness for coming to Jesus. It is not what you have that God asks for; but He invites you to bring before Him what you have not, that He may meet your pressing need, and give you all things to enjoy.

THE PLEADING SAVIOUR.

IV. We close with the entreaty for their coming. Jesus pleads with them to come. "Jesus stood and cried." I cannot picture the enthusiasm of His soul, the passion of His heart, as He spoke that morning. "If any man thirst, let him come unto Me, and drink." The tones of that pleading voice were both striking and wooing, forcible and tender. When on that last occasion He addressed the people He poured out His whole soul pleading with them that they would come to Him then and there. Dear hearts, when I think of Christ entreating us to come, I am astonished that we should need such pleading, and that He should give it. Surely the boot should be on the other foot. Ought we not to entreat Him to let us come? Should we not fall on our knees, and plead for permission to receive the Saviour? Instead of that we are cold and callous; and it is He that is eager for us to come. He loves us better than we love ourselves!

When a man has charity to give away, does he entreat people to come and accept it? No; but they come, and knock at his door, and beg him to give it to them. How strange is this, that you should be unwilling, and Christ anxious; that you should be backward, and Christ forward; that Jesus should cry "Come," and you should sit still and decline His calls! Should you not come when Jesus Himself invites, and even entreats? Is it not baseness, is it not gross hardness of heart if we do not receive Him who speaks from heaven, and cries, "If any man thirst, let him come unto Me, and drink"? You have not come before—that was wrong; but the times of your ignorance God winketh at, and bids you come now. Oh, that His sweet Spirit would accompany my words, so that you might feel your hearts melting toward the Saviour, and might say, "Yes, we will come, we will trust Jesus, we will receive His grace!" O my brother, if this be thy hearty consent to infinite love, then thy sorrow is ended, thy danger is over, and thy joy is begun. The Lord grant it, for His dear Son's sake. Amen.

KING THEEBAW'S "SACRED WHITE ELEPHANT."

THE enormous beast whose picture appears on page 12 belonged to Theebaw, King of Burmah, who surrendered to the British on November 28th, and was sent as a prisoner of war to Madras. It is a remarkable fact that the sacred elephant died soon after the king left his capital to give himself up to his enemies. His subjects naturally see in the event something more than a coincidence. To the eye of a Western traveller there was nothing about the sacred elephant more than about ordinary or secular elephants to inspire the veneration of the Burmese.

A magnificent pair of tusks constituted its chief distinction. In fact, it was not even "white," having only a few white spots upon its otherwise ordinarily dusky and half impervious hide. But such as it was, with its excellences and deficiencies, it is dead, its decease having taken place on December 6th. As an evidence and illustration of the superstitious reverence with which the huge quadruped was regarded, we may observe that one of Theebaw's great men at Mandalay, Kip Woon Mengyee, requested that the animal's remains might be allowed to lie in State for three days, according to custom; but General White replied that this could not be permitted for sanitary reasons, although he was willing that any other mark of respect should be paid. The burial took place in the cemetery on the following day in presence of a large concourse of natives. Many Burmese dignitaries attended the ceremony in State.

Many interesting descriptions of scenes in Mandalay are being sent to England by the British officers on duty in the Burman capital. "On a recent trip," says one, "I went with some of our officers to see the sights. Perhaps the most wonderful is the Great Bell. Its size is immense; two of us crept underneath, and when we stood up it seemed as if we were under a chancel roof. Our engineer took the dimensions. They gave the weight as eighty-nine tons, which would make it next to the great bell at Moscow, the largest in the world. It is said, probably with truth, that this monstrous bell was cast where it now stands. I could not get any data about its age, which must be very great; but it must always have been well cared for, as there are large lumps of gold and silver let into it.

"We sometimes see horrible sights on the Irrawaddy when we have passed the British frontier. The mode of execution is crucifixion. It is very common here, but it may possibly be of service as giving a truer picture of the actual scenes at a crucifixion than we have been accustomed to. Italian and Flemish art have thrown a halo over this horrible mode of execution. But here is a crucified malefactor. He would seem to have been condemned for robbery, and this, I think, is always punished with crucifixion and with breaking of legs. On such crosses as those of the thieves on Calvary that we see portrayed in pictures, the latter operation would amount to no more than breaking the bone with a mallet or axe; but when the whole frame is so violently rent asunder, death must at once ensue. The conventional figures of the crosses are at variance with the actual facts, as the dislocation would require some such structure as the one I saw. This is only one figure out of a ghastly row of twelve on the banks of the river. The victim was a handsome man, with fine features; he just raised his head as the steamer paddled past—the last he would ever see. If we had attempted to rescue him, though he was almost in the last throes, our fate might have been as bad. There were vultures waiting sullenly by the cross, and they would hardly have to wait long.

"The culprit, according to his offence, is crucified in different ways. Murder, theft, or killing a bullock are equally capital crimes. In some cases the legs are broken, and the man is left to die. In others, the victims are smeared with honey, and ants eat them alive. Those who are best off are those who are used as targets for the king's soldiers. There is sometimes a row of men who are crucified side by side; some with their legs broken and others not. Such cruel sights sadden a voyage of exceeding beauty, and it seems impossible to become callous to them. I shall hardly ever forget the dying look, almost of appeal, from the handsome old man, as we paddled past his cross."

A FATAL FRAUD.

AN ORIGINAL SERIAL STORY OF WESTERN LIFE.

BY LEW VANDERPOOLE.

An Implacable Father.

ARLINGTON, the home of brave old Ethan Allen, nestling as it does at the foot of the Green Mountains, is one of the loveliest villages in Vermont—if not in the world.

If you mention Venice, Pisa, or Florence to an Italian it brings a glow into his face; if you speak of Arlington to a Vermonter, you see as warm a glow of proud delight rise to his eyes. To him, the pretty village, with its wide-spreading shade-trees and its beautiful, well-kept gardens, appears the perfection of natural loveliness, defying competition even by the paradises of Italy. He will tell you of its sweet peacefulness, too, and speak of the goodness of its people. Probably, too, if he be a young man and impressible, he will whisper to you that the daughters of Arlington are fair beyond those of any other place, and that its matrons, living a life of calm, unruffled serenity, keep their beauty far on past middle life. Nor is this admiration all due to local partiality. The village is really beautiful. Every traveller who gazes upon it, must admit that God, who has "made everything beautiful in its time," has especially favored this nest in the Green Mountain State. It is one glorious garden, so quiet and beautiful and peaceful that the weary wanderer through the world might be glad to halt and rest there, and the busy toiler in crowded cities carry its picture in his memory as a place to which he might retire, after his struggle for wealth or fame is over, to spend his latter days in meditation and preparation for the life beyond.

The stranger as he looks over a gathering of Arlington folks sees, too, that the Vermont boast of the feminine loveliness at Arlington is justified. Probably a New York belle would pronounce the Arlington ladies plain, and ridiculously dressed, but even she would allow that their features are regular and their complexions good. To those points a critical male observer would add that they show intelligence, good humor, and are never disfigured by a smirk. Even the elder ones do not get the pinched, hungry expression that comes from a life of anxiety and care, nor the bloated, puffy look that tells of a life of self-indulgent ease. Life at Arlington is quiet, but it is pure, and the graces of character are more esteemed than the graces of person, and whatever young ladies may think, there is no surer way of becoming beautiful of face than to be beautiful of life. A gentle, kindly, loving disposition, a heart in which anger, jealousy, and hatred find no place, have an influence on the features that art can never give, and render even an ugly face attractive.

Thirty-five years ago the belle of Arlington was Alice Grey, a farmer's daughter. She was slight and girlish in appearance, but her form was lithe and perfect in its symmetry, her movements were graceful, and her features were the ideal of purity and gentleness. Her oval face, with its soft, clear complexion, her large blue eyes and abundant golden hair, was the face that the old masters loved to put on their canvas when they drew the Virgin Mary. It is no wonder that the farmer almost idolized his only daughter; for, besides being beautiful, she was dutiful and affectionate.

There were many admiring eyes turned on Alice Grey by the time she reached her twentieth year, but no word of love had ever been addressed to her. Farmer Grey's manner, his jealous watchfulness, and well-known sternness rendered any approach to Alice a difficult and almost a dangerous undertaking. There was no young man in Arlington fit, in the farmer's opinion, to become the husband of his daughter.

"She is the most precious thing in life to me," he said, "and she shall marry no swineherd or plough-boy." Not that the farmer was avaricious on his daughter's account. He had plenty of money, and she was his only child. But he wanted her to marry some one who was distinguished, even if he were poor. He was ambitious for her, and had set his heart on her occupying a great place in the world. So the young men around, whom he had known from their infancy, were warned off by the paternal austerity, and Alice was kept as carefully secluded as the usages of Arlington society permitted.

There was something almost fierce in this love that Farmer Grey bore to his daughter. It foreboded ill for both of them. It was evident that the old man, pious as he was, had not brought his temper wholly under control. There were times when, like the Prophet Jonah, he thought he did well to be angry. He was conscientious in the performance of his own duty, and he expected a like conscientiousness on the part of all who had dealings with him. It was of no use asking mercy from Mr. Grey for any boy who robbed his orchard or any of his men who had done him wrong. Strict justice might always be had from him; no one ever had to complain that the farmer had deceived him or wronged him in any way; he was always generous in his gifts to the church and to the poor, but for wrong-doers he had no pity. More than one of his friends predicted that some day his stern, unbending spirit would lay a burden on him that would break his heart, and it was not unlikely that it would come through his daughter. That fierce love was capable of turning to hate if it should ever be thwarted. If Alice should act unworthily, should insist on following her own wishes, and they were opposed to those of her father, there would be trouble.

Alice was just twenty years old when there came to Arlington a young artist from Virginia. He was making studies of the mountains, and, being the son of an old friend and former class-mate of Farmer Grey, he was made welcome at the farm. Whether Mr. Grey was prepared for the natural result of making Stephen Vane an inmate of his house no one knew, but certain it was that his friends foresaw what was likely to take place.

It was only during the first week or two of his visit that young Vane was attentive to his art studies. It was impossible to be in association so close with Alice without learning to love her. The young artist was irresistibly drawn to her, and before he had been a month in Arlington he had won her promise to be his wife. It was more difficult to gain her father's consent, for Stephen Vane was not the man who filled his ideal of a husband for Alice. The young man's tact and eloquence, however, overcame the old man's prejudice, and at last he yielded a reluctant consent to their union, and Stephen Vane left Arlington delighted with his achievement.

In the following spring they were married, and went at once to Italy to enable the young husband to continue his art studies there.

Farmer Grey was very angry at young Vane for taking Alice abroad, and declared that he never would have permitted the marriage to take place had he known his son-in-law's plans.

The irate old man could not be pacified, and when the day of the departure came he told Alice that there was but one of two things for her to do: she could stay with her parents and let her husband go alone to Italy, or she could go with him and be disowned forever by her parents.

Her answer came instantly:
"I shall go with my husband."

Vane was surprised as well as delighted at this mark of confidence in him, and realized that his wife's gentleness was matched with equal firmness. Once in Italy they were very happy, and Alice ceased speaking of her father, though she often spoke longingly of her mother.

James Grey became more stern than ever after the departure of Alice, and never spoke of her except to denounce her undutiful conduct. His wife, however, mourned the absence of her beloved daughter, and her health gradually gave way. A year afterward she died.

James Grey promptly informed Alice of her mother's death. The answer proved to the stubborn father that Alice was not as weak as he had supposed. Her letter ran like this:

"FATHER: Your letter has almost broken my heart. Though you have disowned me and cast me off, I cannot forget that I am still your child. It does not, therefore, become me to upbraid you. If your hardness and pride have hastened my mother's death, a fearful responsibility rests upon you, and I pray that if it be so you will repent, and ask God for pardon before you die. You are now alone in the world. Of the two, who loved you, one is dead, and the other you have cast off for doing her duty in cleaving to her husband. Your imperious will has isolated you. I pity you, and would fain write words of comfort if I could. Your hard, cold heart would not receive them if I did. You have shut me out from your sympathies, and it is hopeless for me to attempt to offer consolation. We ought to have mourned our common bereavement together, but now your haughty spirit has made a wider gulf of separation between us than the sea that rolls between us. I have done no wrong. It is for you to decide when I may once more address you with filial affection.

"ALICE VANE."

"It is a hard letter," said the old man, "as he laid it down. She is my own daughter in spirit as she is in the flesh. It is quite true what she says, that my own will has separated us; but I was right. Why should she leave her father, who has lavished his love upon her since she was born, to go thousands of miles away with a man whom she has not known a year. She will be sorry for that some day. She might have left off that fellow's name. Alice Vane, indeed! Why didn't she just sign it Alice, instead of taunting me with her independence of me. Well, she has made her own bed, and she must lie upon it. She shall not have a cent of my money."

The old man sold his farm, and quitted Arlington for a little town in Massachusetts. He could not bear the old place where every object reminded him of Alice and his dead wife. His heart told him that Alice was not altogether wrong in her surmise about his wife. He had never been unkind to her, but he was conscious that often she had looked to him for sympathy which she did not receive. It was his nature, he said, and he could not change it. Not yet had he received into it the full measure of the spirit of Christ which is the spirit of love and self-effacement. His own will was the guide of his life, and he had not yet learned that it must be laid upon the altar and wholly surrendered before he could become a true disciple of Him who pleased not Himself. But though he had not learned this, his isolation chilled him, and he suffered deeply. The old Vermont home seemed haunted with memories that scourged him as he went through its silent rooms, and he could no longer endure it.

The years rolled on, and no word came from Alice or her husband. It seemed to the old man that they must have forgotten him.

"She used to be so gentle and loving," he said. "How can she now be so firm and unyielding? Ah! it's the old father's blood—she is holding up the mirror to me."

One day the desire to see her, and to see her children, if she had any, became uncontrollable. Even of Stephen he was getting to think more kindly. He recalled his pleasant, cheerful ways, and thought it would be good to see him around, for the old man was oppressed by his utter loneliness. But it was for his daughter that he pined. She was not a Christian, but she had always been loving and dutiful until she married, and he longed for her with a heart-breaking longing.

"I will write to Stephen Vane's New York friends," he exclaimed, "and the moment I get their address I will go over to Italy and find them."

The hard old heart was softened at last, and the iron will was bended. He was thoroughly humbled. Time had done what death had failed to do.

Presently an answer came to his letter. Stephen Vane, it said, had given up art long ago, because he had partially lost his mind. He was now living in Virginia with his family, and it was generally believed that they were in straitened circumstances.

James Grey was jubilant. Alice and her family in Virginia! He would go to them at once. If they were needy, it made a welcome to him all the more certain. He could help them.

Three days later he rapped at Alice's door. He could scarcely breathe for excitement. It was nineteen years that very day since he sent her away with hard and bitter words, almost equivalent to his curse ringing in her ears.

She opened the door herself.

"Alice, it's your wicked, but humble old father. Will—you will you kiss me and forgive me?"

A moment later they were weeping in each other's arms.

THE FAITHFUL RECHABITES.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 17, Jer. 35: 12-19. Golden Text, ver. 14. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Drunkenness an Ancient Vice—Probably Antediluvian—Common in the Prophetic Era—Early Abstainers—How Strong Drink is Regarded in the Bible—Its Antagonism to the Spirit—The Trial of the Rechabites—A Higher Motive—Abstinence for the Sake of Others.

THE history of the Rechabites, no less than that of Daniel and his fellow-students in Babylon, has been of almost world-wide use as an example of abstinence for conscience' sake. Drunkenness has existed in almost all ages of the world; certainly since the time of Noah (Gen. 10: 20, 21). It is hardly likely that Noah was the first man who ever came under the power of alcohol, although it would be a real comfort to think that his intoxication was in ignorance of the effect of wine. If in the early ages before the flood every imagination of the thoughts of the heart of man was only evil continually (Gen. 6: 5), it is more than likely that intoxication was among these early developments of sin. In the later history of Israel drunkenness is frequently mentioned: "Woe to the crown of pride, the drunkards of Ephraim . . . shall be trodden under foot. . . . They also have erred through wine, and THROUGH STRONG DRINK ARE OUT OF THE WAY; the priest and the prophet have erred through strong drink, they are swallowed up of wine, they are out of the way through strong drink; they err in vision, they stumble in judgment" (Isa. 28: 1, 3, 7). "Woe unto them that rise up early in the morning, that they may follow strong drink; that continue until night, till wine inflame them! Woe unto them that are mighty to drink wine, and men of strength to mingle strong drink" (Isa. 5: 11, 22). Habakkuk speaks of the man who "transgresseth by wine, . . . neither keepeth at home, who enlargeth his desire as hell, and is as death, and cannot be satisfied;" and he it is who says in the word of the Lord, "Woe unto him that giveth his neighbor drink" (Hab. 2: 5-15). If these were all the passages which could be found in Scripture to prove that drunkenness was recognized as a shameful sin between two and three thousand years ago, surely they bear testimony enough.

But God has had His witnesses in all ages, not only against drunkenness, but also against the simple use of intoxicating liquors. First His own priests, to whom this command was given, "Do not drink wine nor strong drink, thou, nor thy sons with thee, when ye go into the tabernacle of the congregation, lest ye die: it shall be throughout your generations: and that ye may put difference between holy and unholy, and between unclean and clean; and that ye may teach the children of Israel all the statutes which the Lord hath spoken unto them by the hand of Moses" (Lev. 10: 9-11). God counted such as were in the habit of using intoxicating drinks unfit to be teachers of His people. He would have them free from all other influence to be subject to His influence alone, sensitive to the Spirit only. In the vision of Ezekiel this is repeated, "Neither shall any priest drink wine when they enter into the inner court, . . . and they shall teach My people the difference between the holy and profane, and cause them to discern between the unclean and the clean" (Ezek. 44: 21, 23).

All through the Word of God we see that strong drink is regarded as being opposed to the Spirit of God. Before the birth of Samson, Israel's deliverer, the angel who foretold his birth to Manoah's wife said to her, "Behold, thou shalt conceive, and bear a son; and now drink no wine nor strong drink, neither eat any unclean thing: for the child shall be a Nazarite to God from the womb to the day of his death" (Judges 13: 7). Whenever God made use of the fallible Samson, the Spirit of God came upon him, who could not have used him had he been in any degree under another influence. His supernatural strength was no stimulus to already strong natural muscles; it was the might of God coming by His Spirit into the weakness of man. Again, in the case of John the Baptist, who was not only to be used by the Spirit, but filled with the Spirit, this was God's direction: "He shall be great in the sight of the Lord, and shall drink neither wine nor strong drink: and he shall be filled with the Holy Ghost, even from his mother's womb." In these cases no asceticism is enjoined, nothing wholesome or natural in the way of food is forbidden, but only this unnatural thing which men have made, and which brings into bondage those who use it. In Eph. 5: 18 Paul says: "And be not drunk with wine wherein is excess, but be filled with the Spirit." As much as to say, "Let no foreign power take possession of you in any degree, for ye are not your own, but let the Spirit of God possess you as wine does the drunkard. He yields to a usurper; yield ye to your rightful Owner, and let Him lift you out of and above yourselves into Christ; from the earthly to the heavenly, from things seen and temporal to things unseen and eternal."

Again, at the time of the kingdom and of the captivity, God had His witnesses. Just when His people were under judgment which had been again and again foretold, which God had delayed in mercy again and again, until "there was no remedy" (II Chron. 36: 16). He lovingly raised up witnesses to His truth. Of these, and foremost among them, were Daniel and his three companions, who would not defile themselves with the king's meat nor with the wine which he drank (Dan. 1: 8). From the account given us in the Book of Esther, of Ahasuerus's feast, and again in the Book of Daniel, of Belshazzar's feast, we can see how drunkenness had become a usual accompaniment to such festivities. And thus the testimony of these young people in Babylon was the more needful and precious, while they perhaps had little idea of how much God might use it, at that time or afterward. Then in the time of the later kings of Judah, when God had been sending prophets who had spoken the Word of the Lord faithfully, it was especially precious that the family of the Rechabites should stand out as witnesses against the use of strong drink, and be, as such, held up as an example by God Himself to His people.

God, by a simple stratagem, brought prominently into view before all Judah the faithful boldness of these descendants of Moses' father-in-law, Hobab or Rechab. He directed Jeremiah to bring their leaders into the house of the Lord, and to give them wine to drink. There might have seemed to these men, had they reasoned the matter over, something quite exceptional in this invitation of Jeremiah. He was a man of such known piety, and he seemed to do it as a kind of religious ceremony, "in the house of the Lord, in one of the chambers." Yet these old sons of temperance were not to be moved.

"WE WILL DRINK NO WINE,"

was their answer, and this was in obedience to Jonadab, the son of Rechab, who lived in the time of Jehu, king of Israel (II Kings 10: 15), two centuries and a half previously. Oh, how many have failed to come to the help of the Lord in this matter, because they thought it would be expected of them to drink wine! Some good person whom they respect has offered it; it would seem like such a reflection on him if they refused! But such considerations did not hinder the Rechabites; their principle of obedience to their father was far stronger than any thought of what Jeremiah or any other man might expect from them. The faithfulness of the family of Rechab gave joy to the heart of God, and He said, "Jonadab, the son of Rechab, shall not want a man to stand before me forever."

A HIGHER MOTIVE.

But we in the present day have a far stronger claim upon us for total abstinence from intoxicants than anything which these men of old could have had. Our bodies are the temples of the Holy Ghost; can we put them consciously under any power which shall in the least degree master them, other than the power of the living God? Shall we let anything take the place of the Holy Ghost, any stimulant, any narcotic? Again, in Christ we are bound to all humanity; He has died for all, and we cannot ignore the tie which binds us to our fellow-creatures redeemed equally with us. "None of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself" (Rom. 14: 7). All we do tells more or less on all with whom we come in contact. You may not be consciously affected personally by a little stimulant which you take, but some one, strengthened by your example, may fall a fearful victim to the power of drink, and through your thoughtless example be lost, soul and body; are you guiltless? Paul gives us a good rule on this head: "It is good neither to eat flesh nor to drink wine, nor anything whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak;" (Rom. 14: 21). If Jesus loved us so that He was made sin for us (II Cor. 5: 21), so that God "made Him to be sick" for us (Isa. 53: 10, Rev. Ver.), we ought also to love one another (I John 4: 11) enough to be made, by His love to us, and His love to others, abstainers for their sakes and for His.

But, setting aside all idea of duty, is it not our precious privilege to be of one mind with God in this matter? Practically, we cannot go out to seek and save that which was lost, in the name of our beloved Master, if we do not abstain from that which so largely conduces to their ruin. We are (His Word being witness) unfit to be teachers if we drink wine. We are letting something else take the place which He has designed for His Spirit, and are leaning, physically, on a seeming power which is not of Him. Let us not be ashamed to take our place with the faithful Rechabites, and say, under all circumstances and in spite of all temptations, "We will drink no wine." *

"ALL, ALL FOR THEE!"

"All, all for Thee!" Dear Saviour, may this watch-word
Be Thine own keynote for my life this year;
So sweetly harmonizing thought and action,
That none who listen shall a discord hear!

"All, all for Thee!" Oh, take me now entirely!
Re-tune each note with Thine own gentle hand;
I give myself afresh into Thy keeping,
To do or suffer, as Thou shalt command.

I give my heart, I long to love Thee better
Than ever I have done in years before,
That all I do may be a "joy, not duty;"
Lord Jesus, grant it—may I love thee more!

I give my will—oh, Master, do receive it!
It must rebel in any care but Thine;
I cannot keep it, it is so self-pleasing;
What rest to think it is no longer mine!

"All, all for Thee!" myself in all my weakness, Unfit, alone, the feeblest chord to raise;
An instrument discordant, worn, and worthless,
But ready to be used to sound Thy praise.

O Master, by Thine own most Holy Spirit,
Send heavenly music o'er the earth through me!
So true, so beautiful, so soul-refreshing,
That those who hear it may learn more of Thee.

Of Thee, their Saviour, who for them didst suffer;
Of Thee, their Friend, who lovest them so well;
Of Thee, their King, who soon will be returning;
Lord, may Thine anthems through my whole life swell!

104 Sermons of

Rev. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D.D.

Bound in one volume, Crown 8vo, Cloth, for $1.50.

These are among the best sermons Dr. Talmage has ever delivered. Each one has been revised by him for publication in this volume.

The Christian Age, London, says: "We believe that for originality, power, and splendor, these sermons will bear comparison with the greatest pulpit productions of any age or country. But for knowledge of human life and the adaptation of Divine truth to the whole being of man—intellectual, emotional, moral, practical—and for the power of applying that truth, we know not his equal."

Spurgeon says: "Mr. Talmage's discourses lay hold of my inmost soul. The Lord is with this mighty man of valor. So may he ever be till the campaign closes with victory! I am indeed glad of his voice. It cheers me intensely. He loves the Gospel, and believes in something, which some preachers hardly do. There are those about who use the old labels, but the articles are not the same. May the Lord win armies of souls to Jesus by this man! I am astonished when God blesses me, but somehow I should not be so much surprised if He blessed this man."

"With an earnestness of appeal and a power of awakening that we have never heard surpassed, Dr. Talmage preaches the old Gospel that kindled the enthusiasm of the rustic and unlettered apostles of Galilee, and at the same time elicited the zeal and influenced the heart of the cultured Pharisee of Tarsus."—London Christian World.

"These sermons I regard as among the best specimens of the simple, earnest, and pungent presentation of the solemn and precious truths of the Gospel that I have ever read, and having a fertility of illustration that is marvellous. I feel earnestly desirous that they should be in a form to preach to ministers of the Gospel, and so help them to preach to others."—Rev. E. D. G. PRIME, D.D., New York Observer.

"Mr. Talmage preaches twice every Sunday to immense audiences. Every seat up to the rafters is filled. His manner is so impassioned, his style so original, and his figures so vivid and startling, that he holds his hearers spell-bound to the end, and he moves them to tears or smiles at will."—Charleston News and Courier.

"There is apparently no hidden spring in the human heart that Dr. Talmage does not know how to reach."—Occident, San Francisco, Cal.

"We have known persons to drop the novel half finished and take up Talmage's Sermons, never to exchange truth for trash again."—Pittsburgh Methodist Recorder.

"They are brimful of vitality, intense dramatic power of description, and an earnestness of conviction in what is said that impresses the reader deeply."—New Orleans Picayune.

The Late MISS FRANCES RIDLEY HAVERGAL, the Christian Poetess—Scenes in Her Life.

FRANCES RIDLEY HAVERGAL.

Parentage and Early Training—Death of Her Mother—Visits to the Continent—Accomplishments and Ability—Her Active Habits and Love of Children—Remarkable Order of Her Writings—Death of Her Father—Miss Havergal Retires to the Mumbles—Mr. and Mrs. Sankey Visit Her—A Church Mission Tour in Ireland Proposed—Exchanged for a Flight to Her Heavenly Home—Last Hours—Funeral.

MISS HAVERGAL'S name has become a household word on both sides the Atlantic. While her works have endeared her chiefly to the religious world, the purity and melody of her writing have won for her also the admiration of many who are deaf to religious teaching, but quick to appreciate literary genius. Her prose writings have been, under God, vehicles for conveying sacred truth in such a manner that many heavily-tried ones have found in them the unravelling of what they deemed a hopeless tangle of trials. The seekers after God, also, have not been few who have discovered "the Way, the Truth, and the Life" through the same channel. Her life was so truly spiritual, that all her poetry is redolent of resignation and nearness to Christ.

This lady was born at Astley, Worcestershire, England, on the 14th of December, 1836, and died at Swansea, on June 3d, 1879, aged forty-three years. She was the youngest daughter of a man of genuine piety and great gifts. The advantages which Frances, or Fanny, as she was always called, enjoyed in her parental home bore good fruit. Poetic tastes were there cultivated, and her brilliant natural gifts were there systematized and trained so that she was able to use them with grace and power.

This was what might have been expected, for her father was acknowledged to be the first modern authority on ecclesiastical music and psalmody. His devotion to the ministry of the Gospel alone led him to refuse the Professorial Chair of Music in the University of Oxford. He was rector of Astley for thirteen years.

As a child Fanny was remarkable for her quiet, studious disposition. In toys and games she seemed to take little interest. Often she would be missed by her playfellows, who, searching for her to join with them in their amusements, would find her hidden under a table, poring over some volume from her father's library. (See illustration on first page.)

Deeply had Miss Havergal imbibed from early years the Gospel teaching of her venerated father. In days when comparatively few ministers bore a simple testimony, Canon Havergal ever fed his flock with soul-nurturing food. Little Fanny listened, and applied the teaching to herself. She was, when certainly not more than ten years old, deeply concerned about herself, and astonished her father's curate one day when he happened to be alone with her, by asking his advice. Poor man! he sadly missed his opportunity. (See illustration No. 2 on first page.)

GIRLHOOD.

Her mother died in 1848, and Fanny was sent to school, before her father's second marriage, in 1851. While there, a remarkable work of grace went through the school. Many of the older girls were converted, and one day Fanny's most intimate friend, Diana, a girl about her own age, drew her away from the other girls into a room alone, and throwing her arms about Fanny's neck told her of the joy she had found in Christ, and begged her also to give her heart to Him. (See illustration No. 3 on first page.)

Fanny accompanied her father and stepmother on a tour in Germany in 1852, spent the winter in Dusseldorf, where she attended school, and was afterward, in 1853, boarded for some time in a worthy German pastor's family at Oberwesel, on the Rhine. Seeds were sown during this sojourn which bore blessed fruit in her after life. She more than once referred to her return therefrom as a coming down from higher spiritual latitudes.

Returning home she enjoyed the elevated teaching of her father and the wise training of her stepmother, whom she loved dearly. During 1856 she travelled in Ireland, and among her reminiscences is one of her stay at Celbridge Lodge, where at her suggestion the girls from a school in the neighborhood were invited to the house, and Fanny spent the evening in playing and singing to them and in religious conversation. (See illustration No. 4 on first page.)

She remained at home at Shreshill till 1858, when she went to reside with her eldest married sister, at Oakhampton. There she remained for eight years, superintending the education of her nieces, till the last of them left for school in October, 1866, when she returned to her father's vicarage at Shreshill.

In January, 1867, she paid a second visit to the Continent with her relatives, and she has left us a characteristic poem, entitled "Traveling Thoughts," which records her deep love for her happy home. But in seeking among her many published writings for some index of no better can be found than a stanza in one of her earliest effusions, "Little Fan"—

"Now in the crowded halls of life,
May it be mine to bring
Some gentle stir of the heated air,
Some coolness falling fresh and fair,
Like a passing angel's wing."

Her musical studies and occasional verse-writing were plentifully relieved by physical exercises and games. She was a good swimmer and a graceful skater. Although not professing to draw, she could sketch fairly well. She was a good linguist, and could converse for hours with Germans with fluency and purity of accent. French she spoke easily, and she could read the New Testament in Greek.

Neither her accomplishments nor her love for physical exercises in any way detracted from her home duties. When about to return home from Oakhampton, in 1866, she thus gave an insight into her active habits of life in a letter which she wrote: "I am not afraid of not finding plenty to do; there always seems more than one has physical strength for. I can't understand how any one living on this globe can talk about 'nothing to do.'"

BEREAVEMENT.

In December, 1867, her father removed to Leamington, a pretty watering-place in Warwickshire, and there more than two years of peaceful, happy usefulness were spent. The sojourn of the family there was, however, rendered sadly memorable by the death of the beloved father. Canon Havergal suddenly died of apoplexy on Easter Sunday, 1870. The shock was a very severe one, for during the previous week he had been unusually well, and only the night before his death he had spent two hours at his harmonium, playing and singing hymns of his own composition, while the family sat intently listening.

Mrs. Havergal continued to reside at Leamington, and Fanny made her home with her stepmother, between whom and herself there was a very warm attachment. Her life there was varied by visits to friends, continental tours, and sojourns at the coast or in the country. Sometimes she would take lodgings in out-of-the-way nooks in England, far removed from the haunts of the common traveller, and rejoice in staying for a time where no mail was regularly available. In 1874 she greatly enjoyed a pedestrian excursion in Switzerland with her friends, Mr. and Mrs. Snapp and their daughter Emily, to Switzerland. She describes in her journal her ascent to the Grand Mulets on Mont Blanc, arriving at its desolate rocks in the midst of the ocean of snow. On their

DESCENT FROM MONT BLANC

Frances' delight in glissading led to imminent danger, from which Mr. Snapp's presence of mind saved her life, and also the life of one of the guides. She writes:

"They would not unrope me; when we got to Pierre a l'Echelle, I was so enjoying my glissades, and presently thought we were come to a sufficiently easy part to go carelessly, whereupon I slipped, and Payot the guide, who was next to me, totally lost himself too. Below us was a dark abyss; we both started a decidedly too rapid spin down a very steep incline to sheer precipice below, when, instantaneously, Mr. S. did the only possible thing which could have saved all four of us—flung himself right on his back with his heels in the snow, the orthodox thing to do if only any one has the presence of mind to do it. Thus he was enabled to bear the immense strain on the rope, and check our impetus; thank God, we soon recovered our footing. After this I was unroped, and had some splendid glissades alone, and we returned to Chamounix in two hours less than the regulation time."

Returning from Switzerland to England, she spent some time in her old home at Oakhampton. She at once began diligent work. Her active services had no intervals of dreamy enjoyment; but cottage visitations, and four Bible classes weekly, attended with unwearied exertions, at last culminated in crowded attendances in the servants' hall.

Every visit seemed now to open doors for usefulness, and she longed for whole households to taste with her of the goodness of the Lord. One extract must serve as a glimpse of many others. She says: "Perhaps you will be interested to know the origin of

THE CONSECRATION HYMN,

"Take my Life." I went for a little visit of five days. There were ten persons in the house, some unconverted and long prayed for, some converted but not rejoicing Christians. He gave me the prayer, 'Lord, give me all in this house!' And He just did! Before I left the house every one had got a blessing. The last night of my visit I was too happy to sleep, and passed most of the night in praise and renewal of my own consecration, and these little couplets formed themselves and chimed in my heart one after another, till they finished with, 'Ever, only, all for Thee!'

The beautiful couplet in the same hymn,

"Take my voice, and let me sing, Always, only, for my King,"

was thenceforth (from December, 1873) really carried out. She writes: "Let us sing words which we feel and love, sacrificing everything to clearness of enunciation, and looking up to meet His smile all the while we are singing; our songs will reach more hearts than those of finer voices and more brilliant execution, unaccompanied by His power."

On another occasion she wrote in a letter a description of an aristocratic party in London, which shows how she carried out her own suggestions: "I was at a large regular London party lately, and I was so happy. He seemed to give me 'the secret of His presence,' and of course I sang 'for Jesus,' and did not I have dead silence? (See illustration No. 5 on first page.) Afterward I had two really important conversations with strangers; one seemed extremely surprised at finding himself quite easily drifted from the badinage with which he started into a right-down personal talk about his personal danger and his only hope for safety; he took it very well, and thanked me. Perhaps that seed may bear fruit. Somehow it is wonderful how the Master manages for me in such cases."

BURNED MANUSCRIPT.

For some time had Miss Havergal been engaged in preparing for press some sheets of manuscript music in connection with the "Appendix" to "Songs of Grace and Glory," which were previously published. "Well do I remember the day," says her sister, "when it was completed. We were at home, and she came down from her study with a large roll for post, and with holiday glee exclaimed, 'There, it is all done! and now I am free to write a book!' Only a week passed, when news arrived that the printer's premises were burned down and the whole of the stereotypes of the musical edition were destroyed." (The artist who prepared the first page picture states that the panel No. 6 represents the fire.) Respecting this unforeseen disaster, Miss Havergal heroically said: "Of most of the new work, which has cost me the winter's labor, I have not even a memorandum left, having sent everything to the printers. However, it is so clearly 'Himself that hath done it,' that I can only say 'Thy way, not mine, O Lord.'"

CONSECRATED JEWELS.

On May 26th, 1878, Miss Havergal's life was again saddened by bereavement. Her beloved stepmother, who had for some months been a patient sufferer, peacefully breathed her last. Miss Havergal and her unmarried sister decided on breaking up the Leamington establishment and seeking a smaller home. By August the business was completed, and they were ready to leave the home endeared by many associations. Before finally quitting the place, however, Miss Havergal made another consecration. She says in a letter to a friend: "The Lord has shown me another little step, and of course I have taken it with extreme delight. 'Take my silver and my gold' now means shipping off all my ornaments (including a jewel cabinet which is really fit for a countess) to the Church Missionary House, where they will be accepted and disposed of for me. I retain only a brooch or two for daily wear, which are memorials of my dear parents; also a locket with the only portrait I have of my niece in heaven, my Evelyn; and her 'two rings,' mentioned in 'Under the Surface.' But these I redeem, so that the whole value goes to the Church Missionary Society. I had no idea I had such a jeweller's shop; nearly fifty articles are being packed off. I never packed a box with such pleasure." (See panel No. 7 on first page.)

IN WALES.

By October, 1878, the two sisters were comfortably settled at the Mumbles, near Swansea. There, amid her literary work, intent to win souls, Frances began a Bible reading, organized a juvenile "Temperance Regiment," and made the acquaintance of the villagers in their cottage homes. Then the men also wanted to be spoken to by her at the corner of the village. The spirit was willing, and her enthusiasm led her to undertake more than her fragile frame was equal to. One delightful reminiscence of her residence there, which she often recurred to, was that visited her at The Mumbles, and joined in some part-singing with her and a friend, and heard her sing several of her own sweet effective songs. Her last words to Mr. Sankey, just before his leaving, were, "What a glorious day it will be when we all get home! What a time of joy we shall have, after seeing the King, to see our loved ones, and our Heavenly Father's children—so many of those whom we could never see on earth! We shall enjoy so much seeing them there."

It had been arranged that she should visit the Irish Church Mission stations, and she was to start on the journey with her nephews in June, 1879. She thus wrote to a friend on May 5th: "My Irish tour begins (D.V.) June 4th or 5th. I told Mr. Fitzpatrick, the Secretary, any sort of cottage or farm accommodation would do for me, I didn't mind roughing; but my first invitation is a most kind letter from the Bishop of Cashel. So I begin by staying in a 'palace' instead of a cottage, which wasn't at all my view. But I tell Mr. F. I must see the hedge and ditch work, for the sake of the Society."

A BETTER JOURNEY.

That tour, however, was never performed. Before setting out Miss Havergal proposed holding a farewell meeting for the sailors and village boys, who almost idolized her. The meeting was held May 21st, 1879. It took place on the village bank. Though the day was cold and damp, she went, taking her Bible and temperance pledge book with her. "While standing a long time on the cold spot, heavy clouds came up from the Channel, and she returned home wet and chilly with the rain and mist. She took a severe cold, but the next day insisted on going out again to pay farewell visits to her poor friends. She was very tired, and took a donkey home. As she passed through the village of Newton, quite a procession gathered round her, her regiment of boys eagerly following. (See panel No. 8.) The cold she had caught kept her confined to her room for several days, and finally symptoms of pneumonia appeared.

On the 2d of June the Rev. S. C. Morgan, Vicar of Swansea, saw she was evidently dying, and said to her, "He is with you now?" Her face lighted up as she answered, "Of course He is!" To the doctor she said: "I shall go just when Jesus likes;" to one of her sisters: "Not one thing hath failed" (Joshua 23: 14). She lingered until after midnight, suffering, much but patiently. Shortly before death the pain left her, and she tried to sing. She had scarcely uttered a note when her voice ceased. Her brother and sister, who were watching her, saw her face change, and in a moment and without a struggle she was gone.

"So she took

The one grand step, beyond the stars of God,
Into the splendor, shadowless and broad,
Into the everlasting joy and light.
The zenith of the earthly life was come.

What then? Eye hath not seen, ear hath not heard!
Wait till thou too hast fought the noble strife,
And won, through Jesus Christ, the crown of life!
Then shalt thou know the glory of the word,
Then as the stars forever, ever shine,
Beneath the king's own smile, perpetual zenith thine!"

The reader of her poems will find in them the best key of her life. Emphatically she was one of GOD'S OWN POETS.

And as she wrote and sang others read and heard more and more perfectly the melody of the growing life of consecrated service. Her poems clearly indicate this progressive advance.

How fitting the progression! Her first volume one of ministry—"The Ministry of Song;" her second one of consecration—"Under the Surface;" the third, in purpose at least—"Praise"—praise begun on earth and perfected in heaven.

Miss Havergal's was unconscious genius. She says, when writing to a friend, "I have not the least bit of imagination, and can only copy bits out of my own inner life pictures. I hardly ever wrote a line which I had not somehow lived. . . . You speak of 'art,' but I don't remember ever aiming at it or taking it into consideration in any piece; it is all a sort of chance how it comes out, for I write merely just as the ideas come to me, with only a sort of shake of the kaleidoscope to bring them into something approaching shape."

Her funeral took place June 9th in her native village, in the burial-ground surrounding the church where her father had preached for many years, and within sight of the rectory where she was born. There had been heavy storms all day, but as the service ended, the sunshine came, and a chorus of birds burst forth—emblematic of her bright and glorious entrance into that mansion prepared for her, where sorrow and sighing, which she labored here to mitigate, can never come.

MR. STANLEY P. SMITH IN CHINA.

THE young Cambridge graduate whose portrait appeared in this journal on April 9th, 1885, and who, as our readers will remember, abandoned a brilliant career in England to go as a missionary to China, writes home in good spirits. In a letter dated Ping-Yang-Pi, Shan-Si, North China, September 18th, 1885, he says:

"Here I am all alone (and yet not alone) for two weeks or so. Mr. Beauchamp and Mr. Casels have gone to a new station opened at Sih-chau, about seventy miles north; Mr. Hoste has been at a place forty miles south, with Mr. Key, for the last six weeks or more. I have been with him three weeks on a visit, and am now back here again, surrounded by the dear Chinese. You would love this people. They have backbone and a heart. Of course it is capital for learning the language. Mr. Studd and the two Polhill Turners are en route here. I should not wonder if we settle down in this province, as there are great openings. But some of us have eyes on Ho-nan, that poor province without a settled station (one, I believe, has just been opened) and fifteen million souls.

"I do so rejoice that God gave Mr. Radcliffe to reiterate the message that America and England and Scotland are asleep about the heathen. How dreadful if, as with the apostles in Gethsemane, who might have had the privilege of watching with Jesus one hour, the Master, who has so often asked the Church 'Why sleep ye?' should mournfully have to say, 'Sleep on now; behold, I am betrayed!' Praise God, the natives are being raised up. We have a well-to-do farmer and two scholars giving all their time and energies to the spreading of the Gospel—Messrs. Fau, Hsi, and Chü. In Shan-tung the Baptists have around one city fifty-five churches, all self-supporting, last year baptizing three hundred and sixty converts.

"I hear the Gospel is getting into the palace. Princess Kung has thrown away her idols, and, in company with fifteen others, worships God through Jesus. One outcome of the Peking meeting we held is that the missionaries there, to the number of twenty to thirty, including their wives, have signed a circular, which they are sending to all the missionaries in China, asking them to unite daily in praying for an outpouring of the Spirit on themselves and China.

"While I was at Chin-wa there was a great gathering in honor of the 'T'sai-Shen,' the 'Wealth-God.' Every shop in China pretty well has an altar to him. All the main street was done up with bunting, etc. We managed to sell six to seven hundred Gospels and books in the two days. Just before I left two men determined to come to (li-pai) worship. Mr. Hoste and Mr. Key have only been there about six weeks, so the work is beginning. 'Who shall let it?' This is a place for fierce conflicts."

GOSPEL WORK IN BERLIN.

MR. F. VON SCHLUEMBACH, the Y. M. C. A. evangelist, who is well known in New York, has taken up his work again in Berlin. A few years ago, for a short time in the Northern districts (the headquarters of the social democrats), the results were simply marvellous, and are still felt. One of the worst dancing saloons was bought and converted into a mission hall. Those who had been blessed through Mr. Von Schluembach's efforts here found a place of meeting, and it is a joy to see the work flourishing in all its different branches. There are now in attendance eight hundred Sunday-school children; two hundred mothers gather together for mutual Bible study one afternoon in the week; well-attended meetings for men, young men, and young women are also held. A Sunday morning breakfast provided for the homeless has already proved a blessing to many. The general tone of the neighborhood has greatly improved.

May we not expect the same, and even greater results, among the laboring classes in the East End, where Mr. Von Schluembach is now hard at work. The prospects are already very promising, the meetings being crowded to overflowing evening after evening. Evangelistic labor is all the more required here, there being only one church to meet the needs of over a hundred thousand souls. This is unfortunately no solitary exception in Berlin.

While Mr. Von Schluembach's evenings are thus devoted to the poor, other classes are not overlooked. In the daytime Bible-meetings are held in the homes of the wealthy, and public Bible-readings in the business part of the city. His presence at the recently established noon-day prayer-meeting adds greatly to its growth. He also lends a helping hand wherever required to the Y. M. C. A., which he was the means of organizing three years ago. Mr. Von Schluembach intends continuing his work in Berlin until the middle of April.

THE CHOICE OF A WIFE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, January 10, 1886.

"Is there never a woman among the daughters of thy brethren, or among all my people, that thou goest to take a wife of the uncircumcised Philistines?"—JUDGES 14 : 3.

Samson's Perversity—Inexcusable in Judaea—Modern Philistines—The World Opulent in Good Women—No Need to Marry a Fool—Marriage Not for All—Pray Before Choosing—Famous Men Who Have Blundered—Avoid Artificial Women—And Coquettes—Eminent Sufferers—Noble Wives—Avoid Matchmakers—Solomon's Miseries—Avoid Scoffers—Two Essential Qualities—The Benediction of Beauty—The Good Wife in Adversity—In Death.

SAMSON, the giant, is here asking consent of his father and mother to marriage with one whom they thought unfit for him. He was wise in asking their counsel, but not wise in rejecting it. Captivated with her looks, the big son wanted to marry a daughter of one of the hostile families, a deceitful, hypocritical, whining, and saturnine creature, who afterward made for him a world of trouble till she quit him forever. In my text his parents forbade the banns, practically saying: "When there are so many honest and beautiful maidens of your own country, are you so hard put to for a lifetime partner that you propose conjugality with this foreign flirt? Is there such a dearth of lilies in our Israelitish gardens that you must wear on your heart a Philistine thistle? Do you take a crabapple because there are no pomegranates? Is there never a woman among the daughters of thy brethren, or among all my people, that thou goest to take a wife of the uncircumcised Philistines?"

BEAUTIFUL JEWESSES.

Excuseless was he for such a choice in a land and amid a race celebrated for female loveliness and moral worth, a land and a race of which self-denying Abigail, and heroic Deborah, and dazzling Miriam, and pious Esther, and glorious Ruth, and Mary, who hugged to her heart the blessed Lord, were only magnificent specimens. The midnight folded in their hair, the lakes of liquid beauty in their eye, the gracefulness of spring morning in their posture and gait, were only typical of the greater brilliance and glory of their soul. Likewise excuseless is any man in our time who makes lifelong alliance with any one who, because of her disposition, or heredity, or habits, or intellectual vanity, or moral twistification, may be said to be of the Philistines.

MODERN FEMALE LOVELINESS.

The world never owned such opulence of womanly character or such splendor of womanly manners or multitudinous instances of wifely, motherly, daughterly, sisterly devotion, as it owns to-day. I have not words to express my admiration for good womanhood. Woman is not only man's equal, but in affectional and religious nature, which is the best part of us, she is seventy-five per cent his superior. Yea, during the last twenty years, through the increased opportunity opened for female education, the women of the country are better educated than the majority of men; and if they continue to advance in mentality at the present ratio, before long the majority of men will have difficulty in finding in the opposite sex enough ignorance to make appropriate consort. If I am under a delusion as to the abundance of good womanhood abroad, consequent upon my surroundings since the hour I entered this life until now, I hope the delusion will last until I embark from this planet. So you will understand, if I say in this course of sermons something that seems severe, I am neither cynical nor disgruntled.

NO NEED TO MARRY A FOOL.

There are in almost every farmhouse in the country, in almost every home of the great town, conscientious women, worshipful women, self-sacrificing women, holy women, innumerable Marys, sitting at the feet of Christ; innumerable mothers, helping to feed Christ in the person of His suffering disciples; a thousand capped and spectacled grandmothers Lois, bending over Bibles whose precepts they have followed from early girlhood; and tens of thousands of young women that are dawning upon us from school and seminary, that are going to bless the world with good and happy homes, that shall eclipse all their predecessors, a fact that will be acknowledged by all men except those who are struck through with moral decay from toe to cranium; and more inexcusable than the Samson of the text is that man who, amid all this unparalleled munificence of womanhood, marries a fool. But some of you are abroad suffering from such disaster, and to halt others of you from going over the same precipice, I cry out in the words of my text: "Is there never a woman among the daughters of thy brethren, or among all my people, that thou goest to take a wife of the uncircumcised Philistines?"

MARRIAGE NOT FOR ALL.

That marriage is the destination of the human race is a mistake that I want to correct before I go further. There are multitudes who never will marry, and still greater multitudes who are not fit to marry. In Great Britain to-day there are nine hundred and forty-eight thousand more women than men, and that, I understand, is about the ratio in America. By mathematical and inexorable law, you see, millions of women will never marry. The supply for matrimony greater than the demand, the first lesson of which is that every woman ought to prepare to take care of herself if need be. Then there are thousands of men who have no right to marry, because they have become so corrupt of character that their offer of marriage is an insult to any good woman. Society will have to be toned up and corrected on this subject, so that it shall realize that if a woman who has sacrificed her honor is unfitted for marriage, so is any man who has ever sacrificed his purity. What right have you, O masculine beast! whose life has been loose, to take under your care the spotlessness of a virgin reared in the sanctity of a respectable home? Will a buzzard dare to court a dove?

THE FIRST STEP.

But the majority of you will marry, and have a right to marry, and as your religious teacher I wish to say to these men, in the choice of a wife first of all seek divine direction. About thirty-five years ago, when Martin Farquhar Tupper, the English poet, urged men to prayer before they decided upon matrimonial association, people laughed. And some of them have lived to laugh on the other side of their mouth.

EMINENT BLUNDERERS.

The need of divine direction I argue from the fact that so many men, and some of them strong and wise, have wrecked their lives at this juncture. Witness Samson and this woman of Timnath! Witness Socrates, pecked of the historical Xantippe! Witness Job, whose wife had nothing to prescribe for his carbuncles but allopathic doses of profanity! Witness Ananias, a liar, who might perhaps have been cured by a truthful spouse, yet marrying as great a liar as himself—Sapphira! Witness John Wesley, one of the best men that ever lived, united to one of the most outrageous and scandalous of women, who sat in City Road Chapel, making mouths at him while he preached! Witness the once conubial wretchedness of John Ruskin, the great art essayist, and Frederick W. Robertson, the great preacher! Witness a thousand kindled by unworthy wives, termagants that scold like a March north-easter; female spend-thrifts, that put their husbands into fraudulent schemes to get money enough to meet the lavishness of domestic expenditure; opium-using women—about four hundred thousand of them in the United States—who will have the drug, though it should cause the eternal damnation of the whole household; heartless and overbearing, and namby-pamby and unreasonable women, yet married—married perhaps to good men!

These are the women who build the low club-houses, where the husbands and sons go because they can't stand it at home. On this sea of matrimony, where so many have wrecked, am I not right in advising divine pilotage?

NUMEROUS PITFALLS.

Especially is devout supplication needed, because of the fact that society is so full of artificialities that men are deceived as to whom they are marrying, and no one but the Lord knows. After the dressmaker, and the milliner, and the jeweller, and the hair-adjuster, and the dancing-master, and the cosmetic art have completed their work, how is an unsophisticated man to decipher the physiological hieroglyphics, and make accurate judgment of who it is to whom he offers hand and heart? That is what makes so many recreant husbands. They make an honorable marriage contract, but the goods delivered are so different from the sample by which they bargained. They were simply swindled, and they backed out. They mistook Jezebel for Longfellow's Evangeline, and Lucretia Borgia for Martha Washington.

Aye, as the Indian chief boasts of the scapce he has taken, so there are in society to-day many coquettes who boast of the masculine hearts they have captured. And these women, though they may live amid richest upholstery, are not so honorable as the cyprians of the street, for these advertise their infamy, while the former profess heaven while they mean hell.

There is so much counterfeit womanhood abroad it is no wonder that some cannot tell the genuine coin from the base. Do you not realize you need divine guidance when I remind you that mistake is possible in this important affair, and, if made, is irrevocable?

A MISTAKE IRREPARABLE.

The worst predicament possible is to be unhappily yoked together. You see it is impossible to break the yoke. The more you pull apart, the more galling the yoke. The minister might bring you up again, and in your presence read the marriage ceremony backward, might put you on the opposite sides of the altar from where you were when you were united, might take the ring off of the finger, might rend the wedding-veil asunder, might tear out the marriage leaf from the family Bible record, but all that would fail to unmarry you. It is better not to make the mistake than to attempt its correction. But men and women do not reveal all their characteristics till after marriage, and how are you to avoid committing the fatal blunder? There is only one Being in the universe who can tell you whom to choose, and that is the Lord of Paradise. He made Eve for Adam, and Adam for Eve, and both for each other. Adam had not a large group of women from whom to select his wife, but it is fortunate, judging from some mistakes which she afterward made, that it was Eve or nothing.

There is in all the world some one who was made for you, as certainly as Eve was made for Adam. All sorts of mistakes occur because Eve was made out of a rib from Adam's side. Nobody knows which of his twenty-four ribs was taken for the nucleus. If you depend entirely upon yourself in the selection of a wife, there are twenty-three possibilities to one that you will select the wrong rib. By the fate of Ahab, whose wife induced him to steal; by the fate of Macbeth, whose wife pushed him into massacre; by the fate of James Ferguson, the philosopher, whose wife entered the room while he was lecturing and wilfully upset his astronomical apparatus, so that he turned to the audience and said, "Ladies and gentlemen, I have the misfortune to be married to this woman;" by the fate of Bulwer, the novelist, whose wife's temper was so incompatible that he furnished her a beautiful house near London and withdrew from her company, leaving her with the dozen dogs whom she entertained as pets; by the fate of John Milton, who married a termagant after he was blind, and when some one called her a rose, the poet said: "I am no judge of flowers, but it may be so, for I feel the thorns daily;" by the fate of an Englishman whose wife was so determined to dance on his grave that he was buried in the sea; by the fate of a village minister whom I knew, whose wife threw a cup of hot tea across the table because they differed in sentiment—by all these scenes of disquietude and domestic calamity, we implore you to be cautious and prayerful before you enter upon the connubial state, which decides whether a man shall have two heavens or two hells, a heaven here and heaven forever, or a hell now and a hell hereafter.

NOBLE WIVES.

By the bliss of Pliny, whose wife, when her husband was pleading in court, had messengers coming and going to inform her what impression he was making; by the joy of Grotius, whose wife delivered him from prison under the pretence of having books carried out lest they be injurious to his health, she sending out her husband unobserved in one of the bookcases; by the good fortune of Roland, in Louis' time, whose wife translated and composed for her husband, while Secretary of the Interior—talented, heroic, wonderful Madame Roland; by the happiness of many a man who has made intelligent choice of one capable of being prime counsellor and companion in brightness and in grief—pray to Almighty God, morning, noon, and night that at the right time and in the right way He will send you a good, honest, loving, sympathetic wife; or if she is not sent to you, that you may be sent to her.

AVOID MATCHMAKERS.

At this point let me warn you not to let a question of this importance be settled by the celebrated matchmakers flourishing in almost every community. Depend upon your own judgment divinely illumined. These brokers in matrimony are ever planning how they can unite impecunious innocence to an heiress, or celibate woman to millionaire or marquis, and that in many cases makes life an unhappiness. How can any human being, who knows neither of the two parties as God knows them, and who is ignorant of the future, give such direction as you require at such a crisis?

Take the advice of the earthly matchmaker instead of the divine guidance, and you may some day be led to use the words of Solomon, whose experience in home life was as melancholy as it was multitudinous. One day his palace with its great wide rooms and great wide doors and great wide hall was too small for him and the loud tongue of a woman belaboring him about some of his neglects, and he retreated to the housetop to get relief from the lingual bombardment. And while there he saw a poor man on one corner of the roof with a mattress for his only furniture, and the open sky his only covering. And Solomon envies him and cries out: "It is better to dwell in the corner of the housetop than with a brawling woman in a wide house." And one day during the rainy season the water leaked through the roof of the palace and began to drop in a pail or pan set there to catch it. And at one side of him all day long the water went drop! drop! drop! while on the other side a female companion quarrelling about this, and quarrelling about that, the acrimonious and petulant words falling on his ear in ceaseless pelting—drop! drop! drop! and he seized his pen and wrote: "A continual dropping in a very rainy day and a contentious woman are alike." If Solomon had been as prayerful at the beginning of his life as he was at the close, how much domestic infelicity he would have avoided!

But prayer about this will amount to nothing unless you pray soon enough. Wait until you are fascinated and the equilibrium of your soul is disturbed by a magnetic and exquisite presence, and then you will answer your own prayers, and you will mistake your own infatuation for the voice of God.

AVOID SCOFFERS.

If you have this prayerful spirit you will surely avoid all female scoffers at the Christian religion; and there are quite a number of them in all communities. It must be told that, though the only influence that keeps woman from being estimated and treated as a slave—aye, as a brute and a beast of burden—is Christianity, since where it is not dominant she is so treated, yet there are women who will so far forget themselves and forget their God that they will go and hear lecturers malign Christianity and scoff at the most sacred things of the soul. A good woman, over-persuaded by her husband, may go once to hear such a tirade against the Christian religion, not fully knowing what she is going to hear; but she will not go twice.

A woman, not a Christian, but a respecter of religion, said to me: "I was persuaded by my husband to go and hear an infidel lecturer once, but going home, I said to him: 'My dear husband, I would not go again though my declination should result in our divorcement forever.'" And the woman was right. If after all that Christ and Christianity have done for a woman, she can go again and again to hear such assaults, she is an awful creature, and you had better not come near such a reeking leprosy. She needs to be washed, and for three weeks to be soaked in carbolic acid, and for a whole year fumigated, before she is fit for decent society. While it is not demanded that a woman be a Christian before marriage, she must have regard for the Christian religion or she is a bad woman and unworthy of being your companion in a life charged with such stupendous solemnity and vicissitudes.

TWO ESSENTIAL QUALITIES.

What you want, O man! in a wife, is not a butterfly of the sunshine, not a giggling non-entity, not a painted doll, not a gossiping gad-about, not a mixture of artificialities which leave you in doubt as to where the humbug ends and the woman begins, but an earnest soul, one that cannot only laugh when you laugh, but weep when you weep. There will be wide, deep graves in your path of life, and you will both want steady when you come to the verge of them, I tell you! When your fortune fails you will want some one to talk of treasures in heaven, and not charge upon you with a bitter, "I told you so." As far as I can analyze it, sincerity and earnestness are the foundation of all worthy wifehood. Get that, and you get all. Fail to get that, and you get nothing but what you will wish you never had got.

BEAUTY A BENEDICTION.

Don't make the mistake that the man of the text made in letting his eye settle the question in which coolest judgment directed by divine wisdom are all-important. He who has no reason for his wisely choice except a pretty face is like a man who should buy a farm because of the dahlias in the front dooryard. Beauty is a talent, and when God gives it He intends it as a benediction upon a woman's face. When the good Princess of Wales dismounted from the railtrain last summer, and I saw her radiant face, I could understand what they told me the day before, that, when at the great military hospital where are now the wounded and the sick from the Egyptian and other wars, the Princess passed through, all the sick were cheered at her coming, and those who could be roused neither by doctor nor nurse from their stupor, would get up on their elbows to look at her, and wan and wasted lips prayed an audible prayer: "God bless the Princess of Wales! Doesn't she look beautiful?"

But how uncertain is the tarrying of beauty in a human countenance! Explosion of a kerosene lamp turns it into scarification, and a scoundrel with one dash of vitriol may dispel it, or Time will drive his chariot wheels across that bright face, cutting it up in deep ruts and gullies. But there is an eternal beauty on the face of some women, whom a rough and ungallant world may criticise as homely; and though their features may contradict all the laws of Lavater on physiognomy, yet they have graces of soul that will keep them attractive for time and glorious through all eternity.

There are two or three circumstances in which the plainest wife is a queen of beauty, to her husband, whatever her stature or profile. By financial panic or betrayal of business partner, the man goes down, and returning to his home that evening he says: "I am ruined; I am in disgrace forever; I care not whether I live or die." It is an agitated story he is telling in the household that winter night. He says: "The furniture must go, the house must go, the social position must go," and from being sought for obsequiously they must be cold-shouldered everywhere. After he ceases talking, and the wife has heard all in silence, she says: "Is that all? Why, you had nothing when I married you, and you have only come back to where you started. If you think that my happiness and that of the children depend on these trappings, you do not know me, though we have lived together thirty years. God is not dead, and the National Bank of Heaven has not suspended payment, and if you don't mind, I don't care a cent. What little we need of food and raiment the rest of our lives we can get, and I don't propose to sit down and mope and groan. Mary, hand me that darning-needle. I declare! I have forgotten to set the rising for those cakes! And while she is busy at it he hears her humming Newton's old hymn, "To-Morrow:"

"It can bring with it nothing
But He will bear us through;
Who gives the lilies clothing
Will clothe His people too;
Beneath the spreading heavens
No creature but is fed;
And He who feeds the ravens
Will give His children bread.

"Though vine nor fig-tree either Their wonted fruit should bear,
Though all the fields should wither
Nor flocks nor herds be there;
Yet God the same abiding,
His praise shall tune my voice;
For while in Him confiding
I cannot but rejoice."

The husband looks up in amazement, and says: "Well, well, you are the greatest woman, I ever saw. I thought you would faint dead away when I told you." And as he looks at her, all the glories of physiognomy in the court of Louis XV. on the modern fashion plates are tame as compared with the superhuman splendors of that woman's face. Joan of Arc, Mary Antoinette, and La Belle Hamilton, the enchantment of the court of Charles II., are nowhere.

A WIFE'S DEATH.

There is another time when the plainest wife is a queen of beauty to her husband. She has done the work of life. She has reared her children for God and heaven, and though some of them may be a little wild they will yet come back, for God has promised. She is dying, and her husband stands by. They think over all the years of their companionship, the weddings and the burials, the ups and the downs, the successes and the failures. They talk over the goodness of God and His faithfulness to children's children. She has no fear about going. The Lord has sustained her so many years she would not dare to distrust Him now. The lips of both of them tremble as they say good-by and encourage each other about an early meeting in a better world. The breath is feeble and feeble, and stops. Are you sure of it? Just hold that mirror at the mouth, and see if there is any vapor gathering on the surface. Gone! As one of the neighbors takes the old man by the arm gently and says: "Come, you had better go into the next room and rest," he says: "Wait a moment; I must take one more look at that face and at those hands!" Beautiful! Beautiful!

My friends, I hope you do not call that death. That is an autumnal sunset. That is a crystalline river pouring into a crystal sea. That is the solo of human life overpowered by hallelujah chorus. That is a queen's coronation. That is heaven. That is the way my father stood at eighty-two, seeing my mother depart at seventy-nine. Perhaps so your father and mother went. I wonder if we will die as well?

PROBLEMS OF PROPHETIC FAITH.

By Rev. A. C. Tris, of Howard City, Kan.

Differing Reception of Prophecy—One Universally Believed—One of Equal Authority Doubtful—Predictions of the First and Second Advent—One Taken Literally and the Other Figuratively—Inconsistency in Relation to Jewish Condition—To the World's Last Days—The Great Question.

IT must be evident, even to a superficial observer, that there is a wide diversity in the reception given by men to the prophetic words of the seers of old and those uttered by Jesus Himself. They are accepted, or partly accepted, or repudiated. We may profitably consider this fact, for it suggests problems which ought to be solved.

The first promise given after the deluge was the declaration of Jehovah to His servant Noah: "That while the earth remaineth, seed time and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night, shall not cease" (Gen. 8 : 22). This promise has received, above all others, a universal sanction, acceptance, and belief; every one, without the least doubt, expects the coming of the seasons, in which the influences of Orion and Pleiades will be felt, and when at the set time the golden grains will be sown and harvested. This is the only prophecy and promise of Jehovah which is accepted cosmically and through all ages.

The same Jehovah declared even solemnly to His servant Jeremiah: "If ye can break My covenant of the day, and My covenant of the night, and that there should not be day and night in their season; then may also my covenant be broken with David my servant, that he should not have a son to reign upon his throne; and with the Levites my ministers . . . for I will cause their captivity to return, and have mercy on them" (Jer. 33 : 21-26).

AN INCONSISTENCY.

This prophetic word and promise runs parallel in every respect with the promise given to Noah, and is as an appendix to the former; and yet how different is its acceptance! it is only partly believed! How comparatively few people, yea, how very few Christians believe that the Jews, the whole house of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob shall be restored to their own land of Canaan, and that the Son of David, "Messiah Jesus," shall be "the ruler in Israel!" (Micah 5 : 2; Matt. 2 : 6; Ps. 105 : 8.) Can any inquiring mind solve this problem? The Jews are in existence, and as a nation are among us, and that fact is as clear as the existence and returning of day and night. Canaan is waiting for the return of her down-trodden children, and the prophecy is never yet fulfilled. What are the reasons that the same Christians, who believe literally the promise given to Noah, will spiritualize or allegorize the promise given to Jeremiah? Indeed, this is a paradox. Here is a problem to be solved.

THE FIRST ADVENT.

Now, nineteen centuries ago, the archangel was sent as an ambassador to earth, to a lonely home of a virgin residing at the borders of the sea of Galilee. His proclamation was: "Behold, thou shalt conceive in thy womb and bring forth a son, and shall call His name Jesus. He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest, and the Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of His father David, and He shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end" (Luke 1 : 32, 33).

This message, the greatest and highest ever received from the throne of God, is only believed in part. That Jesus is born, that His name is Jesus, and that His name is greater than any human name ever known are facts literally acknowledged, accepted, and believed by every true Christian without any doubt.

THE SECOND ADVENT.

That that same Jesus is the Son of the Highest has become, and is the very foundation-stone of, Christianity, and no one should or would admit that "those words" were spoken in a figurative or allegorical manner. All acknowledge that they are literal and have a literal meaning: "Jesus is the Son of the living God." And if so, then, we ask, Why do the majority of the same Christians, yea, great scholars, deny that the following words: "That Jesus shall possess the throne of David, and shall have the kingly reign over the house of Jacob" are literal? Why do they substitute the throne of the Father in the heavens for the throne of David on earth, and declare that the Christian Church, "the Ecclesia," must be taken for the house of Jacob? Here is another enigma, another problem to be solved.

THE JEWS.

The greatest of all the prophets, by whom all the prophets spoke, God manifested and tabernacled in the flesh, has revealed the truth: "That the Jews should fall by the sword, and should be led away captive into all nations, and that Jerusalem should be trodden down by the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled" (Luke 21 : 24).

This prophecy is generally believed in a historical way. It cannot be gainsaid that the Jews are in the Diaspora, and that Jerusalem is trodden down by the worst of the nations. Those are facts which are known and accepted. The great obstacle of the text is that we are now living in the times and the dispensation of the Gentiles. Many Christians have lost sight of that fact, "that the times of the Gentiles are not yet fulfilled," and that Jerusalem must first be made free—Israel be restored—and Jesus must first be revealed in His coming (Matt. 23 : 38, 39) before the Gentile dispensation can come to an end. If this axiom was accepted and universally acknowledged it would make a revolution in thought and action, and produce the most glorious results.

The same authority quoted before has plainly told in Luke 17 : 26-30: "And as it was in the days of Noë, so shall it be in the days of the Son of man," and "likewise also as it was in the days of Lot, even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed," we are plainly informed that the last days of this dispensation will be days resembling the antediluvian age of domineering, lawlessness, and atheism, combined with the world-renowned licentiousness and wickedness of Sodom.

This prophecy is disregarded by many. The general tenor of the doctrine preached and believed is substantially this: That we are marching forward, with long strides, to millennial glory; that the nations will fall in line, and that the great army shall be heralded by ideas and motives which elevate and lead to human manhood and Christian brotherhood, and that it shall conquer. This doctrine is very enticing and lovely, yea, so acceptable to our preconceived ideas that it is not strange that the multitude have put their seal of approbation to it; and yet that doctrine is not in agreement with the tenor of Scripture and the mind of Jesus. We have the words of the great Master on this subject (Luke 18 : 8): "When the Son of man cometh, shall He find faith on the earth?" Truly another enigma is found here!

THE GREAT QUESTION

for every true Christian is, What is the mind of Jesus? what truth is revealed to us by the Holy Spirit? and, how can we please the Father of all light and truth? And to this the answer must be, To accept and to believe His words in the manner and spirit in which He has given them to His people. Shall the covenant made with Noah have a perfect literal fulfilment, as we experience every day and every year, and shall not the same literal fulfilment be conceded to a higher, more glorious, and a more far-reaching covenant than ever the Noachian covenant can lay claim to? A covenant which "the angels desire to look into" (1 Pet. 1 : 12). We accord to both covenants the same place, and believe in their literal fulfilment.

It will be one of the great privileges of the age of the resurrection to review the chain of all the promises of God, and all the various links connected with them, and to see that every word has been fulfilled literally; and in holy joy to join and to sing the heavenly anthem with the prophets of old and the apostles of the New Testaments, giving unitedly praise, honor, and glory "to Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever." Amen. So let it be.

WORK AMONG CHINESE OPIUM-SMOKERS.

THE difficulty of curing the slaves of opium in America is well known. The habit of using the drug in various ways, but chiefly by the hypodermic needle, is growing with frightful rapidity, and is fast rivalling the liquor traffic as a national curse among us. The following incidents, related by Mr. T. W. Pigott, of the China Inland Mission, who has labored among the opium habitués in China, will therefore have special interest for us in this country. He says:

"I have spent the past four years at Tai-yuan Fu, the capital of the Shansi Province, and there we had many modes of work, among others an opium refuge. As we find the opium traffic, and the forcing of the drug on China by the English, one of our greatest hindrances, so we have found the curing of opium-smokers one of our most successful modes of work. Among others, there was a Mr. Fan, who lived near Ping-yang Fu, in the south of the province. He was interested and saved while being cured of opium-smoking, and the missionary, Mr. Drake, used to ride over twenty miles and back every week to teach him to read. After some time he invited Mr. Drake to his house, and brought in about fourteen of his friends. The whole party stayed with him while being cured of opium-smoking or drinking. Mr. Drake slept on a brick stove bed with these men, and often at night, as the craving came on, they would get up and sing or pray, seeking help from God; for while helping them with medicine we seek to lead them to look to Him for deliverance, and so hope to lead them on to a true faith in Him. The result of a month of such work was that several were saved, and Mr. Fan's faith greatly strengthened, so that he became an earnest voluntary worker, spending energy and means in the Gospel cause, and working in the neighboring villages.

"God saw fit to try his faith much shortly after this, for when on a visit to the missionary a wolf carried off one of his little boys. There are many children there who bear scars on their faces from the attacks of these ferocious beasts. His neighbors said the gods were angry because he was following 'the foreign devils,' as they call us. This was a severe test, as you may the better understand if I tell you of the great superstition of one man, who with his shop-comrades was studying Christian books, when one day as he was reading he got a toothache. As he went on he got worse; he thought that there must be something unlucky in the books, and for many years would not read them. Poor Fan had a far severer test than this, and although it was repeated a second time his faith still stood the test. A second time he went to join the Christian meeting, and the second son was taken in the same way. God allowed him to be tried, but blessed him, too, and his zeal and love quite refreshed me when I met him a year ago last May at a gathering of one hundred men and women, who met under and awning in a courtyard near Ping-yang for a day of meetings.

"This was one of the most refreshing sights that I have seen in China; they were fine, stalwart fellows, and earnest and hearty in their zeal. Perhaps thirty of them were baptized, but the others had put away their idols, and expressed a desire to be Christians. I asked one in how many villages there were such, and he counted up twenty-seven; and although we could by no means say these were all converted, yet there is great reason to hope and to praise God who has done such great things. I want you to pray for these people and for poor Mr. Fan, for I have just heard that he has been taken before the Yamen, or magistrate, on a false charge, and received two hundred blows on one leg, for no other reason than his zeal for Christ. Pray for them, friends, and for the other native Christians, that they may stand firm and true to Christ."

WINNING SOULS.

A CAREFUL study of the lives of the most successful ministers leads us to the conclusion that much of their success was achieved in "dealing personally and individually with souls." The life of Dr. Cæsar Malan, of Geneva, by his friend Ostertag, recently published, confirms this opinion. One illustration of his methods may be useful. A company were returning to Geneva on a steamboat. It was "full of strangers of every kind." While Ostertag was enjoying conversation with friends, he perceived "that Malan had just seated himself by the side of a foreign lady, and had, in the most courteous manner, exchanged a few words with her. The conversation became increasingly animated. In her features there appeared by turns the expression of surprise or the smile of contempt. Then she set herself to listen attentively, silently, with her eyes bent down. By degrees these intervals of silence became more frequent. At length she gave up speaking entirely. Malan, on the other hand, appeared to grow increasingly serious and in earnest, and more and more confident of success. Tears were seen coursing down the lady's cheeks, while she applied her handkerchief to her eyes."

"For a long time," Ostertag continues, "I watched this scene from a distance, with the liveliest interest; for it was plain that Malan was seeking to bring that soul to Christ. Had I not already heard him spoken of as one not only filled with the most ardent zeal to gain hearts over to the kingdom of God, but as one possessing, moreover, an extraordinary aptitude for winning souls?"

Ostertag adds: "About half an hour afterward Malan passed close to me and whispered in my ear, 'Another soul gained over to the Lord.' A quarter of an hour afterward, while I was in the same place, and just as a young theologian from the north of Germany joined us, he passed again, touched me again on the shoulder, and said in a low voice, 'Preach the Gospel, sound the trumpet.' Through the whole of my journey after that—indeed, through all my after life—that sentence has resounded in my ears, and never did I repent of obeying it."

A HEATHEN SACRIFICE.

THE Calcutta Indian Witness of November 21st, 1885, publishes the following report of a recent heathen celebration from one of its contemporaries. It shows that even for the brute creation the propagation of Christianity is a blessing:

"The village of Callian was to-day—the Dusserah holiday—en fête, and in great excitement over the public sacrifice of an unfortunate buffalo, as a propitiation to the goddess of cholera. And this sacrifice was performed under the auspices and authority, and partly in the presence, of the highest government officer of the district—viz., the Mamlutdar and the élite of the native community, and of an immense crowd, composed of Brahmans, Purbhoos, Bunyahs, Wanees, Marwarees, Purdasees, Mussulmans, Parsees, and Hindus of other castes, supported by a posse of the town police in gala dress with arms and batons, as a guard of honor to the victim and to keep the crowd clear of the sacrifice grounds.

"You and your readers will suppose that the unfortunate animal—the victim of an ignorant superstition—was killed at a blow, as is usually done when daily slaughtered in the shambles; but no; it was tethered by the two hind feet with thick ropes about fifty feet long to enable it to run or struggle that distance and no more, and at a given signal (by a gentle wave of the hand) from the Mamlutdar the butchery commenced. Some one hundred and fifty Mahars in a high state of intoxication (inebriated, I am told, with liquor bought with the balance of the money subscribed for the purchase of the victim) came forward armed, some with bludgeons, others with long knives, and others with hatchets, and set to clubbing, stabbing, and hacking the poor tethered beast to death. Its frightened and despairing exertions to escape the horrid blows and stabs and from the fury of its Satanic torturers were heart-rendering and sickening in the extreme, until, exhausted by numberless blows and covered with hundreds of wounds and gashes, bleeding in all pores, its eyes protruding with agony and pain, it fell several times, and in its last fall was finally despatched in pieces by hatchets. Its head thus slowly severed from the trunk was triumphantly removed for burial in a hole made ready for its reception in front or opposite the Mamlutdar's 'kutchery.'"

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

The Devil's Medals.—At a Recent Meeting the Rev. Mr. Green observed: "Once when good Dr. Cunningham came north to preach the Gospel to us, he remarked, 'I have served the devil for a long time, and these are his medals,' pointing to his scars; 'he is a hard, hard master; but how different to be in the service of Christ, whose yoke is easy, and whose burden is light.' Many more would leave the devil's service at once if they could only see what debasing, enslaving drudgery it is, and enter the service of Christ, if they comprehend that it is perfect freedom."

A Lady with Everything but Money.—Rev. Mr. Muir said: "I was reading a short time ago of a lady in America who was brought up in a comfortable home, and although everything she needed was supplied, she was by no means wealthy, and the only thing she longed for was money. A gentleman of great wealth came from another country, and asked her hand in marriage. She agreed, and they were married. Her former complaint had been that she had everything but money, and now her complaint is she has nothing but money. And now, dear friends, if you try to make money the aim and end of your life, well might we ask, 'Why do you spend your money for that which is not bread and your labor for that which satisfieth not?'"

Plainly Seen in the Sunshine.—Mr. Campbell Brown observed: "On one occasion, while I was staying in the Western Highlands for my summer holiday, I was invited by some of my friends to go a-fishing. We got up about four o'clock in the morning. We had to cross a hill, then a moor, to reach the glen in which we were going to fish. As you know, the hills are enveloped in a white mist. But as the sun rose I saw just before me, and quite close, a hill, the grandest object in that country. How magnificent it looked, and yet I had not seen it before, for the mist hid it from my view. Thus it is that the mist of our own sins hides from us the near presence of God until the Sun of Righteousness arises in our souls, when the mists will be dissolved, and we shall know even as we are known."

A Visit to "Sacrifice Hill."—The Rev. J. R. Wolfe, of Fuh-Chow, China, who visited Corea recently, said: "In a few minutes we were abreast of 'Sacrifice Hill,' as Pappenberg is now called, from its having been the scene, three hundred years ago, of a great holocaust of Japanese Christians, offered up to the bigotry and fanaticism of the Japanese Government. This Sacrifice Hill is a pretty spot. It is a conically shaped rock, standing in the entrance of the harbor, surrounded by the deep blue waters of the ocean, and crowned with fine old trees at its very top. The tree is still pointed out from beneath the ancient branches of which the devoted Christian confessors were hurled alive down into the deep waters, in which they found a martyr's grave, and mingled their Christian martyr-blood with the angry billows that dashed all round the shores of old Japan. As our ship passed quite close by the spot, a feeling deep and solemn came over my spirit, and I could have taken off my hat in reverence to the memory of those spiritual heroes and heroines, who loved not their lives unto the death, but laid them down rather than deny their faith in Jesus Christ our Lord; and as I gazed upon that rock, I felt that these martyrs of Pappenberg died not in vain, nor was their blood mingled with the waters that swept round the coast of Nippon without an object, and the words of old Tertullian came into my mind, 'The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church.'"

Luther's Greatest Opponent.—"I was lately reading a story as old as the Reformation. It was about a man called Duke George of Saxony, who had no belief in the life and death of the Lord Jesus Christ. He was the greatest opponent Luther ever had. Well, this Duke George came to die, and he was as wretched as any man could be. He was surrounded by monks, who were praying now to this saint, now to that. But as his end drew near poor Duke George was always becoming more miserable. His doctor was secretly a Protestant, but when he saw his patient in such agony of soul he could conceal his faith no longer, and leaning over the dying man he said, 'Go straight to Christ and tell Him all.' Duke George turned his face to the wall, and lay for days in silent prayer, and I believe, bad as Duke George had been, he got to Christ at the eleventh hour, for the Lord has said, 'Him that cometh unto Me I will in no wise cast out.'"

How the Mist was Cleared Away.—Mr. Millar said: "A lady visited Dr. Moody in his study one day in deep distress of mind about her soul. He repeated several texts to her, but that made no impression, as she seemed to know them as well as himself. 'I don't know what more to say to you,' he remarked; 'you seem to know the Gospel as well.' He then repeated this text, 'This is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief.' As he repeated it, he thought he saw a change cross the lady's features, but she said nothing, and went away. Two or three days afterward she again came to him, her face perfectly radiant, and told him that she had found the Saviour, and that it was the text he had quoted last that had brought about the change. As she explained to him the cause of her delay in accepting Christ, she said: 'I thought Jesus came into the world to save saints, and I thought I had to be much better before He would save me; but now that text has cleared away the mist, and I know that Jesus came not to call the righteous but sinners to repentance.'"

A Consumptive French Woman has Just been led to Christ in a very touching and interesting way. It occurred in one of the poorest quarters of Paris, in connection with one of the halls of the McAll Mission. A poor woman, ignorant, but earnest in her acceptance of Christ's salvation, had for next-door neighbor a young woman who was dying of consumption. She visited her, and offered to pray with her, but the sick woman refused, with the utmost energy. "My husband will not hear a word on the subject, nor will I. I forbid you to mention it again." The Christian neighbor returned to her poor lodgings, and prayed for her friend. "You may forbid me to pray with you," she had said in parting; "but you cannot prevent my praying for you." The next time she returned, the sick woman asked for enlightenment. Prayer was offered at once, but the husband came in, and the prayer ceased. "Go on," said he; "I see it gives comfort to my poor wife. I want our three children to go to the Sunday-school of the mission, and I mean to go myself to the meetings." The dying woman is now in a state of perfect peace, and her face beams with joy and heavenly anticipation. The garde-malade said to her that she was not so ill as she thought. "Taisez vous," she replied, "I know I am going, but everything is well, and I lean in peace on the bosom of my Saviour, who is now, bless His name, most precious to me."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The New Anti-Polygamy Bill was Passed by the Senate on Friday. It was not materially changed during its progress. One single clause of importance was added to regulate the degree of consanguinity within which a marriage is illegal. Substantially the measure is therefore as described in these columns on December 31st. Only seven Senators in a total vote of forty-five cast their votes against it. Among the seven were Messrs. Blair and Hoar. The latter, it is understood, voted against the bill because it prohibits female suffrage in Utah. The clause which will most seriously cripple the Mormon Church, if the bill passes the House as it stands, is that which abolishes the immigration organization. It is from the cargoes of deluded people inveigled to Utah by "the missionaries" that Mormonism derives its vitality.

The Appointment of the House Committees, which is always a difficult and a delicate task, has been performed in this Congress in a manner which appears to satisfy neither of the political parties. The lists were announced on Thursday last, and the criticism in Democratic and Republican journals on the following day was unsparing. Speaker Carlisle has apparently attempted to make the committees representative of all sections rather than to emphasize his own views. Whether this method is as wise as it is fair may be doubted. Experience shows that it will not tend to the progress of public business, as it will be some time before the committees are through with their debates, and the measures that pass the ordeal can come before the House. Mr. Randall is again Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, but he is shorn of much of his power, as his committee now has no control over the most important appropriation bills. The following committees now have charge of the appropriations with which they are respectively concerned: Foreign Affairs, Military Affairs, Naval Affairs, Indian Affairs, Invalid Pensions, and Post Roads. The Chairmanship of the Ways and Means Committee is again given to Mr. Morrison. Though he and a majority of the Democrats on his committee are in favor of a reduction of the tariff, it is generally expected that no bill will come from the committee as it is constituted which could pass the House. Mr. Bland is Chairman of the Committee on Coinage. The committee itself, counting in Mr. Bland, is evenly divided on the silver question. Four Democrats and three Republicans are in favor of a suspension of the coinage of silver dollars, and four Democrats and two Republicans are opposed to the suspension. The President's advice, therefore, has been disregarded, so far as the Speaker is concerned. Present indications of useful legislation on any of the prominent questions of the day are not rendered more hopeful by the composition of the committees.

The Promised Effort to Repeal the Civil Service Reform law was commenced on January 5th, when Senator Vance, of North Carolina, introduced a bill for that purpose. The Senator has received congratulations from many quarters on his work. It is, as has been said, "a courageous thing" to do, and it might also have been said that it is a foolish thing to do. There is no probability of its succeeding, and Mr. Vance will gain nothing by putting himself on record against public opinion. The abuse was growing intolerable; it cost the life of President Garfield, and it caused widespread corruption. Now that it has been checked, it would be suicidal to set it in motion again. It may be supposed that the Senator is acting under a disinterested though mistaken desire for the public good, as he has personally no cause for complaint of a system under which, as it appears, seventeen of his relatives are in the public service. The change he proposes would not give him more offices for his family.

The City of Boston is to be Congratulated on the possession of a mayor who, like an experienced pilot, knows the rocks in the channel through which municipal government has to pass. Boston will have cause for congratulation if he avoids the rocks. The mayors of all the cities in the Union might profitably consider the words Mr. O'Brien used in succeeding to the mayoralty. He said: "Political tricksters who have merely some selfish purpose to gratify will receive no countenance from me, no matter what party they may be identified with for the time being. It is by yielding to these men on account of the few votes they control that municipal governments in all the large cities of the country have become a synonym for waste and extravagance and corruption. If political parties make combinations with men whose morality and integrity are questionable, such combinations should be discouraged and discountenanced by every good citizen." Happy is the city which has not had practical experience of the facts so forcibly expressed!

An Interesting Labor Dispute was Satisfactorily settled last week. The engineers on the elevated railroads of New York recently presented a bill of grievances to the managers, and respectfully asked for redress. Their requests were of concern to the public, because they indicated that the managers, by conceding them, would render traveling on the roads safer than it has been. One request was that the engineers might not in future be censured for failing to make time in foggy weather. Another request was that the engineers should not be required to work eleven or twelve hours a day, but that eight hours should be a day's work. The managers evidently intended to fight their employés, for they suspended operations on two of their four lines, and withdrew their trains. For this they asked the kind indulgence of the public. It is needless to say the public were not kind nor indulgent, having a well-grounded belief that the managers are greedy and selfish men who have no claims upon them. The effective check on their rapacity which the public could not administer was, however, given by Commissioner O'Donnell, who promptly informed the managers that their charter would be vitiated if they did not immediately resume traffic. The notification helped the engineers more than did the justice of their cause or the sympathy of the public. The managers started their trains, and compromised with the men. They conceded all their requests except that of the eight hours a day, and in that case an agreement was come to that nine hours should be a day's work. Thus the strike was averted, but other cities which are afflicted with men of the Cyrus Field and Jay Gould type will do well to look to the charters of companies and to the character of their commissioners, or they may be forced to extend "kind indulgence" to people who do not deserve it.

A Meeting of Liberal Members of the British Parliament has been summoned to meet Mr. Gladstone. It is expected that he will then announce his policy on the Irish Question. Mr. Parnell's supporters are also to meet this week in Dublin to arrange their course of action for the campaign. Brilliant as Mr. Parnell's statesmanship has been, it becomes increasingly evident that it will be severely taxed during the approaching session. The loyal Irish are organizing and presenting petitions against the concession of Home Rule. The threatening attitude they have assumed is already alarming timid members of Parliament, who dread a civil war in Ireland if Home Rule is granted. One member of Lord Salisbury's Administration last week who made a public speech predicted that "the Protestants of Ulster would have to fight for their lives against their implacable foes in the southern districts, and in all probability there would soon be a state of things little short of declared war between England and Ireland before the country would be able to secure peaceable possession for those desirous of living in Ireland." The utterances of Mr. Parnell and his friends prove, however, that no concession short of legislative independence will satisfy the great majority of the Irish people.

A New Cabinet has been Formed in France. M. de Freycinet, who was the Secretary of State in the late Administration, becomes Prime Minister, retaining his old position in addition. He is fifty-seven years of age, and has been several times in office. He was a protégé of Gambetta. He has endeavored to conciliate the Radicals by giving the Ministry of Commerce to M. Lockroy, a member of that section. The majority of the new officials are new and comparatively unknown men. The composition of the Cabinet indicates the scarcity existing in France of statesmen of a high class. M. de Freycinet himself does not possess the confidence of the people. He was in power at the time of the Arabi Pasha trouble in Egypt, and the French people consider that in that matter he bungled miserably, and suffered himself to be outwitted by England.

A Grand Celebration was Held in Berlin on January 3d, of the twenty-fifth anniversary of Emperor William's accession to the throne of Prussia. The venerable Emperor and Empress attended divine service in the Royal Chapel, which was crowded with princes and distinguished guests. The sermon preached on the occasion was from the text, "By the grace of God I am what I am" (1 Cor. 15: 10). On the following day the city was in holiday garb, and congratulations poured in from all parts of the Empire. The Emperor is now in his eighty-ninth year, having been born March 22d, 1797.

The British Annexation of Burmah is not to pass unchallenged. A claimant for the throne has appeared in the person of Prince Alompra, who has collected a large force, has appointed ministers, levies taxes, and issues decrees. The correspondent of the London Times at Rangoon telegraphs that ten thousand rebels are scouring the country within a radius of twenty miles of Mandalay, and that they threaten to attack the town. There are fears of a general uprising, owing to the great reduction of the British force at Mandalay. It will, however, be for the interest of the country and its neighbors if the British Government retains its hold, and establishes a just and strong administration.

Seven per cent Secure Investment: The sum of $2000 is wanted for a term of three years or longer, on mortgage on a brick church with stone foundation (now per manently occupied), with accompanying land, which cost altogether about $4000, in the midst of a prosperous town. Collateral security will also be given. Address: Trustee, Christian Herald Office, 63 Bible House, New York.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying Colored ministers with the CHRISTIAN HERALD were received last week to the amount of $12. They were as follows: from Verona, Wis., $3; Olean, N. Y., $1; Norwood, Minn., $1; Watertown, Pa., $1; Carluke, Ont., $1; Milwaukee, Wis., 50 cents; New York, N. Y., 50 cents; Holland, Neb., $1; New Cumberland, W. Va., $3.

Mrs. Baxter's Meetings at Kalamazoo, Mich., were much blessed of God. Last week she was at Newark, N. J., taking part in the Christian Convention conducted by Dr. Cullis in the Emmanuel Reformed Episcopal Church, on Halsey Street. This week she is at Philadelphia, attending meetings at the Kemuel Home, 127 South Twelfth Street, which commenced January 12th. On January 20th she goes to Milton, Pa., for a series of meetings, under the presidency of Rev. W. L. Tollmer, commencing January 20th and continuing to January 26th.

Mr. W. Noble is Conducting Gospel Temperance meetings every night this week in the Broome Street Tabernacle, New York. They are largely attended by the class of people they are intended to reach, and it is believed that much good is being done. Reports continue to reach us from Louisville, Ky., and other places which this eminent evangelist has visited since he arrived in this country, of the value and permanence of the benefits derived from his addresses.

Mr. Moody Commences a Series of Meetings in Chicago to-day. They are being held in the Chicago Avenue Church, of which Rev. C. F. Goss is pastor. They will continue until next Thursday, two services being held each day. Admission is by ticket. Mr. Moody has issued an appeal for $10,000, to pay for the furnishing of the new buildings recently added to the Mount Hermon School, at Gill, Mass. One hundred young men are now studying there, and the new buildings will accommodate two hundred more.

Mission Services Similar to those Conducted in the Protestant-Episcopal churches of New York with so much success last month are being held in Detroit, Mich. At the invitation of the Bishop and clergy, the Rev. W. S. Rainsford, of St. George's Church, New York, has consented to take charge of the services. The daily programme of Mr. Rainsford's work is an early celebration of the holy communion, with a brief address, at St. John's Church, a service and sermon on the Christian life, at noon, at St. Paul's Church, specially intended for men, and a mission service in the evening at St. John's Church. In addition to these, services have been arranged for in all of the twenty Episcopal churches of Detroit, so that provision has been made for reaching the entire population of the city, and for carrying on the work in different parishes during this and next month.

A Temperance Mayor was Elected in Toronto on January 4th, after an exciting contest. There were two candidates. One of them was a millionaire brewer, who has already held the office, and under whose administration the liquor saloons have flourished. The other was Mr. W. H. Howland, a commission merchant, and a strong temperance man. The women of the city were allowed to vote, and in spite of the heavy rain which fell all day, they sallied forth in large numbers to vote for the temperance candidate. He also had the support of the workingmen. Mr. Howland was elected by a majority of nearly two thousand.

The Re-Opening of the Christian Church in Mandalay is a gratifying result of the British annexation of Burmah. It has been closed for six years. The Bishop of Rangoon has telegraphed to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel for three clergymen. King Theebaw's predecessor on the throne undertook to build a church, a clergy house, and a large school if a missionary would work in the capital. The king kept his word, but after his death King Theebaw withdrew the royal protection, and on the withdrawal of the English Residency, the missionary was forced to withdraw to English territory, not being allowed any choice in the matter by Theebaw. It is believed that the clergy house has been used as a Buddhist monastery and the church as a lottery office, but the Bishop of Rangoon now regards Mandalay as re-opened, and wishes the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel to resume missionary work.

The Remarkable Resuscitation of an Apparent corpse is reported from Galena, Ill. On December 28th a citizen of Platteville, Wis., who has endured much pain for a long time from rheumatism of the feet, tried a new remedy for his suffering. He bathed his feet freely with tincture of aconite and then thrust them into a pail of hot water. A tingling sensation followed, the pulse weakened, the skin became moist and clammy, and violent vomiting and retching ensued. The heart seemed to have stopped beating, and the doctors who were summoned decided that the man had died from aconite poisoning, having absorbed the drug through his feet. An undertaker set about preparing the body for burial, when one of the physicians, as an experiment, injected with a hypodermic syringe a mixture of brandy and digitalis near the heart. In a few minutes the supposed dead man began to gasp, and there was a faint sound of beating over the heart. More hypodermics were given, the death pallor was succeeded by a reddish glow, the muscles relaxed, perspiration broke out, and the patient slowly returned to life. He is now entirely out of danger. There have been many people given up as spiritually dead who have been afterward quickened, and it has generally been by the heart rather than the head that the divine power has found an entrance (Eph. 2 : 1).

A Living Ladder Saved Seven Lives in Cincinnati on New Year's Day. There was a leak in a forty-inch water main, and eight men were sent to repair it. They dug a hole twenty feet square and ten feet deep in the middle of the street. Suddenly a sound like an underground explosion was heard from the east bank of the cavity. Then the earth of one side began to slip away rapidly, and was followed by an overwhelming flood of water. "Jump for your lives, boys!" the foreman shouted. "Climb out, climb out, or drown!" The men began to scramble up, but it was almost impossible to get out. The water poured in like a mill-race, and the heavy banks of earth began crumbling in. It looked as though the men would be caught and drowned. Then the foreman called to them to climb upon his shoulders, and in that manner every man was saved. When the foreman was pulled out of the ditch the water was up to his armpits. Just as he was pulled out two sides of the hole caved in, carrying several tons of earth into the place where the men had been struggling but a moment before. The heroic foreman in risking his life that his men might be saved was an example of that spirit of self-sacrifice the highest type of which was seen in Him who gave Himself to die that through Him men might ascend to union with God (Eph. 2 : 16-18).

A Lady's Christmas Present was Earned in a strange manner at St. Paul, Minn., last month. The St. Paul Globe says that on December 23d a well-dressed lady sat on an empty beer keg that had been rolled up against a small brick building on Rice Street. The people that passed along the sidewalk looked curiously at her, but she spoke no word, and they passed on. A dozen small boys gathered in a group, and made guesses on what she was doing and why she was there. She seemed somewhat embarrassed at the looks of the people, but she sat there all the same for two hours by the watch. She had asked her husband for a silk dress for Christmas. He at first refused, but on being pressed declared that she should have the dress if she would sit on the keg in that place for two hours. He had no idea that she would do it, but when it was done he kept his side of the bargain by purchasing the dress. As the reporter is careful to state that the lady was well dressed, it may be inferred that her need of the coveted garment was not urgent. Her desire for it, even though it was a superfluity, must have been strong or she would not have submitted to such an ordeal. We may well wish that such courage as she displayed might animate her Christian sisters in a better cause. Sometimes the cause of Christ suffers because ladies who really love Him have not the courage to face the remarks that a public witness for Him would evoke (Mark 8 : 38).

A Missing Will was Found in a Bible Recently in Baltimore, Md. The Baltimore Sun says that a long search for the will of a deceased citizen has ended in the discovery of the lost document in the family Bible. It was written upon the blank leaves intended for recording marriages and other domestic events. The executors produced a large, handsomely bound and illustrated Bible, quarto size, in court, and the will found between the Old and New Testaments was admitted to probate. The motive of the testator in choosing that place for recording his wishes concerning the distribution of his property is not known. It may be hoped, however, that the legatees will not be content with studying that part of the book only. They will find, on both sides of the will, intelligence about a far greater inheritance and much besides that concerns them (John 5 : 39).

A Cry Heard in the Storm which Raged on the Eastern coast on the night of Friday, January 8th, was very distressing to one of its hearers. The night watchman on Black Tom Island in New York Bay was going his rounds soon after midnight, when he heard a piercing shriek above the roar of the wind. He could not see two yards ahead, but he knew that the cry came from the bay. The water was boiling with the fury of the wind, and spray was being tossed ashore in blinding sheets. He went to the water's edge and listened. Then he heard in piteous tone the cry: "Help! Help! Won't some one save us?" The watchman aroused Captain Cook, who has charge of the stores on the island, and the captain went out in a steam-tug and cruised around the bay for two hours, but found no ship in distress nor any sign of trouble. He spoke to several sailors watching on the ships in the harbor, but, though they, too, had heard the cry, they could give no information. Who the poor drowning creature was that made that pitiful appeal will probably never be known. Many a tempest-tossed heart in the world's storm is raising that same cry. It is the Christian's duty to point the despairing ones to the One able and willing to save them (Isa. 63 : 5).

A Romantic Marriage was Solemnized at Cleveland, O., on January 5th. Two weeks before that date a young German citizen was passing the Union depot when he noticed a young lady in trouble. She was weeping bitterly, and though she was talking volubly, no one was able to understand her. He went to her assistance, and to his surprise found that she came from his native town in Bavaria, and was an old playmate of his own. She told him a sad story. She said that she came to America a few days before to seek her lover, who was also a Bavarian, and had promised to marry her. She had found him at Toledo, O., but he was already married to another, and she had come away heart-broken and penniless, and did not know what to do. The young German placed her in a respectable boarding-house and befriended her. Finally, after two weeks' wooing, he persuaded her to forget her unfaithful lover and become his wife. They were married accordingly on January 5th, and both seemed delighted with the arrangement. It may be hoped that the marriage will be a happy one. If the lady has ordinary gratitude she will not forget how her husband found her poor and friendless, and saved her from trouble. So the Church was found by her bridegroom when she was not seeking Him, and He gave His life for her (Eph. 5 : 25-27).

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Call upon me in the day of trouble: I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me."—PSALM 50: 15.

Robinson Crusoe and its Author—Life's Castaways—I. Realism Preferred to Ritualism—Mummeries of Ritual—Sounds without Sense—Men Like Boys' Tops—II. Adversity Turned to Advantage—Grounds for Pleading—III. Grace under Bonds—A Promise with Power—No Pledge about Time—IV. God and Man Taking Shares.

ONE book charmed us all in the days of our youth. Is there a boy alive who has not read it? "Robinson Crusoe" was a wealth of wonders to me; I could have read it over a score times, and never have wearied. I am not ashamed to confess that I can read it even now with ever fresh delight. Robinson and his man Friday, though mere inventions of fiction, are wonderfully real to the most of us. But why am I running on in this way on a Sabbath evening? Is not this talk altogether out of order? I hope not. A passage in that book comes vividly before my recollection to-night as I read my text; and in it I find something more than an excuse. Robinson Crusoe has been wrecked. He is left in the desert island all alone. His case is a very pitiable one. He goes to his bed, and he is smitten with fever. This fever lasts upon him long, and he has no one to wait upon him—none even to bring him a drink of cold water. He is ready to perish. He had been accustomed to sin, and had all the vices of a sailor; but his hard case brought him to think. He opens a Bible which he finds in his chest, and he lights upon this passage, "Call upon Me in the day of trouble: I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify Me." That night for the first time in his life, and ever after there was in him a hope in God, which marked the birth of the heavenly life.

De Foe, who composed the story, was, as you know, a Presbyterian minister; and though not overdone with spirituality, he knew enough of religion to be able to describe very vividly the experience of a man who is in despair, and who finds peace by casting himself upon his God. As a novelist, he had a keen eye for the probable, and he could think of no passage more likely to impress a poor broken spirit than this. Instinctively he perceived the mine of comfort which lies within these words.

Now I have everybody's attention, and this is one reason why I thus commenced my discourse. But I have a further purpose; for although Robinson Crusoe is not here, nor his man Friday either, yet there may be somebody here very like him, a person who has suffered shipwreck in life, and who has now become a drifting, solitary creature. He remembers better days, but by his sins he has become a castaway, whom no man seeks after. He is here to-night, washed up on shore without a friend, suffering in body, broken in estate, and crushed in spirit. In the midst of a city full of people, he has not a friend, nor one who would wish to own that he has ever known him. He has come to the bare bone of existence now. Nothing lies before him but poverty, misery, and death. Thus saith the Lord unto thee, my friend, this night, "Call upon Me in the day of trouble: I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify Me." Four things suggest themselves to me. May the Holy Ghost bless what I am able to say upon them!

I. The first observation is not so much in my text alone as in the text and the context.

is preferred to ritualism. If you will carefully read the rest of the Psalm you will see that the Lord is speaking of the rites and ceremonies of Israel, and he is showing that he has little care about formalities of worship when the heart is absent from them. Praise and prayer are accepted in preference to every form of offering which it was possible for the Jew to present before the Lord. Why is this? First of all I would answer, real prayer is far better than mere ritual, because there is meaning in it, and when grace is absent, there is no meaning in ritual; it is as senseless as

AN IDIOT'S GAME.

Did you ever stand in some Romish cathedral and see the daily service, especially if it happened to be upon a high day? What with the boys in white, and the men in violet, or pink, or red, or black, there were performers enough to stock a decent village. What with those who carried candlesticks, and those who carried crosses, and those who carried pots and pans, and cushions and books, and those who rang bells, and those who made a smoke, and those who sprinkled water, and those who bobbed their heads, and those who bowed their knees, the whole concern was very wonderful to look at, very amazing, very amusing, very childish. One wonders, when he sees it, whatever it is all about, and what kind of people those must be who are really made better by it. One marvels also what an idea pious Romanists must have of God if they imagine that He is pleased with such performances. Do you not wonder how the good Lord endures it? What must His glorious mind think of it all?

The glorious God cares nothing for pomp and show; but when you call upon Him in the day of trouble, and ask Him to deliver you, there is meaning in your groan of anguish. This is no empty form; there is heart in it, is there not? There is meaning in the appeal of sorrow, and therefore God prefers the prayer of a broken heart to the finest service that ever was performed by priests and choirs. In the poor man's prayer there are mind, heart, and soul; and hence it is real unto the Lord. Here is a living soul seeking contact with the living God in reality and in truth. A man standing up in yonder corner groans out, "O God, my heart will break!" There is more force in his moan than in a thousand of the biggest trumpets, drums, cymbals, tambourines, or any other instruments of music wherewith men seek to please God nowadays.

VAIN SOUND.

Why does God prefer realism to Ritualism? It is for this reason also that there is something spiritual in the cry of a troubled heart; and "God is a Spirit: and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth." Suppose I were to repeat to-night the finest creed for accuracy that was ever composed by learned and orthodox men; yet, if I had no faith in it, and you had none, what were the use of the repetition of the words? Further, the Lord loves the cry of the broken heart because it distinctly recognizes Himself as the living God, in very deed sought after in prayer. From much of outward devotion God is absent. But how we mock God when we do not discern Him as present, and do not come nigh unto His very self! Besides, dear friends, God takes great delight in our crying to Him in the day of trouble because there is sincerity in it. I am afraid that in the hour of our mirth and the day of our prosperity many of our prayers and our thanksgivings are hypocrisy. Too many of us are like boys' tops, that cease to spin except they are whipped. Certainly we pray with a deep intensity when we get into great trouble. A man is very poor; he is out of a situation; he has worn his shoes out in trying to find work; he does not know where the next meal is coming from for his children; and if he prays now it is likely to be very sincere prayer, for he is in real earnest on account of real trouble. When we mean it; when the soul melts in prayer; when it is "I must have it, or be lost;" when it is no sham, no vain performance, but a real heart-breaking, agonizing cry, then God accepts it. Hence he says, "Call upon me in the day of trouble."

Again, in the cry of the troubled one there is humility. We may go through a highly brilliant performance of religion, after the rites of some gaudy church; or we may go through our own rites, which are as simple as they can be;

and we may be all the while saying to ourselves, "This is very nicely done." The preacher may be thinking, "Am I not preaching well?" The brother at the prayer-meeting may feel within himself, "How delightfully fluent I am!" Whenever there is that spirit in us, God cannot accept our worship. Worship is not acceptable if it be devoid of humility. Now, when in the day of trouble a man goes to God, and says, "Lord, help me! I cannot help myself, but do Thou interpose for me," there is humility in that confession and cry, and hence the Lord takes delight in them.

FAITH IMPLIED.

Once more, the Lord loves such pleadings because there is a measure of faith in them. When the man in trouble cries, "Lord, deliver me!" he is looking away from himself. You see, he is driven out of himself because of the famine that is in the land. He cannot find hope or help on earth, and therefore he looks toward heaven. Perhaps he has been to friends, and they have failed him, and therefore, in sheer despair, he seeks his truest Friend. At last he comes to God; and though he cannot say that he believes in God's goodness as he ought, yet he has some dim and shadowy faith in it, or else he would not be coming to God in this his time of extremity. God loves to discover even the shadow of faith in His unbelieving creature.

See then, poor, weeping, and distracted ones, that it is not Ritualism, it is not the performance of pompous ceremonies, it is not bowing and scraping, it is not using sacred words; but it is crying to God in the hour of your trouble; which is the most acceptable sacrifice your spirit can bring before the throne of God.

THE ADVANTAGE.

II. Come we now to our second observation. May God impress it upon us all! In our text we have adversity turned to advantage. "Call upon me in the day of trouble: I will deliver thee." We say it with all reverence, but God Himself cannot deliver a man who is not in trouble, and therefore it is some advantage to be in distress, because God can then deliver you. Even Jesus Christ, the Healer of men, cannot heal a man who is not sick; so that it turns to our advantage to be sick, in order that Christ may heal us. Thus, my hearer, your adversity may prove your advantage by offering occasion and opportunity for the display of divine grace.

Now let me suppose that there is some person here in trouble. Perhaps another deserted Robinson Crusoe is among us. I am not idly supposing that a tried individual is here; he is so. Well now, when you pray—and oh! I wish you would pray now—do you not see what a plea you have? You have first a plea from the time: "Call upon me in the day of trouble." You can plead, "Lord, this is a day of trouble! I am in great affliction, and my case is urgent at this hour." Then state what your trouble is—that sick wife, that dying child, that sinking business, that failing health, that situation which you have lost—that poverty which stares you in the face. Say unto the Lord of mercy, "My Lord, if ever a man was in a day of trouble, I am that man; and therefore I take leave and license to pray to thee now, because thou hast said, 'Call upon me in the day of trouble.'"

THE APPOINTED TIME.

Next, you cannot only make use of the time as a plea; but you may urge the trouble itself. You may argue thus, "Thou hast said, 'Call upon Me in the day of trouble.' O Lord, thou seest how great my trouble is. It is a very heavy one. I cannot bear it, or get rid of it. It follows me to my bed; it will not let me sleep. When I rise up it is still with me, I cannot shake it off. Lord, my trouble is an unusual one: few are afflicted as I am; therefore give me extraordinary succor! Lord, my trouble is a crushing one; if thou do not help me, I shall soon be broken up by it!" That is good reasoning and prevalent pleading.

Further, turn your adversity to advantage by pleading the command. You can go to the Lord now, at this precise instant, and say, "Lord, do hear me, for Thou hast commanded me to pray! I, though I am evil, would not tell a man to ask a thing of me, if I intended to deny him; I would not urge him to ask help, if I meant to refuse it." Do you not know, brethren, that we often impute to the good Lord conduct which we should be ashamed of in ourselves? This must not be. If you said to a poor man, "You are in very sad circumstances; write to me to-morrow, and I will see to your affairs for you;" and if he did write to you, you would not treat his letter with contempt. You would be bound to consider his case. When you told him to write, you meant that you would help him if you could. And when God tells you to call upon Him, He does not mock you; He means that He will deal kindly with you. Oh, you troubled ones, leap up at the sound of this word!

III. My third head is clearly in the text. Here we have free

GRACE UNDER BONDS.

Nothing in heaven or earth can be freer than grace, but here is grace putting itself under bonds of promise and covenant. Listen. "Call upon Me in the day of trouble: I will deliver thee." If a person has once said to you, "I will," you hold him; he has placed himself at the command of his own declaration. If he is a true man, and has plainly said, "I will," you have him in your hand. He is not free after giving a promise as he was before it; he has set himself a certain way, and he must keep to it. Is it not so? I say so with the deepest reverence toward my Lord and Master, He has bound Himself in the text with cords that He cannot break. He must now hear and help those who call upon Him in the day of trouble. He has solemnly promised, and He will fully perform.

Notice that this text is unconditional as to the persons. It contains the gist of that other promise—"Whosoever calleth upon the name of the Lord shall be saved." He saith, "Call upon Me in the day of trouble: I will deliver thee." Will you not prove Him now? Come hither, ye bonded ones, and see if He doth not free you! Come ye to Christ, all ye that labor, and are heavy laden, and He will give you rest! In temporals and in spirituals, but specially in spiritual things, call upon Him in the day of trouble, and He will deliver you. He is bound by this great unrestricted word of His, about which He has put neither ditch nor hedge; whosoever will call upon Him in the day of trouble, shall be delivered.

A PROMISE WITH POWER.

Moreover, notice that this "I will" includes all needful power which may be required for deliverance. "Call upon Me in the day of trouble: I will deliver thee." "But how can this be?" cries one. Ah! that I cannot tell you, and I do not feel bound to tell you; it rests with the Lord to find suitable ways and means. God says, "I will." Let Him do it in His own way. If He says, "I will," depend upon it He will keep His word.

TIME NOT PLEDGED.

Notice, the text does not say exactly when. "I will deliver thee" is plain enough; but whether it shall be to-morrow, or next week, or next year, is not so clear. You are in a great hurry; but the Lord is not. Your trial may not yet have wrought all the good to you that it was sent to do, and therefore it must last longer. When the gold is cast into the fining-pot, it might cry to the goldsmith, "Let me out." "No," saith he, "you have not yet lost your dross. You must tarry in the fire till I have purified you." God may therefore subject us to many trials; and yet if He says, "I will deliver thee," depend upon it He will keep His word. But promptitude is implied, for else deliverance would not be wrought. "I will deliver thee," implies that His delays will not be too protracted, lest the spirit of man should fail because of hope deferred. The Lord rideth on the wings of the wind when He comes to the rescue of those who seek Him. Wherefore, be of good courage!

IV. Thus we have had three sweet things to remember; and we close with a fourth, which is this: here are God and the praying man

TAKING SHARES.

That is an odd word to close with, but I want you to notice it. Here are the shares. First, here is your share: "Call upon Me in the day of trouble." Secondly, here is God's share: "I will deliver thee." Again, you take a share—for you shall be delivered. And then again it is the Lord's turn—"Thou shalt glorify Me." Here is a compact, a covenant that God enters into with you who pray to Him, and whom He helps. He says, "You shall have the deliverance, but I must have the glory. You shall pray; I will bless; and then you shall honor My holy name." Here is a delightful partnership; we obtain that which we so greatly need, and all that God getteth is the glory which is due unto His name.

Poor troubled heart! I am sure you do not demur to these terms: "Sinners," saith the Lord, "I will give you pardon, but you must give Me the honor of it." Our only answer is, "Ay, Lord, that we will, forever and ever."

"Who is a pardoning God like thee?"

Or who has grace so rich and free?"

"I will take you home to heaven," says God; "I will deliver you from sin and death and hell; but I must have the glory of it." "Truly," say we, "Thou shalt be magnified."

STOP, YOU THIEF,

there! What are you at? Running away with a portion of God's glory? What a villain he must be! Here is a man that was lately a drunkard, and God has loved him and made him sober, and he is wonderfully proud because he is sober. What folly! Have done, sir! Have done! Give God the glory of your deliverance from the degrading vice, or else you are still degraded by ingratitude. Here is another man. He used to swear once; but he has been praying now; he even delivered a sermon the other night, or at least an open-air address. He has been as proud about this. Oh, reclaimed sinner, remember your former character, and be ashamed! Give God the glory if you have ceased to be profane. Give God the glory for every part of your salvation.

Go out henceforth, you saved ones, and tell out what the Lord has done for you. An aged woman once said that if the Lord Jesus Christ really did save her, He should never hear the last of it. Join with her in that resolve. Truly my soul vows that my delivering Lord shall never hear the last of my salvation.

"I'll praise Him in life, and praise Him in death,
And praise Him as long as He lendeth me breath;
And say when the death-dew lies cold on my brow,
'If ever I loved thee, my Jesus, 'tis now.'"

Come, poor soul, you that came in here to-night in the deepest of trouble, God means to glorify Himself by you! The day shall yet come when you shall comfort other mourners by the rehearsal of your happy experience. The day may yet come when you that were a cast-away shall preach the Gospel to castaways. The day shall yet come, poor fallen woman, when you shall lead other sinners to the Saviour's feet, where now you stand weeping! Thou abandoned of the devil, whom even Satan is tired of, whom the world rejects because thou art worn out and stale—the day shall yet come when, renewed in heart, and washed in the blood of the Lamb, thou shalt shine like a star in the firmament, to the praise of the glory of His grace who hath made thee to be accepted in the Beloved! Oh desponding sinner, come to Jesus! Do call upon Him, I entreat you! Be persuaded to call upon your God and Father. If you can do no more than groan, groan unto God. Drop a tear, heave a sigh, and let your heart say to the Lord, "Oh God, deliver me, for Christ's sake! Save me from my sin and the consequences of it." As surely as you thus pray, He will hear you, and say, "Thy sins be forgiven thee. Go in peace." So may it be. Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

FAITH AND RATIONALISM, with Short Supplementary Essays on Related Topics, by George P. Fisher, D.D., LL.D. The motto placed by the author on the title-page of his book is the key to its contents: "If any man willeth to do His will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself" (John 7:17). In all the aspects in which the questions are looked at which are now agitating the thoughtful section of the community, this saying of the Master is an all-important consideration.

At first sight it seems unjustifiable to account for scepticism and infidelity on moral grounds. When a man declares his belief that the world is flat, and that the sun and planets revolve around it, we regard his declaration as an evidence of his mental incapacity, but not as an evidence of moral obliquity. Nevertheless, in spiritual matters a different course is justified. Experience teaches that something more than the intellect is necessary for the reception of spiritual truth. We are therefore right in suspecting that when spiritual truth is rejected the rejector lacks that something, whatever it may be. Various names are given to it, but its chief characteristic is docility. Science may be approached with the intellect only, but in approaching religion much will depend on the moral attitude. It is the man who desires to do God's will who will know the doctrine. The man who will become a sceptic is he who comes to the subject with the demand that there shall be no mystery, that everything shall be made plain, that no allowance shall be made for the influence of sin on his own capacity of judging, and that in all points logic shall be supreme. Dr. Fisher devotes his earlier pages to establishing this fact and to showing that the arrogance of intellect which men often bring to the study of divine things is the main cause of the prevalence of unbelief in our day. In other words, that the docile child arrives at the truth, while the cultured and self-satisfied man misses it. God does not reveal Himself to inquirers who propose to institute "prayer tests." He will answer the prayer of faith, and we do not know of any limits to His disposition to honor the confidence reposed in Him; but He is little likely to answer the prayer of a man who offers it simply to see whether He will answer it or not.

Dr. Fisher proceeds to show how this arrogance touches every question at issue between believers and rationalists, and that after all our arguments and our attempts to convince sceptics and avowed infidels, we are brought back to the fact stated by the Apostle Paul (1 Cor. 2:14), that spiritual things cannot be received by the unspiritual man, because "they are spiritually discerned." We believe this fact is lost sight of very much in this day. Our young men especially are apt to reject spiritual truth which the intellect cannot grasp, and are proud of their courage in doing so. They have nothing to be proud of, but are rather in the condition of a man who has lost the sense of smell, and refuses to believe in the perfume of a rose because he cannot smell it. Dr. Fisher, in stating the fact, illustrating it by familiar examples, such as the attitude of an earthly father to his children, and applying it to the controverted points which are the favorite objects of rationalistic attack, has done valuable service. If the godly friends of a young man who is dazzled by atheistic logic would place this little work in his hands, they would do him a kindness. Pp. 191; price, 75 cents. TWELVE HOURS with Young People is the title of a series of earnest, common-sense lectures, full of sound moral and religious teaching, by Rev. H. Martin Kellogg, of Greenwich, Conn. A few anecdotes culled almost at random from the pages of the book will show its character better than any description. "There was once a young shoemaker, who was so interested in the political issues of the day that he collected a lot of followers in his shop by day to discuss and argue on those questions, and had to work diligently by night to make up for the hours wasted by day. Late one night, when he was busy at his bench, a mischievous boy passing by shouted through the key-hole of the door, 'Shoemaker, work by night and gad about by day.' He then formed the resolution not to put off necessary work, and not to be idle when there was work to be done. He afterward became illustrious as William Drew."

Prosy preachers may learn a lesson from an interruption of a sermon by an insane hearer. The clergyman was describing the preparations for an execution, and the journey of a man who was coming over the hills with a pardon for the condemned criminal. The clergyman dwelt minutely on the incidents of that journey, and with such prolixity that one of his hearers, who was demented, called out, "Hurry up! They'll hang that man if you don't!" In warning his hearers against liquor, the author tells a story of a drowned Irishman. He says: "A party of Irishmen were reeling along the bank of a river at midnight. They were loud in the praise of their drinks, and one of them declared with oaths that whiskey was his meat and drink, when suddenly his foot slipped, and he fell into the river. 'There, Mike,' said one of the company, 'ye're provided for now. Ye've had your mate and drink, and now ye've got your washin' and lodgin'. Good-by.'"

Lincoln's blunder is the subject of an anecdote in the chapter on "honesty." "When Lincoln was clerk in a country store, he was one night closing up, when a woman came in for half a pound of tea. The next morning he noticed that there was a quarter-pound weight on the scale, and the thought flashed upon him that he had given the woman only one half the tea she paid for. Instantly he closed the store, weighed another quarter of tea, and walked a long distance before breakfast to make it square with the woman." One other incident must close the list, though it might be largely extended. It illustrates the evils of dancing, on which the author gives much valuable advice. "When the Hippodrome revival was in progress in New York under Mr. Moody, in 1876, I talked with a young man in the inquiry-room who was anxious to make his peace with God. The one obstacle was a ticket to a dance which he had in his pocket and showed me. I labored long and earnestly to have him give up the dance for Christ then, and to let me tear up the ticket. He fiercely battled in mind over it, but the temptation was too strong. He solemnly promised when we separated to never attend a dance after that one, but to come to the Hippodrome the evening following and seek me out and give his heart to God. He never came back!"

Each of the twelve lectures has for its chief object the conversion of young people, and warning them against evils that tend to keep them from coming to Christ. Pp. 312; price, $1. Published by N. Tibbals & Sons.

A JEWISH EXODUS.

It is remarkable that the revolutions and political changes which have during recent years emancipated large populations who were under the yoke of Turkey have brought misery to the Jews. It is not long since all Europe was aroused by the appeal for sympathy with the Bulgarian Christians. Roumania, Servia, and other provinces also claimed a share in public sympathy; yet no sooner have they secured independence and deliverance from Turkish misgovernment than they have begun to persecute.

In the provinces, as in some parts of Germany and Russia, the Jew has no protection for his person or his property. In Roumania alone there are two hundred and fifty thousand Jews who are practically outlaws. These were not only born in the country, but their parents and ancestors for more than two centuries were born there. Yet under a law recently passed they are judged aliens, and are at any time liable to expulsion. On the complaint of any person who has a grudge against them a notice is issued requiring them to leave the country within twenty-four hours. So lately as October last a distinguished Jewish professor in the University of Bucharest, an author of European reputation, was unexpectedly served with such a notice, and was forced to leave his friends and property, and go immediately. Sometimes a number of Jewish families receive the notice at the same time, and then there is a large cart hired, and they all set out together for the frontier. Such a party is shown in the illustration. It is by no means an uncommon spectacle in South-eastern Europe.

The unpopularity of the Jews is mainly due to the ability they possess in financial affairs. They succeed in trade where others fail, they lend money on mortgage, they discount bills, and in other ways gain money by business. The men who owe them money and the men who are their unsuccessful rivals in business rejoice in their expulsion, and are only too ready to set the machinery of the law in motion against them. Their unpopularity is extending, so that it is becoming increasingly difficult for them to find a place of refuge in which they can find a sphere for their talents. Evidently the Lord is stirring them from their resting-places and driving them into the wilderness, that He may prepare them for their settlement in their own land—an event which must now be near at hand.

A FRIEND IN NEED.

It was a dreary night in mid-winter. Rain was falling, and the wind, cold and icy, pelted the unfortunate pedestrians with it in their faces. Men were hurrying along to their homes from their work, and looking forward to the light and warmth with unusual longing. It was a night on which to appreciate a comfortable fireside and a substantial meal—a bad night, indeed, for any one without a home.

Outside a grand hotel a man was pacing wearily, watching anxiously every one who passed through its doors. He was poorly clad, and looked worn and haggard. He seemed scarcely conscious of the rain or cold. His whole attention was given to his quest. At last a well-dressed man descended from a carriage and entered the hotel, and the watcher followed him. Inside the doors he spoke, uttering some request in a subdued tone.

"I have nothing to give you," was the reply, spoken in a harsh, petulant voice. "It is of no use following me around, and if you come here again I shall hand you over to the police."

"But my wife and children are starving," urged the man. "One of them is ill, and we have neither doctor nor medicine for her, and the agent is going to turn us out of the house to-morrow. If you'll help me now I'll work on half pay till I've paid you honestly. The works will open again soon, won't they, sir?"

"I don't know. Perhaps they won't open again at all. Anyhow, I can't support you, and I won't. Now go."

"You'll be sorry for this some day," said the man, as he slunk away with downcast face, and the other turned to speak to a portly gentleman, whose appearance indicated that he was an Englishman of the wealthy class.

The two gentlemen went up to the capitalist's room, and were soon immersed in their negotiation. It continued nearly half an hour, and then the Englishman descended, and beckoned his servant, who was waiting for him below, to call his carriage. As he sallied forth to be driven to his hotel, he saw the man whose sad lot had touched him, leaning in a disconsolate attitude against the iron fence.

"You are in trouble, my man," he said. "Out of work, eh?"

"Yes, sir; I was just thinking whether I had better jump into the river. There seems no use for me in this world."

"Tut, tut, don't think of such a thing. It's wicked. Look here, I'll give you something. Here's half a crown—half a dollar, I mean. Go and get something to eat, and then come to me at my hotel. I'll see what can be done."

"God in heaven bless you, sir! I thought there was no pity in the world."

Half an hour later he was in the Englishman's room at the hotel, looking like another man, so changed was he by the hope within him.

"You would be willing to work, I suppose," said the Englishman, when he had heard the man's story.

"I'd be glad to. I don't want charity. If any man will give me work, here I am able and willing to do it."

"Well, I can put you right then. I am interested in some works here, and if you take that note"—handing him one—"to the manager, he will put you on."

"Thank you, sir; you've made a man of me."

"Now, tell me what you meant by saying to that gentleman just now that he would be sorry for not helping you."

"Well, sir, it was a safe thing to say. He is a Christian man—at least, he professes to be. Don't you think the Lord would have something to say to him if my child died for want of medicine or any of us suffered for want of food, while he has more money than he knows what to do with? I guess he would be called to account for it, and be sorry enough. Then there's something besides that. A boss who acts the hog like that is as good to the socialists as a paid agent. What aggravates them is that they get only the worst of the men. They can't get the decent, law-abiding men to join. But what they can't do, men like him do. They drive the quiet men into the socialist societies. If the bosses would do as you are doing—give us a helping hand when we are in a tight place—they would make friends of us instead of enemies. A time is coming when they will need friends. That is what I meant, sir. But I am glad you've saved me, for I don't want to be one of that socialist gang."

A Friend in Need.

"No, no; keep out of such company, my man."

"Thank you, sir, I will; but it was a tight pinch. We love our wives and children as much as a millionaire does his."

The Englishman understood him, and as he sat alone in his comfortable room when the man had left him, he thought seriously of what he had heard, and asked God to make his duty plain to him, for these men, as he saw now, were his brethren, whose needs he could not neglect without peril (1 John 3:17).

A FATAL FRAUD.

AN ORIGINAL SERIAL STORY OF WESTERN LIFE.

BY LEW VANDERPOOLE.

Reunion.

NINETEEN long years of separation! James Grey, holding his daughter in his arms, could scarcely realize that so long a time had elapsed since he had clasped her to his breast. To Alice it seemed quite as long a time. The years with her had been more eventful than with her father. Her memory, glancing back over them, saw so many incidents painful and pleasant in the field of life over which she had travelled, that it seemed as if the day on which she left her Vermont home was separated from this day when she again met her father by a vast interval.

She was overjoyed to see him, and the bitter resentment which she had cherished so long melted away in tears. Nevertheless, Alice was not the Alice of old days. James Grey saw the change even in his delight at the reconciliation. There was the old affection, the old charm of manner which he knew so well, but the woman of forty was not in spirit the girl of twenty from whom he parted twenty years ago. She was harder, colder, less impulsive, and, as James Grey perceived, seemed to be under some kind of constraint.

Twenty years of conflict with the world are not endured without important results perceptible to those who meet after that long interval. The believer, seeking always to grow in grace, learning from every struggle some great lesson, drawing closer in every crisis to his Saviour, is ever rising to higher levels in the divine life. Each victory, like each defeat, teaches him the same truth—that in himself he is utter weakness, but that in Christ he is invincible. So he becomes humble, more unselfish, more sympathetic with others—in a word, more like his Master. To the man who walks with God through a long life death seems to come unlike death. We rather think of him as the sacred record speaks of Enoch, "he was not, for God took him." But the man or woman who struggles with the world unaided, learns cunning, craft, subtlety, becomes wily and selfish, and loses the loveliness of character we so often see in youth. It was the latter road that Alice seemed to have travelled. She was not frank and open even with her father. Her story, even as she told it, was evidently not the whole truth, and much was left untold either because it was painful or shameful to speak of it. Well, he would not press her for details. Poor girl, she had clearly suffered much, and her life had not been happy. He was pleased to be reconciled, and to have her with him again that he might help her. On his side he was glad to let bygones be bygones, and that appeared to be Alice's desire.

Her story, as she chose to tell it, was brief. Little more than a year after her arrival in Italy, she became the mother of twin children—a boy and a girl. Shortly after their birth she contracted a terrible fever, which for a long time threatened her life. She was a long time delirious, and when she recovered her reason, she learned that her husband also had been prostrated by the same disease, and was not yet entirely restored. She said that he was completely changed by his illness, which had impaired his faculties, and left him mentally a wreck. His love of art was gone; his hand had lost its cunning, and his memory was a blank. Himself and their children he knew, but no one else. He had even forgotten the names of people, and places with which he was familiar in his youth. She begged her father to remember this when they met, and to be careful not to remark any lapses he might notice, as it distressed Stephen to have people notice a fact of which he was himself painfully conscious.

Alice's present circumstances were also unhappy. They were involved in a lawsuit, and were almost penniless. Stephen's parents were dead, and he came to America to claim the property to which he was heir. But the executors refused to put him in possession of it. They even doubted his identity, and Stephen himself, with his impaired memory, was unable to prove his title. He seemed to have forgotten everything connected with his life before he was seized with the fever. His failure to remember various details in connection with his father's estate had prejudiced the courts against him, and he could not, consequently, obtain the possession of his property. This last was very embarrassing; they had some money left, of course, but it was rapidly dwindling. It was hard to have one's belongings held from them upon the merest technicalities. Her husband, however, was showing signs of improvement, and might soon be able to convince the courts after all.

James Grey sighed. He was glad that he was so rich. He could care for Alice and her family, and his money should be used freely in the courts to get justice for Stephen. Still it was hard to think that Alice's husband was in a condition to need such friendship. Was the trouble which had come upon his darling child the working out of the terrible words he had uttered, and the wicked wishes he had indulged when she left his roof before—before he had realized his wicked, stubborn injustice? He feared that it was. Alice had suffered, as in those days he wished—almost prayed that she might suffer, and he wondered if his sin against her could ever be atoned for by all the kindness he was now prepared to lavish upon her.

In person Alice did not seem to have been a severe sufferer. She was as beautiful as ever, though with a maturer loveliness. The woman of forty looked scarce thirty, and the gravity and dignity of her manner gave her new charms. The slight, supple figure of the maiden had developed without losing its grace. Under Italian skies her complexion had taken a richer tint, and she was still a woman whom a painter would delight to draw.

Stephen, on the other hand, was strangely changed. James Grey was not surprised that the executors had doubted his identity. Alice, after relating her story, went in search of him, and brought him to her father, and the latter, looking at him, confessed to himself that he would not have recognized his son-in-law had Alice not been there to introduce him. Excepting his dark hair, eyes, and complexion, there was nothing about him to remind one of the young artist who married Alice Grey nineteen years before.

Dissipation, or something worse, had made his once fine, delicate features coarse, brutal, and sensual. His appearance shocked and pained James Grey. He could scarcely believe that this vicious, scowling animal was the once bright, handsome, charming Stephen Vane to whom he had given his child.

"Poor Allie," he said, calling her by her baby name. "Poor, poor Allie!"

It seemed terrible to think that she was bound to such a creature.

Alice's two children—Merton, the son, and Myrtie, the daughter—were the bright side of the picture.

Myrtie looked as her mother did before her marriage, and Merton reminded his grandfather of Stephen Vane when the latter came to Vermont to paint the old mountains near Arlington.

How strange it seemed to the old man to have these two handsome young people introduced to him! He had pictured to himself Alice placing a baby in his arms, while, perhaps, another little toddler was holding to her skirts. But here was a young man as tall as himself, strong and manly in form, calling him grandfather. And Myrtie, slight and graceful, but womanly, kissed him gravely, almost with a blush, as if telling him that as a stranger he ought to be grateful for an honor accorded to few. Mr. Grey's head was bewildered, but his heart was captured. These two took possession of it at once. Indeed, toward Myrtie he felt a tenderness equal to his affection for his own daughter. It seemed to him that in her, more than in Alice, his daughter was come back to him. He could not refrain from addressing her as "Alice," so much did she resemble the dear girl who left him nineteen years ago. He was never tired of talking to her and listening to her musical voice. He brought sunshine into the house with his wealth, while they brought sunshine into his heart with their affection. He was no longer the lonely old man for whom no one cared. Here were his own descendants, his own flesh and blood, for him to love and provide for.

Soon after the arrival of James Grey the courts surrendered to Stephen Vane his father's property, and the family went to live in Richmond. James Grey then willed his property to Alice and her children, and was glad to know that their future was so secure.

After prosperity came back to them Stephen Vane became less moody and disagreeable. He made an effort to be pleasant and cheerful, and James Grey began to think that there was some good in his son-in-law after all.

Mr. Grey lived with the family. The thought of separation, even so slight a separation as sleeping under another roof, was painful to him. The long-dormant yearning of his heart for the love of kindred seemed now to be insatiable. He was never happy unless Alice or Myrtie was with him, and he delighted in having Merton, too, within sight, but was nervously apprehensive of making the young man restive by too close an attendance in his home. With Stephen Vane he talked little. There was a coarseness about all his thoughts and words which wounded the old man. He was kind and friendly after a fashion, but it seemed to require an effort, and Mr. Grey, desiring above all things to remain in friendly relations with him, did not seek his society. He had an idea, which he did not like to acknowledge even to himself, that the less he saw of his son-in-law the better he would like him. He had his daughter and his two grandchildren, and with them he was happy. He often said during those days that such felicity was more than he deserved.

Everything ran along smoothly for several months, until one day when a letter bearing a curious seal came for Stephen.

He began trembling the moment he saw the seal, and when he opened the letter his face became livid, and his agitation increased. An agony of horror seemed to take possession of him.

"I must go to New York at once," he said, as soon as he could calm himself. "A very foolish friend of mine is in deep and serious trouble. I must hasten to his assistance." His hands were trembling visibly, and his whole frame shook as if in terror. He hastily collected a few things in the room and hurried out to pack a valise for his journey. In his agitation he left the letter on the table. Almost instantly he returned and seized it, but not before James Grey had read the single line it contained:

"London, May 7th. The man has escaped. J. T. B."

Stephen looked furtively at his father-in-law and his wife, both of whom were seated in the room, as if he would read in their faces whether they had caught sight of the intelligence the letter contained, but he asked no questions, and hurried away to prepare for his journey. Half an hour later, having uttered hasty farewells, he quitted the house for the depot.

His steps had scarcely passed beyond hearing when Alice was at her father's side. "Tell me, father," she said, "what was in that letter to agitate Stephen like that? I noticed that you saw it."

Mr. Grey admitted that he did, and, as there was no need of concealment between them, he told her what he had read. Evidently the line was as much a mystery to Alice as to Mr. Grey himself.

"Who is J. T. B. of London?" he asked. "I have not the slightest idea," said Alice. "I cannot think of any one with those initials, and I do not know a soul in London. Stephen was there for some days before we returned to America, and he had business there, but I never knew anything of its character."

"I am afraid, my dear, that it was not of creditable nature. There is some dark mystery in the affair that, I fear, implies wrong-doing of some kind. Some man was being held inurance whose freedom Stephen has reason to dread. The fact is known, too, for the letter is clearly intended as a warning to him. Then, again, his perturbation was extreme, and the excuse for his journey was a falsehood on the face of it. Stephen is not the man I took him to be." In his subdued, chastened spirit Mr. Grey forbore to remind his daughter of the reluctance with which he had consented to the marriage. She, however, noticed and appreciated his delicacy, and going to his side she put an arm around his neck and kissed him.

"Dear father," she said, "I have been an ungrateful daughter to you. I have caused you sore distress. Can you forgive me?"

"I do, my darling, I do. You are all the world to me. I would willingly lay down what remains to me of life if its sacrifice could bring happiness to you. I can see that you are miserable, and I fear there is no remedy while your husband lives. He is not worthy of you."

"I dare not say that, father. He is not worthy of the girl I was when I left your roof. But I have fallen, oh, so deeply! I deserve nothing better than what I am suffering at his hands, and I am thankful that your protection saves me from what might be worse. When I was ill and weak, and scarcely in possession of my senses he tempted me, and I fell. Starvation was staring me in the face—starvation among strangers. I had not a friend in the world, and I became a partner with him—a confederate in a crime which I dare not disclose even to you. I am a guilty woman, and I deserve my punishment."

"Dear Alice, I do not wish you to confess to me. If I can help you, you will tell me how, and I will do it at any cost. But for yourself, let me urge you to go to the unfailing Source of consolation and strength. Do not let your guilt keep you away from the Saviour. He longs to receive the penitent, and you will be welcome. I have prayed for you through many years. It was your dear mother's dying wish that you might be brought to trust in Jesus. Perhaps that is why you are being so severely tried. God is drawing you to Himself. Go to Him, my love, and you will be met with infinite compassion. Tell Him everything, and ask His pardon. It will be given you freely, and you will be taught your duty. You are in the wrong path now. Concealment is never the right road. Ask God for wisdom and strength to do right."

The old man in his earnest pleading had grasped his daughter's hands in his, and he looked at her through fast gathering tears.

"Oh, father, I cannot—I cannot! You do not know how wicked I am. I dare not go to God in prayer with my sins upon my head. I must confess first, and then I would ask you to plead for me. I dare not go to Him myself. I must confess, but I cannot."

"Can I help you, my dear? This man is not Stephen Vane; he is an impostor who has persuaded you to help him obtain your husband's property? That is it, is it not? He is not Stephen Vane, is he?"

"Oh, yes, father, he is Stephen Vane. But I do not wonder that you are doubtful. He is so brutal, so deceitful that you cannot think he is the man you knew in those happy times at Arlington. I cannot tell you now. Give me till to-morrow. I am too much agitated now to say more, but I will try to tell you all. But the very thought of it is frightful to me now."

She gasped as if her breath was stopping, and her face worked painfully. He caught her in his arms and kissed her tenderly.

They sat side by side for a long time and the father stroked her fair hair as he used to when she was a child.

It seemed to soothe her, for she became calmer, and presently she smiled. They had a long talk about old times that night, and he did not go to his room until it was very late.

In the morning he did not come down to breakfast. A little before noon they rapped at his door, but received no answer. In an agony of apprehension Alice had the door broken open, and there in the middle of the floor lay her father dead and cold. She flung herself down beside him in anguish, weeping as those weep whose last friend death has taken. She thought of his devotion, of his tender love; and her tears flowed freely.

But how had he died? There was a gash on his forehead, but that Alice supposed had been inflicted by his fall. The physician for whom they sent thought otherwise. The gash was not sufficient to have caused his death, and it had been caused by a blow not by a fall. Gradually it became clear to them that James Grey had been murdered.

CAPTIVITY OF JUDAH.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 24, II Kings 25: 1-12. Golden Text, Jer. 29: 13. By Mrs. M. Baxter. The Curse of the Broken Law—Long Withheld—Must Fall upon the Nation—An All-pervading Curse—The Law of the Sabbatical Year—The Sabbath Faith Keeps—The Corrupt Nation—The City Besieged—The King Captured—Jerusalem Pillaged.

The iniquity of the children of Judah was at last full (Gen. 15: 16), and the forbearance of God could hold out no more. The curse of the broken law must come upon His people. God must keep His Word in judgment as He had always kept it in mercy. He had declared that if His people would not hearken unto Him, all the curses mentioned in Deut. 28: 15-63, Lev. 26: 14-43 must come upon them. The judgment of God was to touch them in the city, in the field, in their basket, and in their store, in the fruit of their body, their land, their kine, and their sheep. "The Lord shall bring a nation against thee from far. . . . And He shall besiege thee in all thy gates, until thy high and fenced walls come down, wherein thou trustedst, throughout thy land, . . . which the Lord thy God hath given thee" (Deut. 28: 49-52). "And I will bring a sword upon you, that shall avenge the quarrel of My covenant. . . . And I will make your cities waste, and bring your sanctuaries into desolation. . . . And I will scatter you among the heathen, and will draw out a sword after you: and your land shall be desolate, and your cities waste. Then shall the land as long as it lieth desolate, and ye shall be in your enemies' land; even then shall the land rest, and enjoy her Sabbaths. As long as it lieth desolate it shall rest; because it did not rest in your Sabbaths, when ye dwelt upon it."

The law of the Sabbath (Ex. 23: 10; Lev. 25: 1-13) was one which called for real faith on the part of God's people. They had to trust Him that the produce of the land on the sixth year should suffice for that and the two following years, without any tilling of the ground (Lev. 25: 19-22). But human reasoning had prevailed among the people, God's law was set aside, neither the land nor the people enjoyed the Sabbath which God had provided, and thus He must take matters into His own hands, "To fulfil the word of the Lord by the mouth of Jeremiah, until the land had enjoyed her Sabbaths: for as long as she lay desolate she kept Sabbath, to fulfil threescore and ten years" (II Chron. 36: 21). Seven seventies make four hundred and ninety. Add this to the date of the captivity, 610, and it brings us to the time of King Saul. Thus the failure to keep Sabbath must have commenced in the time of the Judges, when "there was no king in Israel: every man did that which was right in his own eyes" (Judges 21: 25).

Why should the law of the Sabbath assume such proportions in the eyes of our God? Surely because He is the chief Worker. If we assume such responsibility in the care of our own souls, or those of others, in the care of our Christian work, our business, our family, our physical health, or any other thing—as to take the burden upon ourselves—we are ignoring the fact that God careth for us, and we are putting Him out of His cherished place as our Father.

FAITH RESTS.

"We which have believed do enter into rest" (Heb. 4: 3). We keep Sabbath because God is at work. The children of Israel could not trust God to feed them during the sabbatical year, and so they failed to keep Sabbath. The failure to trust Him about the common things of life opened the way for trust in false gods. His people, failing to have direct dealing with Him about the common affairs of life, lost the opportunity to prove His faithfulness, and so the knowledge of God failed in the land. In many ways our loving God teaches us that He would have us dependent upon Him for everything. "In everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known unto God" (Phil. 4: 6). Pray without ceasing; in everything give thanks (I Thess. 5: 17, 18). "Without Me ye can do nothing" (John 15: 5). "Casting all your care on Him, for He careth for you" (I Pet. 5: 7). Now, as we rest one thing after another over upon God, we learn to keep Sabbath, or enter into rest about that thing, because God has engaged Himself to carry it through just as He undertook to provide the children of Israel with food when their land kept Sabbath. "There remaineth therefore a rest [margin, "keeping of a Sabbath"] to the people of God. For he that is entered into His rest, he also hath ceased from his own works, as God did from His" (Heb. 4: 9, 10). Our Sabbath-keeping is to take our hands off from that which God undertakes, and when we fail to do this, and continue to worry and fret, and make efforts, God brings us into captivity by loss of health, of property, or of friends, "until the land has enjoyed her Sabbaths." God wants the Sabbath to sink down into our souls and to become part of our very being.

THE CORRUPT NATION.

The history of Judah's captivity is a sad one, and yet our loving God dealt with His people in love. Just as in Pharaoh's case, so in Zedekiah's: God made use of their own wilful hardness of heart to accomplish His purposes. Zedekiah "rebelled against king Nebuchadnezzar, who had made him swear by God" (II Chron. 36: 13). "He despised the oath by breaking the covenant, when lo, he had given his hand" (Ezek. 17: 18). "But he stiffened his neck, and hardened his heart from turning unto the Lord God of Israel" (II Chron. 36: 13, 14). "Through the anger of the Lord it came to pass . . . that Zedekiah rebelled against the king of Babylon" (II Kings 24: 20). We see in comparing these passages God's side and man's side in the rebellion of Zedekiah. But the king was not alone in his guilt. "Moreover, all the chief of the priests, and the people transgressed very much, after all the abominations of the heathen, and polluted the house of the Lord which He had hallowed in Jerusalem; . . . they mocked the messengers of God, and despised His words, and misused His prophets, until the wrath of the Lord arose against His people until there was no remedy [margin, no healing]."

THE SIEGE.

The foolish king, whom God had lovingly warned by Jeremiah that Nebuchadnezzar would conquer him and take him captive, and his people, unless he submitted and surrendered himself (Jer. 38: 14-23), yet took his own headstrong way, and held out the siege eighteen months, until "the famine prevailed in the city, there was no bread for the people of the land." What the sufferings of the besieged must have been during that time it would be impossible to imagine. The people were guilty as well as the king, and truly they must have suffered. We cannot disobey God without suffering. He would always lead us "beside the still waters" (Ps. 23: 2) if we would let Him; He would guide us with His eye (Ps. 32: 8, 9) if we would not be like the horse and mule, which have no understanding, whose mouths must be held in with bit and bridle. Oh, how many sicknesses might be spared if we would watch the Lord and sit at His feet to listen to what He says to us! Oh, how much thwarting of our will should we escape if we took for granted at all times that the Lord knows better than we do, and if we yielded instantaneously to Him! So long as we persist in having our own way, we act as though we knew better than God, and as though He were not doing a Father's part, and neglected the interests of His children. According to our unbelief must it be unto us.

THE KING CAPTURED.

It was a sad story, "the city was broken up," that very city which God had chosen for His habitation (Ps. 132: 13), the very "city of the great king," where God was "known in her palaces as a Refuge" (Ps. 48: 2, 3). "All the men of war fled, . . . and the king went the way toward the plain." Hopeless flight! Zedekiah was not fleeing only from Nebuchadnezzar, but from God, who had declared, "The prince that is among them [Zedekiah] shall bear upon his shoulder in the twilight, and shall go forth. . . . My net also will I spread upon him, and he shall be taken in My snare: and I will bring him to Babylon, to the land of the Chaldeans; yet shall he not see it, though he shall die there" (Ezek. 12: 12, 13). So it happened the army of the Chaldeans pursued after the king, and overtook him in the plains of Jericho: and all his army were scattered from him. So they took the king, and brought him to the king of Babylon to Riblah; and they gave judgment upon him. And then the poor rebellious king had to undergo the agony of seeing his sons put to death before his eyes, and then to have his own eyes put out, so that, although bound with fetters of brass and taken captive into the land of the Chaldeans, he did not see it.

JERUSALEM PILLAGED.

One month later Nebuchadnezzar sent his general, Nebuzar-adan, to Jerusalem, and the whole city, including the beautiful temple, was burnt with fire, and the very walls of the city were broken down. But all the vessels of the house of the Lord, and all the treasures of the palace were carried away to Babylon, the beautiful pillars of brass and the brazen sea were broken up and carried to Babylon, and thus the word of the Lord was fulfilled, and Jerusalem laid desolate. None were left in Jerusalem but "the poor of the land," who were left to be "vine-dressers and husbandmen." It is a mournful story, and one which has been repeated in many a Christian church and many a Christian heart. The Lord claims obedience, and every disobedience must receive "a just recompense of reward" (Heb. 2: 2). He calls us to keep Sabbath by living a life of constant dependence upon Him. If we fail to do this we come in some way or other into captivity, in some way or other the strength of body, or the spiritual experience, or the wisdom in which we have trusted, fails us, and we find ourselves in captivity until we have learned to keep Sabbath, and to rest truly and entirely in the Lord.

"ABIDE IN ME."

Abide in me, O Lord, and I in Thee,
From this good hour, oh leave me nevermore;
Then shall the discord cease, the wound be healed,
The life-long bleeding of the soul be o'er.

Abide in me; o'ershadow by Thy love
Each half-formed purpose and dark thought of sin;
Quench ere it rise each selfish, low desire,
And keep my soul as Thine, calm and divine.

As some rare perfume, in a vase of clay,
Pervades it with a fragrance not its own,
So, when Thou dwellest in a mortal soul,
All heaven's own sweetness seems around it thrown.

Abide in me: there have been moments blest,
When I have heard Thy voice and felt Thy power;
Then evil lost its grasp; and passion, hushed,
Owned the divine enchantment of the hour.

These were but seasons beautiful and rare;
Abide in me, and they shall ever be;
Fulfill at once Thy precept and my prayer—
Come, and abide in me, and I in Thee.

—Harriet B. Stowe.

BEN HOGAN, the Converted Pugilist—Scenes in His Life.

BEN HOGAN, The Converted Crook.

Born in Switzerland in 1843—Removal to Germany—Immigration to New York in 1853—School Life at Syracuse—A Year's Imprisonment—At Work in His Father's Shop—A Runaway—Four Years of Sea Life—Becomes a Professional Boxer—"Bounty Jumping"—Wrecked—Sentenced to Death—Career in the Oil Regions—Arrest for Murder—Projected Trip to Paris Abandoned—Conversion at New York—Subsequent Evangelistic Work.

THE converted, consecrated man, whether he be learned or illiterate, whether he be eloquent or of halting tongue, can be used of God if he be willing to forget himself, and place himself at the Lord's disposal. Peter, an unlettered fisherman, and Paul the disciple of Gamaliel, were both called to the work of the apostleship, and both found abundant opportunities for useful labor. So in our day there are audiences which the cultured preacher can be used to move, and other audiences which would not respond to his appeals, but to which the words of an untutored speaker would come as a message of power. The silver trumpet and the ram's horn are alike efficacious in the hand of God, and both can be used in their respective spheres. Thus the late Jerry McAulay, who seemed to the educated classes but ill prepared for the work of preaching the Gospel, had the joy of seeing souls won to the Saviour by God's blessing on his plain, simple words, and of hearing many testify that through him they were brought to a knowledge of the truth. It has been so, and in the same line with the evangelist whose portrait appears this week on our first page. Ben Hogan is being used to carry the Gospel message to a class who seldom listen to university-trained preachers, and are still more seldom benefited by them. He understands by experience their ways, their dialect, their modes of thought, their temptations and their difficulties; and he, like his learned brethren, finds the Gospel to be the power of God and the wisdom of God. In his hands and in theirs the message is the same, however widely may differ the words in which it is delivered. He is emphatically the messenger to the "ignorant and those who are out of the way," and God is using him for their enlightenment.

Ben Hogan was born in the city of Berne, Switzerland, on October 12th, 1843, and is therefore in his forty-third year. His parents were of German and French extraction. Ben was the eldest of the children, and from childhood was a strong, muscular, active boy. When he was three years of age, the family removed to Wurttemberg, Germany, where they resided for seven years, when, in 1853, the family emigrated to the United States, landing at New York.

Ben's father was assisted with the money with which to go to America, and upon landing in New York he was robbed of every dollar he had left, and

THE FAMILY WERE PENNILESS, this time in a strange land. They succeeded eventually in reaching Syracuse, N. Y., and there settled, the father obtaining employment at his trade—that of a cabinet-maker. He was a steady, industrious man, and when he died, seven or eight years ago, he was respected and esteemed by all who knew him.

AN EVILDOER.

At Syracuse, Ben was anxious to attend the public schools, and acquire an English education, but was compelled by his father to attend a German Catholic school, which so incensed the lad, who thought himself "Dutch enough already," that, in order to escape the school, he threw a handful of snuff in the teacher's face, on the third day of his attendance, and ended his school days forever. (See Illustration No. 1 on first page.)

Such an outrage could not be overlooked, and Ben was arrested and sent to the House of Refuge. It was hoped by that means to subdue his spirit, and break down his strong, determined will, but the result was his absolute ruin.

He says now that he learned more sin, more crime, more meanness and general wickedness during the one year he spent in the House of Refuge, than he ever learned in any five years of his after life. In saying this, he is not arraignment the institution as such, but is speaking particularly of the indiscriminate association of boys hardened in crime—born and educated criminals, so to speak—with boys who are merely mischievous. Upon being released at the end of the year, Ben was set to work in the shop with his father, to learn the cabinet-maker's trade. (See Illustration No. 2 on first page.) But his association with the boys at the Refuge had implanted other ideas of life in his mind. The restraint chafed and annoyed him, and for some slight provocation he gave the foreman a sound thrashing, and, in company with three other boys ran away from home, determined to see the world for himself.

The proposed destination was New York. At Schenectady he obtained employment in cutting broom corn, at which he earned $15, and pushed on toward New York alone, the other boys returning home. His journey to New York occupied six weeks, and upon his arrival he shipped as a cabin-boy on a French steamer, and sailed as such for four years, during which time the captain formed a strong attachment for him, and constituted himself guardian of the boy. During these

FOUR YEARS OF SEA LIFE

Ben saved up the sum of $300, which he sent to his father, but sent no line or word which would furnish a clue as to who the sender was. On shipboard Ben achieved distinction as a strong, active sailor, but also as an unruly, quarrelsome fellow, always fighting and always ready for a mill.

Hogan left the sea, at the age of seventeen or eighteen, and took lessons in boxing. He rapidly rose to the position of teacher, and was looked upon by professionals as a promising expert, who would gain notoriety in the "ring." He made considerable money at this time by starring tours through the States, accompanied by leading sparrers and boxers, giving exhibitions in the principal cities and towns.

During the war, Hogan and forty other reckless men organized themselves as smugglers. They also included in their enterprise. The party started from New York City, and on the first trip seven of the forty were killed by the Regulars at Jersey City—and of the forty who engaged in the business, all were either killed or drowned except two—Hogan and one other. He ran the blockade of Charleston twice, with a consignment of quinine and whiskey, by which he realized large sums of money. His trips would occupy him from one to four months, and frequently he would return with from fifty to two hundred thousand dollars in Confederate money, which he exchanged in Canada. He was twice shipwrecked while thus engaged, once off Cape Hatteras and once off Cape Lookout. (See Illustration No. 3 on first page.) At Washington, at length, he was arrested and sentenced to be shot, but through the interposition of friends he was pardoned by President Lincoln.

After the war, Hogan went to Pit Hole, Penn. General Burnside was building a railroad there, and the oil excitement was at its height. There he opened a sporting resort, and also took charge of a variety theatre. In company with Captain J. B. Smith, Hogan started from Oil City, travelling with a company giving exhibitions in the towns of the Oil Regions, and when the company disbanded he went to Babylon and opened a place of amusement—a place which was called a "perfect terror," and which has probably never had its equal. Here he became involved in a shooting affair, in which four men were shot, one of whom died in a few days afterward, and one about two months later. Hogan

but on the trial was acquitted on the plea of self-defence. He was advised to leave the Oil Regions, for a time at least, and accordingly went to Saratoga Springs. His departure was hastened by learning that for selling liquor without a license had been issued against him. He went to Rochdale, N. Y., where he opened a sparring gallery and drinking bar. The oil excitement attracted him to Petrolia, to which place Hogan removed, and built two opera-houses. He did an enormous business, and became wealthy.

When the oil excitement in Petrolia subsided, Hogan went regularly into

in its most profitable departments. He was particularly expert in "the sawdust trick," now so common. The mode of operations was to send to some unprincipled people in a distant State, information that Hogan had some forged bills of one of their own national banks for sale. One or more of the gang would come on to look at the money. Hogan would show him genuine bills, and sell him one ten-dollar bill for $2 as a test. The man would mail it to his own State, and have it passed there. Being genuine, of course, it would be taken readily. Then the man would be ready to negotiate for the whole parcel of five thousand, usually at the rate of twenty or twenty-five cents to the dollar. Hogan would receive the man in a decent office (see Illustration No. 4 on first page.) and arrange the sale. Genuine bills would be sold and packed in a satchel. Then the purchaser having paid over his $1000, had to be robbed of his purchase in some way. Sometimes the satchel would be taken away and another filled with worthless paper or sawdust, substituted in the office while the purchaser's attention was diverted; or it would be snatched from his hand as he went to the railroad station; or, in some other way it would be taken from him.

This and similar crooked work kept Hogan in funds, and he opened bar-rooms in other places. His reputation as a gambler, betting-man, pugilist, and general crook spread throughout the oil regions, and his places always attracted men of that class wherever he located himself. His name in connection with any bar-room sufficed to make it a popular resort for the worst men in any town, and insured a lucrative business.

In 1878, the French Exposition opened, and Hogan thought he would like to see it. The police here were getting unpleasantly attentive, a European trip would be pleasant, and perhaps he might see an opportunity in Paris of getting in some crooked work, perhaps of opening a regular bar for American visitors. Hogan determined to go. He left his bar-keeper to run his place in his absence, and took the train for New York to engage his passage for Europe, having $10,000 in his pocket. In New York he met several old friends and was easily persuaded to stay a week or two and enjoy himself. The Paris trip was postponed, and Hogan began his "good time" in the metropolis. Drinking, gambling, theatre-going, and dissipation generally, made the time pass quickly, and had some effect on the wad of bills in his pocket.

IN A GOSPEL MEETING.

One night feeling tired and weary, half-sufficed with vile pleasure, he wandered out aimlessly not much caring how he spent the evening. He walked up Broadway, and as he passed a building he heard music and singing. Being fond of music, and thinking it an entertainment of some kind, he turned into the hall (see Illustration No. 5 on first page.) and without knowing the nature and character of the meeting, took a seat near the centre of the house. To his surprise, Charles Sawyer, the evangelist, arose, and, opening the Bible, began to read. Now Hogan had attended a great many gatherings in his life, but never within his recollection had he attended a religious meeting, and the to him ridiculous position in which he found himself at this time, touched him humorously, and he inwardly laughed at himself for the extraordinary blunder he had made. He had never attended Sunday-school, did not know how to read, and had never heard a chapter or heard a verse of the Bible read in his life, that he could recall, so that he was as totally ignorant of the precepts and teachings of Christianity as one could well be in an enlightened land.

Charles Sawyer was relating his own experience, telling the story of his life that night, and Hogan was soon deeply interested, and when the speaker reached, in the recital, the period of his conversion to Christ, of his awakening to the terrible, awful sinfulness and wickedness of his course,

HOGAN SAT SPELL-BOUND,

his eyes riveted upon the speaker, and the perspiration standing in great drops upon his forehead. That night he saw his past life as he had never seen it before; he left the place dazed—like one in a dream, and reached his rooms, he does not know how or when. The day following is entirely forgotten, but the succeeding night he found himself in a chapel in the Bowery, and Charles Sawyer was again preaching the Gospel; and six converts gave their testimony. On this night Hogan

SIGNED THE TEMPERANCE PLEDGE.

The next night he went to the Five Points House of Industry, where Sawyer and his friends were holding a meeting. His interest had now intensified, and his past life loomed up before him like a threatening spectre; sleep was impossible, and despair was written all over his face. Passing in front of the looking-glass in his chamber the following morning, after a night of terrible struggling with himself, he caught sight of his own pale, haggard, terrible countenance; he stood gazing for a moment, and to his amazement found himself before his God asking forgiveness for his many sins, in strong supplications and entreaties. (See Illustration No. 6 on first page.)

ON HIS KNEES

The struggle was long and intense, and left him completely exhausted, but when it had passed Hogan rose with new resolves. He rushed downstairs, encountering the landlord, who thought him insane, and who with great difficulty quieted him and finally induced him to take a little rest and go to sleep. He did so, and on awakening, he sent for a Bible, and got some one to read it to him. That night he went to Mr. Sawyer's meeting, and told what had occurred. The change in the man astonished every one. Every night he was at some Gospel or temperance meeting, telling the story of his change of heart and life.

COMMENCES SERVICE.

Mr. Moody was holding meetings in Baltimore, Md., and there Hogan went to hear the great evangelist, and consult with him about his future life. Moody heard his story, and invited him to speak at his meeting. Hogan did so (see Illustration No. 7 on first page), and his words were blessed to some present. By the advice of Mr. Moody and other friends, Hogan started for a Gospel tour in the West, intending to go as far as Leadville, Col., and there hold an extended series of services. His first service was at Pittsburg, Pa., thence he went to Butler, Pa., where his meeting was attended by lawyers, judges, and a large crowd of his former pals, all curious to hear the notorious "crook" preach the Gospel. He went from town to town through the oil regions, and everywhere the same interest was manifested and good was done. There was so much work ready to his hand in Pennsylvania, that he decided to postpone the Western tour.

From Pennsylvania Hogan went to Northfield, Mass., to attend Mr. Moody's Convention, and was cordially welcomed by the evangelist and his friends. He worked for some time at various towns in Connecticut with considerable success, some notorious desperadoes being won from evil courses at his meetings. He subsequently conducted a mission in one of the worst districts in Brooklyn, N. Y., after which he went to Chicago, to assist Major Whittle in his work at Farwell Hall. At its conclusion, the Evangelists' Committee rented a place on Madison Street for him, and it was called Ben Hogan's Mission. There a motley crowd gathered nightly to whom Hogan talked in the dialect with which they were familiar. Drunkards, thieves, pugilists, and the victims of vice came in numbers to hear how one like themselves had been rescued. They were curious discourses that they heard, but good was done, and souls were saved. If scholarly sermons, with well rounded periods had been preached there, it is not likely that so much could have been said of the result.

The Western tour, however, had laid hold on Hogan's heart, and he was uneasy till he had accomplished it. Leaving Chicago he set out; but first he paid a flying visit to New York. Francis Murphy was holding a meeting at the time in Cooper Union, and Hogan spoke. "It was strange," he said to him, to find himself "on the same platform with Murphy." When he was keeping a saloon in Pittsburg, Pa., he had contracted a mortal aversion to Murphy, and he was a great deal more disposed to kill him than to help him in his work. Murphy had drawn away some of his best customers from the saloon, and spoiled them as customers. He had tried to organize an attempt to break up Murphy's meetings at Pittsburg. Now so changed was he that he was glad to help him. (See Illustration No. 8 on first page.)

IN THE WEST.

Hogan's Western tour has been a success. All through Colorado, Utah, Nebraska and California, New Mexico and Texas, he held meetings with success. At Denver and Leadville especially, he found audiences that suited him, and the people listened to him with profit and delight. At Omaha, Neb., also his work has been much blessed. The Omaha Herald of November 24th, 1885, says: "The revival under the auspices of Ben Hogan, at the First Methodist Church, is a big success. Last night the religious feeling was intense, thirty standing up for prayer, and many claiming complete conversion." The church was well filled, and Mr. Hogan discoursed with his accustomed earnestness. Sunday night's service, at the First Baptist church, was a great success in every particular. The large building was crowded to overflowing, and the results were more than ordinarily encouraging to the evangelist. Mr. Hogan is doing good work in Omaha."

Ben Hogan retains the personal vigor of his pugilistic days; he stands five feet eight inches high, weighs one hundred and eighty pounds, and is a well-built, powerful man whom one would rather meet peaceably on a platform than as an opponent in a ring. He speaks extemporaneously, never making use of notes or memoranda, and while he is not always mindful of the rules of grammar, he is always earnest, forcible and logical. He keeps his point well in hand, draws his illustrations from every-day life and experience, emphasizes with easy, moving gestures, which at times are impressive, and, notwithstanding his quaint, odd sentences and homely phrases, the good common-sense and magnetism of the man never fail to entertain and hold his audience, or to leave behind a good impression.

A WOUNDED BULGARIAN.

In a letter from Mrs. Mumford, a devoted Christian lady, who is in Bulgaria, the following interesting incident of the recent war is narrated: "I find myself unexpectedly here (at Sophia), in cold weather, in hospital among wounded soldiers. It seems to be my lot to get into such places. And, although I would not cut off a chicken's head for a great deal, I can assist a surgeon to cut off legs or take out eyes without wincing. Indeed, I myself took out a bullet from a woman's back in the other war. She was in my hospital."

"I wish to tell you how my soldier, who telegraphed for me, was given back to life when all the doctors had given him up. A very skilful surgeon from Berlin came to see him, and passed the usual opinion: 'Peritonitis from gunshot wound in the bowels is fatal.' I had not felt so deeply since I went to my wounded husband, and my soldier boy had all the symptoms of approaching death. That day was one of anguish for us; no medicine helped, the doctors powerless, my brave boy, strong and vigorous, desired to live. He gave up all hope from earthly sources, and begged me to pray to God to save him. He at first prayed for forgiveness for all his sins, and promised to be the Lord's, from this time on to serve Him faithfully. The disease had attacked the lungs, and the pain was so great and so constant that he could hardly keep quiet enough to listen to my prayer in his behalf, which was very brief, but to the point—that if the Lord saw that he would live for Him, and other souls, then let the disease be removed and his sufferings cease? The answer was as if the Lord had taken him by the hand, as He did Peter's mother-in-law. It was not five minutes before he became quiet and went to sleep. The swelling subsided, and, by the time the doctor made his morning round, my brave soldier boy was on the road to life and health. I give him now no medicine, and he continues to improve without any drawback."

THE PERFECT PEACE.

MRS. BRODIE, of British Honduras, whose many friends in America rejoiced in her presence here last spring, is now in England preparing to return to her own land. A few words from her pen published in Thy Healer of December 15th, show how the Lord's dealings with soul and body have in her case, as in others, produced a heavenly calm which none can know but those who live near to God. She says:

"When Jesus permits a trouble, when He takes our restless wills, He gives us something far better. None of us know our own mind or will from one minute to another, but Jesus knows everything about us; and He—the Unchangeable—just comes in and leads us into His own perfect will, moment by moment. Then, though that will may cross our natural will, and may in the crossing give intense pain, there is at the same moment intense sweetness in the quiet acceptance of the will of God. When I left my home in America last April, there was before me a grand and lovely picture of how this visit to England was to be spent, how much I was to do, and how much I was to take back; and it has all been entirely different! There has been far more blessing than I anticipated, but much that I expected has not come to pass, but I see now that it is all right."

"And I see also that the Lord is asking me to go back very shortly to my home in Honduras. When I left it I could not bear the thought of ever going back, but now I am just longing to go. I see too that He is calling me to leave behind me my little boy, who was the means of bringing to me the message of healing; and I am so thankful that He knows just every pang of my heart, and that in every pang He just speaks peace; and He Himself comes right in—He does not leave an empty space. Though there are tears, He just so quickly wipes them away; and I am beginning to find that He does not want us to cry; He wants to keep our 'eyes from tears.' And amid so many difficulties and trials, it is blessed to know that Jesus is preparing the way all over the world for His coming again. He may come very quickly. My little boy says: 'Jesus may come before we are long parted, and then we shall meet at His feet.'"

"I have received a precious letter from a young native girl in Honduras, who was converted at one of our meetings, and who has been healed of fits. I told her Jesus was willing to heal, not only in New York, in London, in Germany, but also in our own little country, and we took her trouble to the Lord and she has been healed; and now I hear that she and several others are meeting together and asking God to send me back to the old country with fresh tidings of His love."

THE CHOICE OF A HUSBAND.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached Last Sunday Morning, January 17, 1886.

"The Lord grant you that ye may find rest, each of you in the house of her husband."—RUTH 1:9.

Voluntary Celibacy—A Beneficent Spinster—Her Glimpse of Heaven—Illustrious Spinsters—The Choice Limited—Partners to Beware of—Scoffers—Men of Bad Habits—Men Wedded to the World—Chatterton's Cynical Delight—The Two Journeys from the Cradle—Men Who Advise—Who to Marry—Independent Men—Beware of the Perfect—Self-Denying Husbands—A Wedding Scene—Remember the Old Home.

THIS was the prayer of pious Naomi for Ruth and Orpah, and is an appropriate prayer now in behalf of unmarried womanhood. Naomi, the good old soul, knew that the devil would take their cases in hand if God did not, so she prays: "The Lord grant you that ye may find rest, each of you in the house of her husband."

In this series of sermons on "The Marriage Ring" I last Sabbath gave prayerful and Christian advice to men in regard to the selection of a wife, and to-day I give the same prayerful and Christian advice to women in regard to the selection of a husband, but in all these sermons saying much that I hope will be appropriate for all ages and all classes.

VOLUNTARY CELIBACY.

I applaud the celibacy of a multitude of women who, rather than make unfit selection, have made none at all. It has not been a lack of opportunity for marital contract on their part, but their own culture, and refinement, and their exalted idea as to what a husband ought to be, have caused their declination. They have seen so many women marry imbeciles, or ruffians, or incipient sots, or life-time incapables, or magnificent nothings, or men who before marriage were angelic and afterward diabolic, that they have been alarmed and stood back. They saw so many boats go into the maelstrom that they steered into other waters. Better for a woman to live alone, though she live a thousand years, than to be annexed to one of these masculine failures with which society is surfeited. The patron saint of almost every family circle is some such unmarried woman, and among all the families of cousins she moves around, and her coming in each house is the morning, and her going away is the night.

A BENEFICENT SPINSTERHOOD.

In my large circle of kindred, perhaps twenty families in all, it was an Aunt Phœbe. Paul gave a letter of introduction to one whom he calls "Phœbe, our sister," as she went up from Cenchrea to Rome, commending her for her kindness and Christian service, and imploring for her all courtesies. I think Aunt Phœbe was named after her. Was there a sickness in any of the households, she was there ready to sit up and count out the drops of medicine. Was there a marriage, she helped deck the bride for the altar. Was there a new soul incarnated, she was there to rejoice at the nativity. Was there a sore bereavement, she was there to console. The children rushed out at her first appearance, crying, "Here comes Aunt Phœbe," and but for parental interference they would have pulled her down with their caresses—for she was not very strong, and many severe illnesses had given her enough glimpses of the next world to make her heavenly-minded. Her table was loaded up with Baxter's "Saints' Rest," Doddridge's "Rise and Progress," and Jay's "Morning and Evening Exercises," and John Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," and like books, which have fitted out whole generation for the heaven upon which they have already entered.

A GLIMPSE OF HEAVEN.

"De Witt," she said to me one day, "twice in my life I have been so overwhelmed with the love of God that I fainted away and could hardly be resuscitated. Don't tell me there is no heaven. I have seen it twice." If you would know how her presence would soothe an anxiety, or lift a burden, or cheer a sorrow, or leave a blessing on every room in the house, ask any of the Talmages. She had tarried at her early home, taking care of an invalid father, until the bloom of life had somewhat faded; but she could interest the young folks with some three or four tender passages in her own history, so that we all knew that it was not through lack of opportunity that she was not the queen of one household, instead of being a benediction on a whole circle of households.

At about seventy years of age she made her last visit to my house, and when she sat in my Philadelphia church I was more embarrassed at her presence than by all the audience, because I felt that in religion I had got no further than the A B C, while she had learned the whole alphabet, and for many years had finished the Y and Z. When she went out of this life into the next, what a shout there must have been in heaven, from the front door clear up to the back seat in the highest gallery! I saw the other day in the village cemetery of Somerville, N. J., her resting-place, the tombstone having on it the words which thirty years ago she told me she would like to have inscribed there, namely: "The Morning Cometh."

ILLUSTRIOUS SPINSTERS.

Had she a mission in the world? Certainly. As much as Caroline Herschel, first amanuensis for her illustrious brother, and then his assistant in astronomical calculations, and then discovering worlds for herself, dying at ninety-eight years of age, still busy with the stars till she sped beyond them; as much as had Florence Nightingale, the nurse of the Crimea; or Grace Darling, the oars-woman of the Long Stone Lighthouse; or Mary Lyon, the teacher of Mount Holyoke Female Seminary; or Hannah More, the Christian authoress of England; or Dorothea Dix, the angel of mercy for the insane; or Anna Etheridge, among the wounded of Blackburn's Fort; or Margaret Breckenridge, at Vicksburg; or Mary Shelton, distributing roses and grapes and cologne in western hospital; or thousands of other glorious women like them, who never took the marriage sacrament. Appreciate all this, my sister, and it will make you deliberate before you rush out of the single state into another, unless you are sure of betterment.

A DIFFICULT BUSINESS.

Deliberate and pray. Pray and deliberate. As I showed you in my former sermon, a man ought to supplicate Divine guidance in such a crisis; how much more important that you solicit it! It is easier for a man to find an appropriate wife than for a woman to find a good husband. This is a matter of arithmetic, as I showed in former discourse. Statistics show that in Massachusetts and New York States women have a majority of hundreds of thousands. Why this is we leave others to surmise. It would seem that woman is a favorite with the Lord, and that therefore He has made more of that kind. From the order of the creation in paradise it is evident that woman is an improved edition of man. But whatever be the reason for it, the fact is certain that she who selects a husband has a smaller number of people to select from than he who selects a wife. Therefore a woman ought to be especially careful in her choice of life-time companionship. She cannot afford to make a mistake. If a man err in his selection he can spend his evenings at the club, and dull his sensibilities by tobacco-smoke; but woman has no club-room for refuge, and would find it difficult to habituate herself to cigars. If a woman make a bad job of marital selection, the probability is that nothing but a funeral can relieve it. Divorce cases in court may interest the public, but the love-letters of a married couple are poor reading, except for those who write them. Pray God that you be delivered from irrevocable mistake!

PARTNERS TO AVOID.

Avoid affiance with a despiser of the Christian religion, whatever else he may have or may not have. I do not say he must needs be a religious man, for Paul says the unbelieving husband is sanctified by the wife; but marriage with a man who hates the Christian religion will insure you a life of wretchedness. He will caricature your habit of kneeling in prayer. He will speak depreciatingly of Christ. He will wound all the most sacred feelings of your soul. He will put your home under the anathema of the Lord God Almighty. In addition to the anguish with which he will fill your life, there is great danger that he will despoil your hope of heaven, and make your marriage relation an infinite and eternal disaster. If you have made such engagement, your first duty is to break it. My word may come just in time to save your soul.

HUSBANDS SELDOM REFORM.

Further, do not unite in marriage with a man of bad habits in the idea of reforming him. If now, under the restraint of your present acquaintance, he will not give up his bad habits, after he has won the prize you cannot expect him to do so. You might as well plant a violet in the face of a northeast storm with the idea of appeasing it. You might as well run a schooner alongside of a burning ship with the idea of saving the ship. The consequence will be, schooner and ship will be destroyed together.

The almshouse could tell the story of a hundred women who married men to reform them. If by twenty-five years of age a man has been grappled by intoxicants, he is under such headway that your attempt to stop him would be very much like running up the track with a wheelbarrow to stop a Hudson River express train. What you call an inebriate nowadays is not a victim to wine or whiskey, but to logwood and strychnine and nux vomica. All these poisons have kindled their fires in his tongue and brain, and all the tears of a wife weeping cannot extinguish the flames. Instead of marrying a man to reform him, let him reform first, and then give him time to see whether the reform is to be permanent. Let him understand that if he cannot do without his bad habits for two years he must do without you forever.

MEN WEDDED TO THE WORLD.

Avoid union with one supremely selfish, or so wound up in his occupation that he has no room for another. You occasionally find a man who spreads himself so widely over the path of life that there is no room for any one to walk beside him. He is not the one blade of a scissors incomplete without the other blade, but he is a chisel made to cut his way through life alone, or a file full of roughness, made to be drawn across society without any affinity for other files. His disposition is a lifelong protest against marriage. Others are so married to their occupation or profession that the taking of any other bride is a case of bigamy. There are men as severely tied to their literary work as was Chatterton, whose essay was not printed because of the death of the Lord Mayor. Chatterton made out the following account: "Lost by the Lord Mayor's death in this essay one pound eleven shillings and sixpence. Gained in elegies and essays five pounds and five shillings." Then he put what he had gained by the Lord Mayor's death opposite to what he had lost, and wrote under it: "And glad he is dead by three pounds thirteen shillings and sixpence." When a man is as hopelessly literary as that he ought to be a perpetual celibate; his library, his laboratory, his books are all the companionship needed.

Indeed, some of the mightiest men this world ever saw have not patronized matrimony. Cowper, Pope, Newton, Swift, Locke, Walpole, Gibbon, Hume, Arbuthnot were single. Some of these marriage would have helped. The right kind of a wife would have cured Cowper's gloom, and given to Newton more practicability, and been a relief to Locke's overtasked brain. A Christian wife might have converted Hume and Gibbon to a belief in Christianity. But Dean Swift did not deserve a wife, from the way in which he broke the heart of Jane Waring first, and Esther Johnson afterward, and last of all "Vanessa." The great wit of his day, he was outwitted by his own cruelties.

PREDESTINATION IN MARRIAGE.

Amid so many possibilities of fatal mistake, am I not right in urging you to seek the unerring wisdom of God, and before you are infatuated? Because most marriages are fit to be made convinces us that they are divinely arranged. Almost every cradle has an affinity toward some other cradle. They may be on the opposite sides of the earth, but one child gets out of this cradle, and another child gets out of that cradle, and with their first steps they start for each other. They may diverge from the straight path, going toward the North, or South, or East, or West. They may fall down, but the two rise facing each other. They are approaching all through infancy. The one all through the years of boyhood is going to meet the one who is coming through all the years of girlhood to meet him. The decision of parents as to what is best concerning them, and the changes of fortune, may for a time seem to arrest but on they go. They may never have seen each other. They may never have heard of each other. But the two pilgrims who started at the two cradles are nearing. After eighteen, twenty, or thirty years, the two come within sight. At the first glance they may feel a dislike, and they may slacken their step; yet something that the world calls fate, and that religion calls Providence, urges them on and on. They must meet. They come near enough to join hands in social acquaintance, after awhile to join hands in friendship, after awhile to join hearts. The delegate from the one cradle comes up the east side of the church with her father. The delegate from the other cradle comes up the west aisle of the church. The two long journeys end at the snowdrift of the bridal veil. The two chains made out of many years are forged together by the golden link which the groom puts upon the third finger of the left hand. One on earth, may they be one in heaven!

But there are so many exceptions to the general rule of natural affinity that only those are safe who pray for a heavenly hand to lead them. Because they depended on themselves and not on God there are thousands of women every year going to the slaughter. In India women leap on the funeral pyre of a dead husband. We have a worse spectacle than that in America—women innumerable leaping on the funeral pyre of a living husband.

THE ADVERTISING BRUTE.

Avoid all proposed alliances through newspaper advertisements. Many women, just for fun, have answered such advertisements, and have been led on from step to step to catastrophe infinite. All the men who write such advertisements are villains and lepers—all, without a single exception. All! All!! Do you answer them just for fun? I will tell you a safer and healthier fun. Thrust your hand through the cage at a menagerie, and stroke the back of a cobra from the East Indies. Put your head in the mouth of a Numidian lion, to see if he will bite. Take a glassful of Paris green mixed with some delightful henbane. These are safer and healthier fun than answering newspaper advertisements for a wife.

MARRY INDEPENDENT MEN.

My advice is: Marry a man who is a fortune in himself. Houses, lands, and large inheritance are well enough, but the wheel of fortune turns so rapidly that through some investment all these in a few years may be gone. There are some things, however, that are a perpetual fortune—good manners, geniality of soul, kindness, intelligence, sympathy, courage, perseverance, industry, and whole-heartedness. Marry such a one and you have married a fortune, whether he have an income now of $50,000 a year or an income of $1000. A bank is secure according to its capital stock, and not to be judged by the deposits for a day or a week. A man is rich according to his sterling qualities, and not according to the mutability of circumstances, which may leave with him a large amount of resources to-day and withdraw them to-morrow. If a man is worth nothing but money he is poor indeed. If a man have upright character he is rich. Property may come and go, he is independent of the markets. Nothing can buy him out, nothing can sell him out. He may have more money one year than another, but his better fortunes never vacillate.

AVOID PERFECT MEN.

Yet do not expect to find a perfect man. If you find one without any faults, incapable of mistakes, never having guessed wrongly, his patience never having been perturbed, immaculate in speech, in temper, in habits, do not marry him. Why? Because you would enact a swindle. What would you do with a perfect man who are not perfect yourself? And how dare you hitch your imperfection fast on such supernatural excellence? What a companion you would make for an angel! In other words, there are no perfect men. There never was but one perfect pair, and they slipped down the banks of paradise together. We occasionally find a man who says he never sins. We know he lies when he says it. We have had financial dealings with two or three perfect men, and they cheated us wofully. Do not, therefore, look for an immaculate husband, for you will not find him.

PLENTY OF GOOD HUSBANDS.

But do not become cynical on this subject. Society has a great multitude of grand men who know how to make home happy. When they come to be husbands they evince a nobility of nature and a self-sacrificing spirit that surprise even the wife. These are the men who cheerfully sit in dark and dirty business offices, ten feet by twelve, in summer time hard at work while the wives and daughters are off at Saratoga, Mount Desert, or the White Sulphur. These are the men who, never having had much education themselves, have their sons at Yale, and Harvard, and Virginia University. These are the men who work themselves to death by fifty years of age, and go out to Greenwood leaving large estate and generous life-insurance provision for their families.

There are husbands and fathers here by the hundreds who would die for their households. If outlawry should ever become dominant in our cities they would stand in their doorway, and with their own arm would cleave down, one by one, fifty invaders face to face, foot to foot, and every stroke a demolition. This is what makes an army in defence of a country fight more desperately than an army of conquest. It is not so much the abstract sentiment of a flag as it is wife, and children, and home that turns enthusiasm into a fury. The world has such men by the million, and the homunculi that infest all our communities must not hinder women from appreciating the glory of true manhood.

FIDELITY IN ADVERSITY.

I was reading of a bridal reception. The young man had brought home the choice of his heart in her elaborate and exquisite apparel. As she stood in the gay drawing-room, and amid the gay group, the young man's eyes filled with tears of joy as he thought that she was his. Years passed by, and they stood at the same parlor on another festal occasion. She wore the same dress, for business had not opened as brightly to the young husband as he expected, and he had never been able to purchase for her another dress. Her face was not as bright and smooth as it had been years before, and a careworn look had made its signature on her countenance. As the husband looked at her he saw the difference between this occasion and the former, and he went over where she sat, and said: "You remember the time when we were here before. You have the same dress on. Circumstances have somewhat changed, but you look to me far more beautiful than you did then." There is such a thing as conjugal fidelity, and many of you know it in your own homes,

But, after all the good advice we may give you, we come back to the golden pillar from which we started, the tremendous truth that no one but God can guide you in safety about this matter that may decide your happiness for two worlds, this and the next. So, my sister, I put your case where Naomi put that of Ruth and Orpah when she said: "The Lord grant you that ye may find rest, each of you in the house of her husband."

THE WEDDING.

I imagine the hour for which you pledged your troth has arrived. There is much merry-making among your young friends, but there is an undertone of sadness in all the house. Your choice may have been the gladdest and the best, and the joy of the whole round of relatives, but when a young eaglet is about to leave the old nest, and is preparing to put out into sunshine and storm for itself, it feels its wings tremble somewhat. So she has a good cry before leaving home, and at the marriage father and mother always cry, or feel like it. If you think it is easy to give up a daughter in marriage, though it be with brightest prospects, you will think differently when the day comes. To have all along watched her from infancy to girlhood, and from girlhood to womanhood, studious of her welfare, her slightest illness an anxiety, and her presence in your home an ever-increasing joy, and then have her go away to some other home—aye, all the redolence of orange-blossoms, and all the chime of marriage-bells, and all the rolling of wedding march in full diapason, and all the hilarious congratulations of your friends cannot make you forget that you are suffering a loss irreparable. But you know it is all right, and you have a remembrance of an embarkation just like it twenty-five or thirty years ago, in which you were one of the parties; and, suppressing as far as possible your sadness, you say, "Good-by."

VISIT THE OLD HOME.

I hope that you, the departing daughter, will not forget to write often home; for, whatever betide you, the old folks will never lose their interest in your welfare. Make visits to them also as often, and stay as long as you can, for there will be changes at the old place after awhile. Every time you go you will find more gray hairs on father's head and more wrinkles on mother's brow; and after awhile you will notice that the elastic step has become decrepitude. And some day one of the two pillars of your early home will fall, and after awhile the other pillar of that home will fall, and it will be a comfort to yourself if, when they are gone, you can feel that while you are faithful in your new home you never forget your old home, and the first friends you ever had, and those to whom you are more indebted than you ever can be to any one else except to God—I mean your father and mother. Alexander Pope put it in effective rhythm when he said:

"Me let the tender office long engage
To rock the cradle of reposing age;
With lenient arts extend a mother's breath,
Make languor smile, and smooth the bed of death;
Explore the thought, explain the asking eye,
And keep awhile one parent from the sky."

And now I commend all this precious and splendid young womanhood before me to-day to the God "who setteth the solitary in families."

The Services for Students Conducted by Mr. Studd, at Princeton, have led to permanent results. It is now arranged to hold preaching services in the town. A hall has been opened and Drs. Patton, Paxton, and others preach on Sunday evenings. The young men of the place are gathered into this hall, and there are evidences of the presence and blessing of God upon these services. As a result of the work in the University of Wooster, twenty-six students have confessed Christ and united with the college church. Meetings have been progressing for two weeks, held every evening, and are still in progress.

"RESURRECTION."

By Prof. G. W. Pendleton, A.M.

The Illustration of the Corn—Certainty of Resurrection—At Christ's Coming—The Time Appointed—The Body Given—The Day of Espousal—Light in the Darkness.

"Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone; but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit."—John 12: 24.

If the death of the corn in the earth is not a total death, but only the corruption or a mere alteration of the grain: if once the seminal life was quite extinguished, it could never put forth the blade or ear, without a miracle. But because the change that takes place in the earth is a kind of death, therefore Christ uses it, as a fit illustration of the resurrection of the dead. Surely, there is nothing in nature better fitted to illustrate this great mystery. The corn is buried in the earth, but in a short time a fragrant, green and beautiful blade is seen, springing up from a corrupted seed. How black and mouldy is that seed in the ground! How verdant and beautiful is that blade above the ground! Thus the bodies of the in beauty and glory in the resurrection morning. "They are sown in dishonor, they are raised in glory." "It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body."

The seed is laid in the earth from whence it came, and the body is buried in the ground whence it originated—"earth to earth, and dust to dust." The body dies, "for it is appointed unto men once to die." But as the seed is cast into the ground in hope of life and continuance, "for he that plougheth, ploughs in hope," so the dead are laid in the grave, in hope of the resurrection through our Lord Jesus Christ, at whose coming to judge the world, the earth, and the sea, shall give up their dead. The farmer would not be willing to cast seed into the earth, if he did not expect a recompense for his sacrifice and toil. But he knows that the seed falls into the ground to die, and if it die, "it bringeth forth much fruit."

Paul says: "Should it be thought a thing incredible that God should raise the dead." "But I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them who are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others, who have no hope; for if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also, who sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him." This hope gives comfort. "Wherefore comfort one another with these words."

THE APPOINTED TIME.

The seed lies days and nights in the ground, "even so man lieth down, and riseth not; till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake nor be raised out of their sleep." Christ says: "I will raise them up at the last day." When the great trumpet shall sound, "the sea shall give up the dead, which are in it; and death and the grave shall deliver up the dead which are in them." "And I saw the dead, both small and great stand before God."

THE NEW BODY.

As the seed is clothed with beauty after it germinates, so the bodies of the saints rise, beautified, perfected, and immortalized, "fashioned like unto Christ's glorious body, according to the mighty working whereby He is able to subdue all things unto Himself." "For in the resurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven." "Vile bodies" are no longer vile. Now, free from all infirmities, defections, and diseases—"glorified bodies." "From the sole of his foot even to the crown of his head there was no blemish in him." "Vile bodies" no longer troubled with anxieties or corroding cares, and ever inquiring, "What shall we eat, and drink, and wherewithal shall we be clothed," but "clothed upon" with our house which is from heaven" (see 2 Cor. 5: 2). "God shall destroy both it and them." Once "vile bodies," now forever free from death. "For they who shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead, die no more, for they are equal unto the angels, and are the children of God—being the children of the resurrection."

"Why should it be thought a thing incredible, that God should raise the dead?" That there shall be "a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and the unjust?" "Thanks be to God, who giveth us this victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." "O death I will be thy plague; O grave I will be thy destruction."

Certainly, nothing is surer than the resurrection of these "vile bodies." The day of espousals will come, the marriage feast will be held, when the bridegroom returns, and the bride is made ready.

"Then shall we hear, and see, and know,
All that we desired or wished below,
And every power find sweet employ,
In that eternal world of joy."

LIGHT IN THE DARKNESS.

And now, sceptic—unbeliever in the resurrection—say, if you will, that death hath made such havoc with the dust of man; that the ruin of the human body has been so complete; that you cannot admit the possibility of its resuscitation—that these "dry bones can live again"—that this little heap of human dust can be transformed into a living being. You had rather believe that "death is an eternal sleep." But thanks be to God, the Bible light that has penetrated the darkness of the grave can never be extinguished.

In the inspired, infallible book of God, we read: "I am the resurrection and the life." "All in their graves shall come forth." "Death is swallowed up in victory." "He who raised up Jesus from the dead, shall also quicken your mortal or dead bodies." The grip of the grave shall be wholly relaxed. The victim of death shall be loosed. Christ is the resurrection. He is the real conqueror. "Now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the firstfruits of them who have slept in the grave." Thus He has purchased the redemption of the body; and all who sleep in Him shall be raised up at the last day. "Though after my skin, worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh (renewed body) shall I see God."

NATIVE TEACHERS IN INDIA.

THE district of Tinnevely, in India, lies at the southern extremity of the peninsula. Its population is 1,693,959. Its chief town has the same name, and its population is 22,000. Only a short time ago it was utterly destitute of Christianity. Now there is Christian teaching everywhere through the district, and in some places there is quite a large and active church. To a large extent this is due to God's blessing on the work of native teachers, who have been converted under the preaching of the missionaries and trained for labor. An interesting report has been published of the success which has attended an effort of one of these native teachers—a veritable Christian hero who went voluntarily into the midst of a raging pestilence to preach Christ. The missionary who forwards the report, says: "Through his labor forty families at Rajapalaiyam have been led to place themselves under instruction. Through God's mercy the catechist of Kondurettipatti was the means of leading them into the fold of Christ. He had taken leave to go to Rajapalaiyam, which is his birthplace. While there, cholera broke out, and carried away hundreds of human beings. In the midst of its violent raging, he, at the risk of his life, went from house to house and visited those who were attacked by the epidemic, making no distinction between Christian and non-Christian, and administering medicines. This was closely noticed by the non-Christians, and they wanted to detain him in their own village, without allowing him to return to his own congregation at Kondurettipatti.

"At this juncture I returned from Strivilliputtur through their town, when these heathen people met me on my way, and begged that I would allow him to remain at Rajapalaiyam. I told them I would have no objection, provided that they would listen to his teaching and become Christians, which they at once promised to do. When I was assured that they were sincere in what they said, there was no bound to my joy, and so I gladly complied with their request, permitting the catechist to remain with them, and instruct them in the way of salvation. The town of Rajapalaiyam is a large and important one, where we had hitherto a very few Christians. Under such circumstances, you cannot think how rejoiced we are to be thus blessed with such an unexpected large accession of forty families. Moreover, this happy incident, is no doubt, under God's mercy, owing to the self-denying and untiring efforts of the catechist.

A NATIVE PRAYING-MEETING.

"In another village, in which forty years ago, there was not one Christian, I found that most of the villagers are Christians, and fully seven hundred were present at the service, the women and girls equalling in number the men and boys.

"They have a large, substantial stone church, toward which they contributed three thousand rupees ($1500), besides giving much of the material and labor. One old man who was present also gave the land and much of the timber. In their schools, which were good and clean, there were sixty-eight boys and one hundred girls. The singing and responses during service were most hearty, and their answers to questions during the sermon were wonderfully good. After service on Sunday evening they held a prayer-meeting at the house of one of the Christians.

"The night I was there it was the turn to have it at the house of a rich man, who, when a heathen, had mainly built and supported a large devil temple adjoining his house. He became a Christian seven years ago. I counted one hundred and seventy men and boys in the courtyard which formed the centre of the house, and in which the prayer-meeting was being held. The doors of the rooms all round were half open, and many women and girls were in them listening. After a lyric had been sung, a layman engaged in prayer, and very earnest were his petitions for the missionaries, and for those who support them. He went on to pray for the native Christians and for the heathen, his petitions being just what we should expect in an ordinary prayer-meeting at home, and reminding us that the same Holy Spirit who teaches us is teaching these poor people. After a chapter from Isaiah had been read, an old man rose to give an account of his evangelistic work the previous Friday. Several men in the congregation go out to preach, two every Friday, and visit heathen villages near, and at the Sunday night prayer-meeting they report anything of interest that has occurred. I gave them a short address, and after two more prayers the meeting closed, and I left them with feelings of heartfelt joy and thankfulness.

DEVIL TEMPLES BECOME CHURCHES.

"In another part of the district I found a catechist who is a convert from heathenism, and was sent there to evangelize six years ago. At that time there were no Christians in the district assigned to him. He has been enabled to turn five of the devil temples into Christian churches, and now three catechists are employed to teach the people who are under Christian instruction! At the first of these churches which I visited, the building had been enlarged six months before, but would not contain more than half the people who came to my service, and we held it in the open air. At the close many heathen people asked to be allowed to join the Christians!

"In another district I met with two men in whom I was deeply interested. One of them, when twelve years of age, was left an orphan. He was a heathen, but his relatives gave him no help. A Christian farmer pitied him, and took him to his home, employing the lad to mind cattle. The master sought the boy's good, and was after some time rewarded by seeing him baptized. Seven years ago this youth joined a band of voluntary open-air preachers. All the others have either left the place or discontinued their efforts. This man sought the help of another with a good voice, and Sunday after Sunday they have walked an average of ten or twelve miles, visiting by turns twenty-four heathen villages regularly. For six years they persevered without any visible result. Then they began to humble themselves before God, and with new zeal and more earnest prayer consecrated themselves afresh to the work. Soon they were cheered by fourteen people in one village giving up idolatry, and forming the nucleus of a congregation. Soon after, fifteen people in another village did the same. Then, in a third place, forty people came over, and shortly afterward, a month before my visit, fifteen in a fourth village. There was a spirit of humility and devotion in these men such as I have seldom seen in native Christians. Oh, for more true workers of this sort!"

MISS WHATELY'S WORK IN EGYPT.

REPORTS of the useful work Miss Whately is doing among the poor of Egypt, especially through her medical mission have appeared so often in these columns, that our readers will feel an interest in the progress of it. The following is an extract from a letter received from Miss E. Jane Whately, a sister of the lady who has so devotedly consecrated her time, money, and talents to the Egyptian sphere:

"My sister's medical mission work in Cairo is now in fuller activity than ever. For five days in the week, between nine and eleven A.M., the dispensary is crowded with sick poor. I should like to take some of our friends to visit it on one of these bright November mornings, which present such a contrast to the foggy, drizzling days of this month at home. The dispensary is on the mission premises, close by the school, but a separate gateway and flight of steps lead to it, and by these steps groups of poor people, of all ages, are continually ascending to the three rooms at the top, a kind of vestibule or passage room, called here a fezzah, with an inner apartment on each side. The largest and lightest is on the right as we enter, and is devoted to the use of the doctor, whose assistant stands at the door, ushering in one patient after another in turn.

"The fezzah is occupied by men seated on the divans round it; to-day (November 18th), they were listening to the evangelist, who was reading to a very attentive little knot of hearers. The inner room on the left, a rather larger one, is full of women, a few of the citizen class with the black habacak, or silk mantle, without which the poorest of this order must not leave her house, and the face veil carefully adjusted with the brass rings which attach it to the hair. These sat on the benches round the room, but the great majority were the very poor, wrapped in their dark blue cotton drapery, and many of them seated on the floor, generally with babies on their laps. Little children in skull-caps, and faded colored blouses, and grinning faces, meandered about the room or crawled on the floor. In the midst of this motley crowd, at one end of the long table, my sister sat with her Arabic Bible open, and was just beginning to read the story of Zaccheus when I came in. The reading must be accompanied by a good deal of illustration and explanation to make it comprehensible to hearers utterly unused to employ their mental powers, and as I entered she was trying to picture to them what a 'tax-gatherer' in Palestine under the Romans was, not very unlike what they are used to here, poor creatures.

"She holds the readings daily. Sometimes she has both men and women to read to, and sits in the doorway between the rooms, or takes one group after another. Sometimes one of the school children comes in to have a bad eye attended to, and then, if occasion calls, she tells them to repeat a text or the Lord's Prayer. And the mothers will then be ready to send their children to learn 'the good words,' so the schools and the medical mission tell on each other. The doctor's great success in curing or relieving, and especially in restoring or preserving sight, naturally makes a great impression, and the care and thoughtful kindness shown make a contrast to the conduct of the native doctors, who will do nothing without pay. The schools number from six hundred to seven hundred in daily attendance, nearly two thirds Moslems. All who visit them are struck with the intelligent answering and knowledge of Scripture of both boys and girls, and the readiness of the latter in acquiring English and French, as also their calligraphy in both Arabic and Roman characters.

"Besides this work there are the visits to Nile villages for the distribution of the Scriptures—visits which the want of means compel the workers to make short and rare, useful as they are—nor the wide circle of Egyptian families with whom constant intercourse is held partly through Mrs. Shakoor's indefatigable labors in visiting from house to house, partly through the Bible-woman, and partly by weekly meetings for women."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Lad Ground to Powder.—At a recent Meeting Mr. Ferrie said: "Away in the north a young shepherd lad sat down under a great overhanging rock to take his dinner, when suddenly the projecting rock, hundreds of tons in weight, came crashing down upon him, and his remains are there to-day, for he was instantly ground to powder. Now, friends, that is not my illustration, but it is God's. Oh flee from the wrath to come, for 'Whosoever shall fall on this stone (Christ) shall be broken; but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will grind him to powder' (Matt. 21:44).

Two Good Meals at Once.—Mr. Riddell said: "I knew an infidel whose little girl was just converted to Christ, then his son, and lastly he himself was brought to Jesus. On one occasion when I called on him, I found him sitting at dinner, and his open Bible by the side of his plate, feeding soul and body at the same time; and I thought nothing but the grace of God could have wrought so wonderful a change on that soul, blackened by the worst of all sins, unbelief in Him who created the universe; and now what a marvellous change! he was never so happy as when reading the once much scoffed at Bible. He had truly learned the negro's Gospel, 'Me die or He die, He die, no me die.'"

Playing with Deadly Reptiles.—Mr. J. M. Scroggie related the following incident: "Some time ago in the Zoological Gardens, Regent's Park, London, one of the keepers went into the cage among the reptiles, and in boasting bravery before his friends, took hold of a reptile and wound it round his hand, then placed it under a glass shade. 'Now for the second,' he said, and lifted another, and coiled it round his neck. But this one was wide awake, and put its poisonous fangs into the man's forehead right above the eye. He started, grew black in the face, staggered, and fell dead on the spot. Friends, you wonder at the man's temerity, and well you may, for where is his boasting now? But that is what many are doing with sin, a more deadly reptile. They despise all warnings, and in a spirit of bravado tamper with it for a time, and unless the grace of God restrain them they are suddenly taken, the deadly fangs of sin pierce the soul, and it is lost forever."

A Merchant Saved from Suicide.—"A London merchant had been ruined through a great commercial failure. He could not reconcile himself to the idea of leaving his mansion and all its beautiful surroundings; it was too humiliating a position; he could not do it. Thus he argued with himself until finally he came to the cowardly decision of putting an end to his life. He went out fully resolved on accomplishing his purpose, but when he arrived at the spot it was still light, and he thought if he threw himself into the water just then he might be rescued, so he resolved to wait until it was dark. To pass away the time he thought he would go and hear his favorite minister preach, but when he got to the church it was locked. Disappointed, he walked on until he heard singing in a place of worship. He went in, and was glad to see his minister rise. But when he gave out his text it went like an arrow to his tempest-tossed soul, for the words were: 'It was now dark.' It took in his case so fully that every word the speaker uttered was like a nail driven into his heart. At the close he sought an interview with the minister, and told him how he had come out for the purpose of throwing himself over London Bridge, but that his text had darted like an arrow of conviction through his soul. 'And now,' he said, 'although my money is gone and my fortune is wrecked, I have Christ in my heart.' The minister told him that he had another sermon carefully prepared for that evening, but when it was finished something told him that it was not the one that God intended. So he opened his Bible to get another text from his divine Master, and as he looked his eyes rested on these words, 'It was now dark.'"

"This Picture and That."—"A Dear Old Christian was being gathered home who had given almost a lifetime to his God. When he was nearing the Father's house on high, his wife, who would soon follow him, bent over him, and said: 'Will you be at the gate waiting for me, John?' 'No,' said John, 'for oh, if I can get my eyes fixed on my Jesus I will not be able to take them off Him for a thousand years!' Ah, friends, that was a right heart—a heart at peace with God. How different it was with an infidel of whom I heard. On his death-bed, he cried: 'It is dark, it is dark; bring a light.' 'It is not dark, darling,' said his wife, 'the sun is shining brightly.' Ah, friends, what did his infidelity do for him then? It could go with him to the gates of death, but it could go no further, and now it cruelly mocks him. If it was dark then, it was nothing to be compared with the awful darkness that must have followed his death."

The Missionary's Interrupted Tea.—"A City missionary visited his people one day, and was struck with the idea that one of them, a poor blind woman, was in need of help. But he thought within himself that he would go home and have his tea first. So home he went, and sat down to tea; but he could not take it, so much was it pressed upon him that the poor woman was in want. He left his house, and arrived at her door. He knocked, but receiving no answer, he knocked again; still no answer. The missionary again knocked at the door, and this time the poor woman came and opened it. After he had been admitted, he asked: 'Why did you not open the door when I first knocked?' 'Because,' said the old woman, 'I was just on my knees praying to the Lord to send me help.' And her prayer was answered, for before he had left home, the missionary put into his pocket some provisions of which he thought she stood in need. The Lord has said: 'Call upon Me in the time of trouble, and I will deliver thee.'"

Dividing the Punishment.—"When I was a boy I read a story of a colony in Italy where the people were committing crime which the king was determined should be stamped out. Any person who was known to transgress was to have both eyes taken out; this was the command of the heathen king. The first to disobey was the king's own son. How grieved the father was! he was almost sorry he had made such a law, for now his son would never be able to lead out his people to battle, but his command must be obeyed, and he thought of a plan whereby the law might be honored, and his son saved from utter blindness. The day came on which his command was to be executed; his boy was brought forth, and after having one eye put out, his father stepped forward, and said: 'Put out one of mine.' Thus punishing the sin and sparing the sinner, from its full consequences. Is this not just what Jesus has done in giving His life a ransom for many.

"He took the dying sinners place,
And suffered in his stead."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Presidential Succession Bill Passed the House on Friday, precisely as it left the Senate. It was admitted there, as in the Senate, that it is an imperfect bill, but it was deemed unwise in existing circumstances to frame a more elaborate measure. After the President has signed the bill the succession to the Presidential chair in the event of the death or disability of both the President and Vice-President will fall to the members of the Cabinet, in their order of precedence, and in case the duties of the office devolve upon any member of the Cabinet, he is to "act as President until the disability of the President or Vice-President is removed or a President shall be elected." The existing law providing for a special election is repealed. Hence, if a Secretary should be called upon to act as President, he would continue so to act for the rest of the term for which the President was elected—unless he should sooner die, in which case the duties of the office would devolve upon the next one in the line of succession. The second section declares that the provisions of the act shall apply only to Cabinet officers who have been appointed with the consent of the Senate, who are constitutionally eligible to the office of President, so that a citizen born on foreign soil is still barred from the Presidency.

Testimony to the Value of Civil Service Reform methods came last week from Massachusetts. After a year's experience of the system there is a general consensus of opinion as to the advantages it secures. The Commissioners of Statistics and the Boston Police Board are especially emphatic in their declarations. The former say that the clerks supplied have been more regular in attendance, more intelligent and efficient than any force hitherto employed. The Police Board speak of the general superiority of the men placed on the patrol force under the new system, in capacity, intelligence and conduct. It is also a fact which falsifies the prediction of the critics, that of one thousand two hundred and ninety-two applicants, only twenty-five had enjoyed any educational advantage other than the common schools. It is remarkable, too, that the percentage of veterans who passed the examinations was larger than that of other applicants. These facts deserve the attention of other States. The surest way to purify our politics is the adoption and extension of the reform, and to prevent the bosses rewarding their healers with the offices. Until now it was not proved, although it was expected that the character of the officers would be improved by the system.

The Sympathy Manifested Toward Mr. Bayard in his bereavement is not confined to any section or party. The blow which fell on the Secretary of State on Saturday last is one that obliterates all distinctions. The sudden loss of his eldest daughter, who died of heart disease on that day, only a short time before the fulfilment of her engagement to assist Miss Cleveland in her reception, is one that must be severely felt by a man of sensitive temperament and strong domestic affections. We pray that God may give comfort and support to the bereaved statesman and his family in their affliction.

The Socialist Dynamite Conspiracy Revealed in Chicago last Friday produced an uneasy feeling throughout the country. How much of it was sober truth, and how much the exaggeration of interested persons, can only be surmised, but there is probably sufficient basis for the report to justify precautionary measures. It is stated that the police investigation was started by the discovery of two dynamite bombs, one of which was found in the garden of a capitalist, and the other in a railroad station. The inquiry as reported resulted in the discovery that the socialists have joined hands with several trade unions for the promotion by force of an eight-hour law. It is claimed by the socialists that they have nine thousand bombs loaded and distributed among reliable persons. The bombs are of the most destructive type; they are called "the Czar," from the fact that it was with bombs of that description that Czar Alexander II. was killed. The men are said to have been drilling after working hours all the summer, and to be supplied with charts of instruction, maps of the city, and plans for street barricades. The socialists claim that one man armed with a bomb can destroy a whole company of militia or police. The rising is planned for May 1st, and, if successful in Chicago, to be extended to other cities. One reassuring fact about the revelation is the candor of the men engaged. It would seem probable that if a rising were actually contemplated the socialists would have been more reticent. They would have avoided putting the authorities on their guard.

Boycotting the Postmasters is a Practice coming into vogue, with results that may prove disastrous. About forty-eight thousand of the postmasters are paid according to the number of stamps cancelled in their offices. It is stated that in certain districts large numbers of people whose political affiliation is opposed to that of the postmaster are arranging their correspondence so that it shall not go through his office. They either have it handed to the clerk in the Postal Railroad Car, or send it to another office, thus diminishing the postmaster's remuneration. This is wrong in principle and policy. It will assuredly provoke retaliation, and it is an evasion of the principle of our institutions.

The Action of Mr. Cornelius Vanderbilt Last week in anticipating the request of the card-drivers and conductors of the Fourth Avenue line of surface cars in New York is worthy of commendation by the public and imitation by other employers of labor. The men were preparing for presentation an application for a reduction of their hours of labor. Before they presented it a notice was issued to them by Mr. Vanderbilt voluntarily reducing the hours, and maintaining their present rate of pay. The concession was humane and reasonable, and we are glad to see that Mr. Vanderbilt, as a Christian millionaire, has taken the initiative in a line of policy heretofore by no means common.

The New British Parliament Assembled on January 12th to swear in the members and organize the House. Mr. Arthur W. Peel, the youngest son of the late Sir Robert Peel, was again elected speaker. Though he is a Liberal, and held office in Mr. Gladstone's administration, the Conservatives supported his candidacy. The only opposition was from the Parnellites, who resented his previous conduct in the chair. The most noteworthy event of the proceedings was that Charles Bradlaugh, the atheist, who vainly sought to take the oaths and his seat in the last Parliament, succeeded in being sworn in with the other members. Sir Michael Hicks Beach, the chief representative of the Government in the House of Commons, wrote to the speaker expressing the opinion that Mr. Bradlaugh ought not to be allowed to take the oath until the House had passed upon his right to sit there. Mr. Peel, however, decided that he had no power to prevent his being sworn in, but reminded the House that legal proceedings could be taken against Mr. Bradlaugh at any time. Parliament will be formally opened for the dispatch of business by the Queen in person.

The Resignation of Lord Carnarvon, the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, was announced last week. He returned to London, and took part in the Cabinet Councils. His place was taken by a commission composed of Prince Edward, of Saxe Weimar, Commander-in-Chief; Vice-Chancellor Chatterton and the Right Hon. J. T. Ball, ex-Lord-Chancellor of Ireland. Lord Carnarvon will return temporarily to Ireland, but it is expected that his office will be abolished. Some excitement was produced in connection with the resignation by a rumor, which appears to be generally believed, both in England and Ireland, that an attempt will be made by the Government to re-enact the coercion law. The rumor caused considerable alarm, as such an attempt would inevitably provoke a rising which must involve bloodshed. Much distress prevails in Ireland, and scenes similar to those of the terrible famine year of 1879 are reported. Numerous eviction processes are being issued. One judge alone issued two hundred in one day last week. That means that at least a thousand persons will be rendered homeless. The Queen's speech, which will outline the policy of the Government about Ireland, is anxiously awaited.

The Seizure of the Samoan Islands by Germany occasioned some excitement last week. Telegrams giving conflicting accounts of the affair were published. It appears, however, that differences have existed for some time between the German Consul there and the king. There have also been jealousies between the German Consul and the consuls of the United States and England, arising out of disputes between traders of the respective nationalities. A German man-of-war has been sent there to overawe the king, who immediately fled with his chiefs. A force of men was landed at Apia from the German war-ship, and the German Consul then hauled down the Samoan flag, and ran up the German colors in its stead. The American and British Consuls protested against the action of the Germans. It is stated that assurances have been given to England by Prince Bismarck that Germany does not intend to permanently hold the islands. They are important chiefly from their situation. They are convenient for coaling stations, being on the direct route to Australia, and they have good harbors.

A Proposal for Disarmament Has Been Made by the great Powers to the contestants in the Balkans. It has been promised that if Bulgaria, Greece and Serbia will disarm, Turkey also will disband her forces. Greece alone has replied by a circular note, declining disarmament unless she receives an accession of territory. Bulgaria, on her side, appears to have arranged with Turkey, and so far appears to have gained her point. The terms of peace as reported are that the union of the Bulgarians be recognized by the Porte; that the Bulgarian army be at the disposal of Turkey in the event of war with Greece or Serbia; that tribute be paid regularly to the Porte; that the customs rights of the Porte be maintained, and that Prince Alexander go to Constantinople to be invested with the Governorship of Eastern Roumelia. The chief cause for uneasiness is the attitude of Russia and Austria. Both powers are making extraordinary war preparations, as if for an immediate struggle.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying Colored ministers with the CHRISTIAN HERALD were received last week to the amount of $8.30. From McGirk, Mo., $1.30; McQueen, Ill., $1; Marion, Mich., $2; Troy, N. Y., $1; Denbigh, Ont., $2; Grass Valley, Cal., $1.

Mrs. M. Baxter Commenced Her Services at Milton, Pa., on Monday last. Thence she expects to go to Erie, Pa., commencing there on Tuesday next. She has also promised, if possible, to attend the convention to be conducted at Boston, Mass., by Dr. Cullis, on February 3d. The meetings held last week at the Kemuel Home, Philadelphia, were much blessed, and since their conclusions testimonies of blessing have been received. (See page 44.)

A Home for Divine Healing has been Established in Baltimore, Md. It is called Beulah Land Faith Home, and is situated at 9 North Stricker Street, between Baltimore and Fayette avenues. Elder W. G. Raymond, a Baptist minister, whose healing through faith and prayer has been previously described, is the leader in the movement of which this Home is the outcome. Meetings are held there every evening, and on Sunday, Tuesday, and Thursday afternoons. When the furnishing is completed sick persons will be received.

The Young Women's Christian Association of New York, of whose new building we gave a picture recently, is making strenuous exertions to be prepared to open it free of debt. We understand that upward of $74,000 have been already subscribed. That amount leaves $50,000 still to be raised. Of this, one gentleman, whose name has not been disclosed, promises to give one half, providing the other half is raised within one month.

A Remarkable Revival Work is Reported from Paterson, N. J. Union evangelistic services have been held in Washington Hall, a large building capable of holding two thousand persons, and every evening the doors had to be closed to prevent crowding. So large has been the throng unable to secure admission, that overflow meetings have been held in the different churches, and these have been well attended. Almost all the Protestant churches have united in the movement. On Sunday, January 10th, there was an interchange of pulpits by the twenty ministers engaged in the work.

An Attempt to Rid Chicago of its Disreputable resorts was made last week by the Grand Jury. Referring to the report of a special committee appointed to investigate the moral condition of the city, the Grand Jury said: "The closing of saloons at midnight has by long custom become a dead letter in the community, and a partiality seems to exist in favor of the grogeries of the very lowest character, and which have been described upon the sworn testimony of policemen before our body as robbers' dens." With regret we report that the administration of affairs in the First Police District is in a condition of deplorable rottenness. Dives of the lowest order defy the city's ordinances by keeping open from dawn till midnight, and from midnight until dawn. In them congregate disreputable women, thieves and criminals, and policemen have been seen in full uniform tipping with disreputables in these same dens." It would appear that in Chicago, as in other cities, the police and the law-breakers are friends, if not allies.

Mr. William Noble's Services at the Broome Street Tabernacle last week were much blessed of God. Two meetings were held every day, and large audiences assembled at each. On Friday afternoon the place was crowded with children. At every service many persons rose to testify of their conversion, and hundreds signed the pledge. One of the most remarkable cases was that of a man about thirty years of age, a terrible wreck from the effects of drink and dissipation. He stated that he was the son of a well-known judge in Canada. He signed the pledge, and professed faith in Christ. The practical character of the work done was illustrated by the case of one man who, immediately after his profession of faith, consulted with Mr. Noble about sending to England for a woman whom he had wronged and deserted, that he might marry her. Last Monday and Tuesday Mr. Noble was speaking at the Coliseum, Bristol, Conn. Thence he goes to Chelsea and Worcester, Mass. He intends returning to New York after a brief rest, and starting thence westward for San Francisco. He has promised to speak at several places on his way across the continent. Among them are Trenton, N. J., Lancaster City, Pa., and Denver, Col. He expects to sail from San Francisco about the end of February for Honolulu, New Zealand, and Australia.

Rev. W. Hay, M. H. Aitken has Commenced a series of services at Nashville, Tenn. They are held in Christ Church and in the Masonic Theatre. His work in New York was much blessed of God, and we sincerely hope that a similar blessing may attend his ministrations in the South.

An Heroic Mother Sacrificed her Hand to save her children recently in Dakota. In a frame house at Woonsocket, Dak. Ter., on January 9th, a woman was cooking supper over a gasoline stove, while her two little children were playing on the floor. In turning around her dress-sleeve caught the gasoline faucet and turned it on. She noticed the liquid running out, and turned it off. Some, however, had fallen in the tea-kettle. When the water was fairly boiling she picked up the kettle to carry it into another room. She had hardly taken a step when the gasoline exploded and flames burst out. She ran to the door to throw it out, but the door would not open. To drop the flaming kettle meant death to her children. So the brave little woman clung to the kettle while her hand was being burned to a crisp. The oil soon burned itself out. The next day the woman's hand was amputated. It was a noble example of self-sacrificing love, showing how much pain a mother will endure for the sake of her offspring. It is by such an illustration that we are helped to realize something of the love of Christ in laying down His life for a sinful world (Rom. 5 : 7, 8).

An Affecting Meeting in an Almshouse Occurred recently at Erie, Pa. An elderly widow lady who had once been in affluent circumstances was brought there to end her days. She had not been there many weeks before a well-dressed young lady came to inquire for her. She was taken to the room occupied by the widow, in company with other paupers. No sooner did she recognize the old lady than she threw her arms around her and kissed her earnestly. She bade her get herself ready for a journey, and took her away to live with her in her own home in Missouri. The explanation was found afterward. The younger lady, when a child, had been in very poor circumstances. The widow, then in affluence, had taken her to her home, educated her, and treated her as her own daughter until she married and went West. The young lady heard no more of her benefactress until one day a parcel came to her by express wrapped in a newspaper. As she unwrapped the parcel her name in one of the paragraphs in the newspaper caught her eye. She read it and learned that her old friend was being provided for by the county. She started off for Erie by the next train to rescue her from her humiliating position. The widow can now bear witness from her own experience of the faithfulness of God to His promise (Eccl. 11 : 1).

A Jump for Life was Taken by two Ladies at Stapleton, N. Y., on January 8th. They had come from New Haven, Conn., for a trip on board a schooner, which arrived at Stapleton on January 3d laden with railroad ties. When the schooner was unloaded they remained on board the empty vessel waiting until a new cargo was received, when they intended to return in her. When the memorable storm of Friday night struck the vessel she began to rock violently. The captain was aroused, and when he came on deck he at once understood the danger. The tops of the masts described a curve of thirty feet every time a wave struck the ship. He told the men to jump ashore, and then went to wake the ladies. He placed them on the rail of the schooner, and told them to jump when the ship rolled and they would be caught by the men on land. As it was quite dark they could see no land, but they promised to obey. The next lurch of the vessel was so violent that the mainmast struck a building and broke short off. The ladies jumped, and were safely caught and taken to an hotel. The storm broke the vessel to pieces before morning. The confidence the ladies had in the captain may serve as an illustration of the faith which, with infinitely better reason, awakened sinners are asked to place in Christ. That is sometimes described as a jump into darkness (Heb. 7 : 25).

A Remarkable Funeral took Place in New York last Thursday. There was only a single coach, and the expenses of the funeral were defrayed by a charitable lady. Yet the woman whose remains were thus carried to the cemetery was the famous Emily de Forrest, who not many years ago reigned like a queen over a circle of vicious admirers, who lavished their wealth upon her without stint. Marvellously beautiful, witty and accomplished she had a host of wealthy debauchees at her feet, all eager to bid for her favor. She grew rich and owned several lots of valuable real estate down-town, and kept two of the most luxurious disreputable houses in the upper part of the city. Five years ago she became a drunkard, and all her wealth melted away. Last November, penniless and friendless, she was about to commit suicide, when she heard of Miss M. Strachan, who established the Faith Home in West Twenty-seventh Street. She went to her, and Miss Strachan received her, and after some time was rewarded by seeing the abandoned woman give herself humbly and contritely to Christ. She afterward lived consistently. But she was suffering from heart disease, and on Monday, January 11th, she suddenly died. As she was utterly friendless she would have been interred in the Potters' Field had not Miss Strachan, with true womanly feeling, interposed and paid the expenses of a funeral. Those who are dazzled by the glamor of a sinful life may wisely ponder the fate of this woman, stripped of her wealth, deserted by her friends, being buried by Christian charity (Job 20 : 28, 29).

A Mirage Mised a shipwrecked Crew Last week. The Steamer Hylton Castle, which sailed from New York on Friday, January 9th, for Rouen, France, foundered off Fire Island on Monday, January 11th. The steamer's two boats were lowered when it was found that she was sinking, and the crew crowded into them. One boat reached land safely the same evening, but it was not until Wednesday night that the captain and the ten sailors who were in the second boat arrived. They were on board a schooner which had found them drifting helplessly in the darkness. They had suffered terrible hardships from the cold. One of the men was coated all over with ice. The captain said that their most painful experience was on Tuesday night. They were rowing for Fire Island, and could not see far before them, as the moon was obscured by the mist. Suddenly the cry was raised that the Fire Island light was close ahead. They rowed with renewed energy, but did not reach it. They shouted themselves hoarse, but there was no response. Then they concluded that the inmates of the lighthouse must be asleep, and they gave way to despair. For a long time no one had any heart to row, and they drifted aimlessly until the schooner appeared and took them on board. Then they learned that they had been deceived as to the light by the mist on the water, which had produced a mirage. The experience of the shipwrecked sinner is the opposite of this. When he is seeking God and imagines Him a long way off. He is nearer to him than he is willing to think (Rom. 10 : 8).

THE PASTORAL SONG.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"I am the good Shepherd, and know my sheep, and am known of mine. As the Father knoweth me, even so know I the Father: and I lay down my life for the sheep."—JOHN 10: 14, 15.

Light from the Revised Version—Jesus Speaking of Himself—An Instructive Metaphor—Its Implications—I. Complete Character—The Good Shepherd—Owner of the Sheep—Care-taker—Never Off Duty—The Provider—Shepherds at Mentone—Leader and Defender—II. Complete Knowledge—Of Their Number—Their Persons—The Shepherd Known—III. Complete Sacrifice—The Refrain of the Pastoral Song.

As the passage stands in the Authorized Version, it reads like a number of short sentences with scarcely any apparent connection. Even in that form it is precious; for our Lord's pearls are priceless even when they are not threaded together. But when I tell you that in the Greek the word "and" is several times repeated, and that the translators have had to leave out one of these "ands" to make sense of the passage on their line of translation, you will judge that they are none too accurate in this case. To use many "ands" is after the manner of John; but there is usually a true and natural connection between his sentences. The "and" with him is usually a real golden link, and not a mere sound; we need a translation which makes it so. Observe also that in our version the word "sheep" is put in italics, to show that it is not in the original. There is no need for this alteration if the passage is more closely rendered. Hear then, the text in its natural form:

"I am the good Shepherd; and I know mine own, and mine own know me, even as the Father knoweth me, and I know the Father; and I lay down my life for the sheep."

This reading I have given you is that of the Revised Version. For that Revised Version I have but little care as a general rule, holding it to be by no means an improvement upon our common Authorized Version. It is a useful thing to have it for private reference, but I trust it will never be regarded as the standard English translation of the New Testament. The Revised Version of the Old Testament is so excellent, that I am half afraid it may carry the Revised New Testament upon its shoulders into general use. I sincerely hope that this may not be the case, for the result would be a decided loss. However, that is not my point. Returning to our subject, I believe that, on this occasion, the Revised Version is true to the original. We will therefore follow it in this instance, and we shall find that it makes most delightful and instructive sense. "I am the good Shepherd; and I know mine own, and mine own know me, even as the Father knoweth me, and I know the Father; and I lay down my life for the sheep."

He who speaks to us in these words is the Lord Jesus Christ. Observe, also, that we have not only Christ for the speaker, but we have Christ for the subject. He speaks, and speaks about Himself. My brethren, who can speak of Jesus but Himself? None but Jesus can reveal Jesus. Take, then, these words as being doubly refreshing, because they come directly from the Well-beloved's own mouth, and contain rich revelations of His own all-glorious self.

I. First, here is COMPLETE CHARACTER.

Whenever the Saviour describes Himself by any emblem, that emblem is exalted and expanded; and yet it is not able to bear all His meaning. The Lord Jesus fills out every type, figure, and character; and when the vessel is filled there is an overflow. There is more in Jesus, the good Shepherd, than you can pack away in a shepherd. He is the good, the great, the chief Shepherd; but He is much more. Emblems to set Him forth may be multiplied as the drops of the morning, but the whole multitude will fail to reflect all His brightness. The Eastern shepherd is generally the owner of the flock, or at least the son of their owner, and so their proprietor in prospect. The sheep are His own. He remembers how He came into possession of the flock, and when and where each of the present sheep was born, and where He has led them, and what trials He had in connection with them; and He remembers this with the emphasis that they are His own inheritance.

THE SHEPHERD'S WEALTH.

His wealth consists in them. He very seldom has much of a house, and he does not usually own much land. He takes his sheep over a good stretch of country, which is open common for all his tribe; but his possessions lie in his flocks. Ask him, "How much are you worth?" He answers, "I own so many sheep." In the Latin tongue the word for money is akin to the word "sheep," because, to many of the first Romans, wool was their wealth, and their fortunes lay in their flocks. The Lord Jesus is our Shepherd; we are His wealth. If you ask what is His heritage, He tells you of "the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints." Ask Him what are His jewels, and He replies: "They shall be mine in that day." If you ask Him where His treasures are, He will tell you, "The Lord's portion is His people. Jacob is the lot of His inheritance." The Lord Jesus Christ has nothing that He values as He does His own people. For their sakes He gave up all that He had, and died naked on the cross.

The shepherd, as he owns the flock, is also the caretaker. He takes care of them always. One of our brethren now present is a fireman; and, as he lives at the fire-station, he is always on duty. I asked him whether he was not off duty during certain hours of every day; but he said: "No; I am never off duty."

when he goes to bed, he is on duty while he is eating his breakfast, he is on duty if he walks down the street. Any time the bell may ring the alarm, and he must be in his place, and hasten to the fire. Our Lord Jesus Christ is never off duty. He has constant care of His people day and night. He has declared it—"For Zion's sake will I not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest." He can truly say what Jacob did: "In the day the drought consumed me, and the frost by night." He says of His flock what He says of His garden: "I the Lord do keep it; I will water it every moment: lest any hurt it, I will keep it night and day."

Then He has to be the provider too, for there is not a woolly head among them that knows anything about the finding and selecting of pasture. But, dear friends, we often dream that we are the shepherds, or that we, at any rate, have to find some of the pasture. I could not help saying just now to our friends at our little prayer-meeting: "There is a passage in the Psalms which makes the Lord do for us what one would have thought we could have done for ourselves—'He maketh me to lie down in green pastures.' " Surely, if a sheep can do nothing else it can lie down. Yet to lie down is the very hardest thing for God's sheep to do. It is here that the full power of the rest-giving Christ has to come in to make our fretful, worrying, doubtful natures lie down and rest. Our Lord is able to give us perfect peace, and He will do so if we will simply trust to His abounding care. It is the shepherd's business to be the provider; let us remember this, and be very happy.

Moreover, He has to be the leader. He leads the sheep wherever they have to go. I have often been astonished at the shepherds in the south of France, which is so much like Palestine, to see where they will take their sheep. Once every week I saw the shepherd come down to Mentone, and conduct all his flock to the sea-beach. I could see nothing for them but big stones. Folk says that perhaps this is what makes the mutton so hard; but I have no doubt the poor creatures get a little taste of salt, or something which does them good. At any rate, they follow the shepherd, and away he goes up the steep hillsides, taking long steps, till he reaches points where the grass is growing on the sides of the hills. He knows the way, and the sheep have nothing to do but to follow him wherever he goes. Theirs not to make the way; theirs not to choose the path; but theirs to keep close to his heel. Do you not see our blessed Shepherd leading your own pilgrimage? Cannot you see Him guiding your way? Do you not say: "Yes, He leadeth me, and it is my joy to follow?" Lead on, O blessed Lord; lead on, and we will follow the traces of Thy feet!

DEFENCE.

The shepherd in the East has also to be the defender of the flock, for wolves yet prowl in those regions. All sorts of wild beasts attack the flock, and He must be to the front. Thus it is with our Shepherd. No wolf can attack us without finding our Lord in arms against him. No lion can roar upon the flock without arousing a greater than David. "He that keepeth Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep." He is a shepherd, then, and He completely fills the character—much more completely than I can show you just now.

Notice that the text puts an adjective upon the shepherd, decorating him with a chain of gold. The Lord Jesus Christ Himself says: "I am the good Shepherd." "The good Shepherd"—that is, He is not a thief that steals, and only deals with the sheep as He bears them from the fold to the slaughter. He is not a hireling; He does not do merely what He is paid to do, or commanded to do, but He does everything con amore, with a willing heart. He throws His soul into it. Even shepherds that have had their own flocks have neglected them, as there are farmers who do not well cultivate their own farms; but it is never so with Christ. He is the good Shepherd; good up to the highest point of goodness, good in all that is tender, good in all that is kind, good in all the directions in which a shepherd can be needed; good at fight and good at rule; good in watchful oversight, and good in prudent leadership; good every way most eminently.

And then notice He puts it, "I am the good Shepherd." That is the point I want to bring out. Of other shepherds we can say, He is a shepherd; but this is the Shepherd. All others in the world are shadows of the true Shepherd; and Jesus is the substance of them all. That which we see in the world with these eyes is, after all not the substance, but the type, the shadow. That which we do not see with our eyes, that which only our faith perceives, is after all the real thing. I have seen shepherds; but they were only pictures to me. The Shepherd, the real, the truest, the best, the most sure example of shepherdry is the Christ Himself; and you and I are the sheep.

II. May the Holy Spirit bless the Word still more, while I speak in my broken way upon the next point: the COMPLETE KNOWLEDGE.

The knowledge of Christ toward His sheep, and of the sheep toward Him, is wonderfully complete. I must read the text again: "I know mine own, and mine own know me, even as the Father knoweth me, and I know the Father."

First, then, consider Christ's knowledge of His own, and the comparison by which He sets it forth: "As the Father knows me." I cannot conceive a stronger comparison. Dost thou know how much the Father knows the Son, who is His glory, His darling, His alter ego, His other self—yea, one God with Him? Dost thou know how intimate the knowledge of the Father must be of His Son, who is His own wisdom, ay, who is His own self? The Father and the Son are one spirit. We cannot tell how intimate is that knowledge; and yet so intimately, so perfectly, does the great Shepherd know His sheep.

He knows their number. He will never lose one. He will count them all again in that day when the sheep shall pass again under the hand of Him that telleth them, and then He will make full tale of them. "Of all that Thou hast given me," says He, "I have lost none." He knows their persons. He knows the age and character of every one of His own. He assures us that the very hairs of our head are all numbered. Christ has not an unknown sheep. It is not possible that He should have overlooked or forgotten one of them. He has such an intimate knowledge of all who are redeemed with His most precious blood that one of them for another, nor misjudges one of them. He knows their constitutions—those that are weak and feeble, those that are nervous and frightened, those that are strong, those that have a tendency to presumption, those that are sleepy, those that are brave, those that are sick, sorry, worried, or wounded. He knows those that are hunted by the devil, those that are caught up between the jaws of the lion, and shaken till the very life is almost driven out of them. He knows their feelings, fears, and frights. He knows the secret ins and outs of every one of us better than any one of us knows himself.

I need not enlarge upon this. It ought, however, to be very full of comfort to you that you are so known of your Lord, especially as He knows you not merely with the cold, clear knowledge of the intellect, but with the knowledge of love and of affection. He knows you in His heart. You are peculiarly dear to Him. You are approved of Him. You are accepted of Him. He knows you by acquaintance with you; not by hearsay. He knows you by communion with you; He has been with you in sweet fellowship. He has read you as a man reads his book, and remembers what He reads. He knows you by sympathy with you: He is a man like yourself. "He was in all points made like unto His brethren;" and by being made like to us He has come to know us, and He does know us in a very practical and tender way.

HE IS KNOWN.

The second part of the subject is our knowledge of the Lord, and the fact by which it is illustrated. "And Mine own know Me, even as I know the Father." I think I hear some of you say: "I do not see so much in that. I can see a great deal more in Christ's knowing us." Beloved, I see a great deal in our knowing Christ. That He should know me is great condescension, but it must be easy to Him to know me. Being so divine, with such a piercing eye as His, it is amazingly condescending, as I say, but it is not difficult for Him to know me. The marvel is that I should ever know Him. Oh, sirs, this is a wonder so great that I do not think you and I have come at it yet to the full, or else we should sit down in glad surprise, and say, This proves Him to be the good Shepherd indeed, not only that He knows His flock, but that He has taught them so well that they know Him! With such a flock as Christ has, that He should be able to train His sheep so that they should be able to know Him, and to know Him as He knows the Father, is miraculous.

Yes, we know Jesus. We feel the power of our union with Him. We know Him, brethren, so that we are not to be deceived by FALSE SHEPHERDS.

There is a way nowadays of preaching Christ against Christ. It is a new device of the devil to set up Jesus against Jesus, His kingdom against His atonement, His precepts against His doctrines. The half Christ in His example is put up, to frighten souls away from the whole Christ, who saves the souls of men from guilt as well as from sin, from hell as well as from folly. But they cannot deceive us in that way. No, beloved, we know our Shepherd from all others. We know Him from a statue covered with His clothes. We know the living Christ, for we have come into living contact with Him, and we cannot be deceived any more than Jesus Christ Himself can be deceived about the Father. "Mine own know Me, even as I know the Father."

We have a beautiful picture before us. Can you realize it for a minute? The Lord Jesus here among us—picture Him! He is the Shepherd. Then, around Him are His own people, and wherever He goes they go. He leads them into green pastures, and beside the still waters. And there is this peculiarity about them: He knows them as He looks upon every one of them, and they every one of them know Him. There is a deeply intimate and mutual knowledge between them. As surely as He knows them, they know Him. The world knows neither the Shepherd nor the sheep, but they know each other. As surely, as truly, and as deeply, as God the Father knows the Son, so does this Shepherd know His sheep; and as God the Son knows His Father, so do these sheep know their Shepherd. Thus in one band, united by mutual intercourse, they travel through the world to heaven. "I know Mine own, and Mine own know Me, even as the Father knoweth Me, and I know the Father." Is not that a blessed picture? God help us to figure in it!

III. The last subject is COMPLETE SACRIFICE.

The complete sacrifice is thus described: "I lay down my life for the sheep." These words are repeated in this chapter in different forms some four times. The Saviour keeps on saying: "I lay down my life for the sheep." It looks as if this was another refrain of our Lord's personal hymn. I call this passage His pastoral song. The good Shepherd with His pipe sings to Himself and to His flock, and this comes in at the end of each stanza, "I lay down my life for the sheep."

Did it not mean, first, that He was always doing so? All His life long He was, as it were, laying it down for them; He was divesting Himself of the garments of life, till He came to be fully disrobed on the cross. All the life He had, all the power He had, He was always laying it out for His sheep. It means that, to begin with. And then it means that the sacrifice was actively performed. It was ever in the doing as long as He lived; but He did it actively. He did not die for the sheep merely, but He laid down His life, which is another thing. Many a man has died for Christ; it was all that he could do. But we cannot lay down our lives, because they are due already as a debt of nature to God, and we are not permitted to die at our own wills. That were suicidal and improper. With the Lord Christ it was totally different. He was, as it were, actively passive. "I lay down my life for the sheep. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again. This commandment have I received of my Father."

I like to think of our good Shepherd, not merely as dying for us, but as willingly dying—laying down His life: while He had that life, using it for us; and when the time came, putting off that life on our behalf. Great Shepherd, do you mean to say that you have as these? What! for these sheep? Died for them? What! die for sheep, Shepherd? Surely you have other objects for which to live beside sheep. Have you not other loves, other joys? We know that it would grieve you to see the sheep killed, torn by the wolf, or scattered; but you really have not gone so far in love for them that for the sake of those poor creatures you would lay down your life? "Ah, yes," He says, "I would, I have!" They are poor things, make the most you can of them. They have hard hearts, and wandering wills; and the best of them are no better than they should be. Saviour, didst thou die for such? He looks round, and says: "Yes, I did. I did. I laid down my life for the sheep. I am not ashamed of them, and I am not ashamed to say that I died for them." He glories in substitution for His people. He makes it His boast, when He speaks of His chosen, that He suffered in their stead—that He bore, that they might never bear, the wrath of God on account of sin. What He glories in, we also glory in. "God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world!"

O beloved, what a blessed Christ we have who loves us so, who knows us so—whom we also know and love! May others be taught to know Him, and to love Him! Yea, at this hour may they come and put their trust in Him, as the sheep trust to the shepherd! We ask it for Jesus' sake. Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

MY STUDY

and Other Essays, by Austin Phelps, D.D. The first three essays of this volume are an interesting review of the memorable events which were connected with the room in which they were written. Some very important movements, prominent among them the project of American missions to the heathen, which gave rise to the American Board, were initiated by the great men who were wont to meet in that study in Andover Seminary. Professor Phelps sketches the men whose names are held in honor by every student of the theological literature of America. The room became famous in Dr. Porter's time, when, he being a lifelong invalid, the professors went to him there for conference. The weekly prayer-meeting was held there, and who can tell how much the Church to-day owes to the petitions uttered by the great thinkers who gathered in that hallowed place. Among them were Dr. Woods, Professor Stuart, Dr. John Adams, Dr. Justin Edwards, Dr. Pierson, Dr. Worcester, and Dr. Morse. The three essays in which the associations of the room are sketched carry us back into a period of Church history in which men believed strongly, and when latitudinarian ideas were held in abhorrence. It is a natural transition from these sketches to the present condition of religious belief. The eight essays which follow a suggestive article on Vibratory Progress are devoted to a vindication of the doctrine of Eternal Punishment, and it looks very much as though these chapters were the main object Dr. Phelps had in view in the production of his work. At the present time the doctrine, if honestly believed by the clergy, is to a large extent, kept in the background. It is seldom that a sermon on the subject is preached. Dr. Phelps believes that the Church needs toning up on this subject, and in a close, vigorous, lucid manner he proceeds to show its consistency with the Divine character, that it is clearly taught in both the Old and New Testaments, and that it is reasonable on philosophical principles. "Knowing the terrors of the Lord," we preach, is the keynote of the application. The following essays on inspiration are equally forcible, and in the orthodox tone. Pp. 319; price, $1.50. SMOOTH STONES, from Scripture Streams, by Mr. and Mrs. George C. Needham. In seeking stones for use in the warfare of our time against the Goliath of unbelief, inconsistency and sin, the two eminent evangelists who have combined their labors on this volume, have gone with confidence to the Scripture stream. There is no mistaking their belief. It is thorough and unequivocal. Mr. Needham says in his first pages, we are "decided believers in the plenary verbal inspiration of the Bible," and further defines his position by explaining that it excludes the idea of any admixture whatever of error, and means "the literal words spoken by the Spirit of God." That is a courageous utterance in these days, and will startle some whose notions of inspiration are growing hazy under the attacks upon it made by men of "advanced thought." In alternate chapters the two authors agreeing on that standpoint, present the teaching of the Bible on the subjects which are of the most vital moment to the Christian in his life and work. They keep themselves in the background, and appeal on each subject to "the law and the testimony." An intimate acquaintance with the Bible, and a thoughtful, reverent study of its pages during many years, enable them to present in clear forcible light the passages from the various books which bear on the subject in hand, thus enabling the reader to see, not so much what are the author's views about it as what the Bible declares. It thus forms a digest of biblical truth, the value of which is inestimable to a believer who, in circumstances of doubt, trial, or perplexity desires to know only what is his Lord's will, that he may do that. The following is a list of the subjects dealt with: Those by Mr. Needham are: The Spirit and the Word; Redemption according to Moses; The Christian Soldier; Vessels Made Meet; Salvation Unfolded; Flesh and Spirit; Christian Armor; Worship; Sinners made Sons of God; Decay and Revival, and Christian Work. Those by Mrs. Needham are: Personal Appropriation of Jesus; Hope an Anchor; Justification; Negative Testimony; The Blessed Nativity; Prayer and Fasting; Leaven; Leprosy in Houses; Resurrection Words; The River of the Sanctuary, and Zachariah's Prophetic Anthem. MEETINGS AT KEMUEL HOME, PHILADELPHIA.

A CORRESPONDENT in Philadelphia sends the following communication:

"We have had two days of delightful meetings at Kemuel Home this past week, conducted by Mrs. Baxter.

"The name of this dear servant of God, whom so many thousands on this side the Atlantic have learned to love, drew a large and deeply interested assembly of Christians together in the parlors of the Home.

"From their first gathering on Tuesday morning the Spirit of God was most manifestly present, softening every heart, and drawing all into communion with Him, or to deep hungerings for Him, and giving us through the lips of our dear sister, in her rich exposition of Scripture, 'a feast of fat things, of wine on the lees well refined.' The rested look that came into many faces, and the light that shone suddenly out from the hungry and the troubled ones, the tears that sprang from very many eyes, showing hearts that were touched and soothed, testified to the power that the dear Lord has given His honored handmaid in rightly dividing the word of truth.

"Not one, I am sure, of all that came went away without his portion of heavenly meat, the many, many happy faces testifying to this.

"Thus the seal of the Lord was evidently added to all by the blessed healings of body, as well as of soul that He sent, thus 'confirming the Word with signs following.' One lady who had been deaf four years after the prayer and anointing instantly received her hearing. Another received her sight within a few hours afterward, and still another was healed of serious disease; one dear brother, having the same night been healed and blessed spiritually, bringing great joy to his family. And since the meetings have closed news have come of a most blessed healing of one who was utterly beyond all skill of the physicians. 'Blessed be the Lord God, who only doeth wondrous things.'

"And all the people rejoiced for all the glorious things that were done by Him."

BOYCOTTING IN CORK.

MR. GLADSTONE in one of his speeches warned the discontented people in Ireland that "the resources of civilization" were not exhausted. The phrase has become historical. We have yet to see what resources civilization has in its store that have not been applied to the Irish problem. The student of history, so far, has found more matter for reflection in "the resources of civilization" that the malcontents have put into operation. Without entering upon the merits of the question at issue between the English Government and the Irish people, there is the broad, incontroverted fact that a large majority of the Irish people are bitterly hostile to England. It is alleged, on the one hand, that their poverty and misery are the consequence of their own idleness and improvidence, and, on the other, that it results from unjust and oppressive government; but no one denies the fact of the misery and discontent. The curious study is of the methods they have employed to ameliorate their condition. In bygone times a nation under the government of another power, and desiring emancipation, saw only one way to it. It must stand forth in armed rebellion. If it did not fight, or, fighting, was vanquished, it submitted with what grace it could. Ireland, however, has brought "the resources of civilization" into use, and not without success. The morality of the mode of fighting is too large a question to discuss here. It is the mode itself as a new departure in history that is interesting.

The problem was for a small power to fight a greater power without risking annihilation. Excommunication had brought even powerful kings to the feet of the Pope; why should not excommunication be equally effective against obnoxious people as a social weapon? With a population largely of one mind it could be used, and it was used. Captain Boycott was the first man on whom it was tried. He was cut off from social intercourse. No man would buy of him, or sell to him, or have dealings of any kind with him. The result satisfied the ingenious leaders, and the verb "to boycott" was incorporated in the language. The practice, too, which was more to the purpose, was brought into regular use. How extensively it has been employed, and how much it is dreaded, all newspaper readers know. It has been carried into all relations of life. On October 4th last year a notice was posted at the gates of the house occupied by an obnoxious landowner—Mrs. Morgan O'Connell—at Kildysart, ordering members of the League to shun her at mass and not to sit in the same gallery with her. Mrs. O'Connell attended mass and was the sole occupant of the gallery. Only three of her two hundred tenants paid their rents. The scene depicted in the illustration shows another phase of it. A representative of the Land League is warning intending purchasers that certain barrels of butter are the property of boycotted people, and there is the usual result—no one will buy. It is not a fancy sketch; it occurred in the market of Cork last year. The weapon is undoubtedly a powerful one, and, like other effective weapons, it has been and is likely to be often unjustly employed; but for good or evil it will certainly be kept in remembrance whenever and wherever a weak people is arrayed against a powerful one.

GUY WARRINGTON'S RESCUE.

IN a ten-cent lodging-house in Chatham Street, New York, on Christmas eve, some years ago, Guy Warrington, with a board on his knees, sat writing. Looking over his shoulder one could see that he was at work putting the finishing touches to a play, and if he had been asked he would have told that the play was his last hope of obtaining funds to keep him from starvation. He continued absorbed in it until the light was put out for the night, and then he retired to dream about it.

A month later, with the play in his pocket, he was hurrying to the east side of the city, with a set, determined face. It was bitterly cold, and the man shivered as the piercing east wind penetrated his thin clothes to his skin.

"Will you come in and have a cup of coffee?" said a voice at his elbow. "It is a bitter cold night."

Warrington turned and looked at the man in amazement. "No; I have no money," he said, and was hurrying on.

"That makes no difference," said the man. "You will be welcome on your own account, without money."

"Thank you; I will come, then," said Warrington. And he was taken in a friendly way by the arm, and led into a well-lighted room where at rough tables there were cups and plates on which thick pieces of bread were piled. A cup was filled with coffee, and he ate and drank ravenously.

"We have a little meeting in another room; will you wait for it?" said the friend who had brought him in.

"No; I have business on hand that won't wait."

"Well, come to-morrow night; we shall be glad to see you."

"I doubt that; though I am obliged to you for the invitation. I shall be in a condition that will prevent my being welcome here or anywhere else."

"You will never sink to any condition that would render you unwelcome here."

"Why, man, you would not have a corpse at your meeting, would you? I shall be dead in an hour. I should have been dead by this time if you had not called me in."

"Do you mean that you were going to commit suicide?"

"I mean that I am going to do that."

"You astonish me. You look like a man of sense, but that is the most senseless thing a man can do. I beg your pardon, but I did not take you for a fool."

"You were right; I am not a fool. This resolve is a proof of my wisdom."

"There I differ; but, if you are determined upon it, you ought not to do so serious a thing—you will admit it is a serious thing—without a little preparation. Come in here," opening the door of a little room, "and let us have a few words of prayer. It will not detain you long, and as you expect so soon to go into God's presence, you should not go without asking Him to have mercy on you."

Warrington turned into the room recklessly. "You have been so kind to me," he said, "that I should like to tell you why I am doing this thing. Then you will see why it is the best thing for me. I am the son of wealthy parents in England. I had a university education, but as there was no need for me to enter a profession, I spent my time in dissipation instead of study. I need not go into details. Suffice it that I became so vile that my father cast me off, and I came to America. I could get no employment in fact, I was not fit for any. As a last resort I wrote this play"—producing it—"no manager would buy it. Now I am out of money, I have lost my character, I have no friends, and no knowledge that will help me to a living. If I live I must beg or steal, and I will do neither. I am a burden to the world and to myself. Suicide is the proper thing for such a man."

"No; I do not agree with you. It is a foolish thing, I might say a wicked thing—but it is foolish, anyhow. Let me show you why." For nearly half an hour the good man labored to convince the despairing man. Finally he obtained his promise that the wicked deed should not be done that night, and an assurance that it should not be done until there had been one more interview. Then he prayed with him earnestly, and Warrington departed, with the loan of a dollar for present needs.

Several interviews followed, and temporary employment was found for him. Warrington worked hard, and in the course of a few weeks had some thirty dollars in his possession. Better than that, he had in his heart a trust in God and saving faith in Christ. Then his friend urged him to return home, with the understanding that if he were not received he should come back to America and work should be found for him.

Late one evening he stood at his father's door. "I will arise and go to my father, and will say unto him"—he murmured as he rang the bell. The door was opened by a footman whom he had never seen before. The lackey looked him over superciliously, and opined that "Mr. Warrington cannot be seen to-night." He was about to close the door when the young man handed him a slip of paper on which his name was written, and underneath the single word, "repentant."

"Mr. Warrington will not see you," said the man; "it's of no use waiting; we never give anything to beggars."

But Warrington thought it would be of use, and he remained standing on the stoop after the door was closed, and he was shut out in the snow. A few minutes passed while the footman was leisurely making his way to the library, but that was all. Hasty steps were heard hurrying along the hall, the door was flung wide open, and Warrington was clasped in his father's arms.

Such a scene that old house had never witnessed as it did that night. With tears and caresses and prayers the young man was taken back and welcomed. As he thought of that other winter evening in New York, not so long ago, and as he told how he had been held back from self-destruction, earnest prayers went up for God's blessing on the man who had been used of God to save a soul from death.

It is not every prodigal who has a wealthy father ready to welcome back the penitent, but every prodigal may be sure that his Heavenly Father's ear is ever open to his confession of sin and folly, and that, whatever His servants may say to Him, God is waiting with infinite love to receive him (Luke 15:10).

A FATAL FRAUD.

AN ORIGINAL SERIAL STORY. BY LEW VANDERPOOLE.

On the Track.

It was impossible to tell Alice, in the first agony of her grief, the dreadful conclusion at which the physician had arrived as to the cause of her father's sudden death. She was informed that another physician would be called in and an autopsy held. A little later the two doctors came, and alone in James Grey's room they examined the body.

While they were engaged in the melancholy duty Alice lay on a lounge in her own apartment weeping. She did not know until now how dear her father had become to her.

During the months that had passed since their reconciliation her love had grown and intensified. Mr. Grey was chastened and mellowed in his old age. His delicacy and consideration touched her heart. Ever attentive, genial, and kind, she clung to him with sure confidence, and turned to him in every difficulty. He, not her husband, was her stay and adviser, and it was to him she looked for comfort and help. Strong faith he always had, but in his later years love seemed to have outgrown faith and changed his nature. He was gentle to all about him, and Alice remembered how, when only a few weeks ago a servant had been detected in dishonesty, it was her father's voice that was raised in a plea for mercy. Her father, whom she had never known in her childhood to show mercy to any one! "Give her another chance," he had said. "She was sorely tempted, perhaps. We must try to reclaim her. Let us lead her to Christ; a soul is too precious to be lost." Strange words to come from James Grey's lips, but they were consistent with the spirit that dominated his life. The caustic speeches, the bitter denunciation of wrong-doers which he used to pour forth, Alice had never heard from him since their reconciliation. His words were all of love, as if all the world was encircled in his affection.

Then, too, that earnest appeal he made to her on the very night on which he died. Why, it was only last night! How far away it seemed now! She could never make her promised confession to him. He could not plead for her now. How kind he was, how intensely earnest in his entreaties that she would yield herself to God! And he was gone from her just as she needed him most! Whose hand now would lead her to the Saviour? Who could give her counsel and encouragement? As Alice pondered her tears streamed afresh, for her bereavement was a loss beyond conception. Hard and proud and cold as she was, her heart was broken. How she wished that she could make her peace with God, that from Him she might receive consolation! Not yet could she go to Him. Between Him and herself was the insurmountable barrier of her unconfessed sin, as well as of long years of neglect. Her eyes were closed to the glorious fact that the way, through Jesus, was opened before her. She could not see that the sacrifice offered on Calvary atoned for the sins of the world, and that by pleading that, God would receive her, sinful as she was. So she mourned in darkness, and her desolation invited despair.

Twice, a knock was given on her door as she lay busied with these sad thoughts, and she heard it not. A third time the signal was given, and then the door was gently opened, and her daughter Myrtie, looking in, said, "Mamma, I am sorry to disturb you, but the doctors want to speak to you. Will you come down? It is something of importance."

Alice rose, bathed her face, and descended to the parlor in which the two physicians sat. She was too much agitated to speak, but, sinking wearily into a chair, motioned to them that she was ready to hear.

"Madam," said the elder of the two, who was the one first summoned, "we have made a painful, I may say, a shocking discovery. I grieve to inform you that Mr. Grey died by violence. I supposed, as you did, that he must have suffered from apoplexy, or disease of the heart, but when I saw the body I suspected, as I said at the time, that there was foul play. That was why I wished for an autopsy. We found it unnecessary to proceed with it. My friend and I carefully examined the body, and found irresistible proof that Mr. Grey was murdered."

Alice did not faint or shriek. Her frame grew rigid, her hands closed convulsively, and her face grew ashy pale, but she did not lose her self-control.

"How was it done?" she asked, hoarsely.

"He was stabbed in the neck," said the doctor. "The criminal was evidently a cunning fellow. The wound he made was scarcely visible, but it was fatal. I will, if you consent, call myself on the police and explain all particulars. There should be no loss of time in hunting the man down. He is a dangerous criminal to have at large."

"Do so, please, Doctor," said Alice, "and ask them to send me an expert detective. Oh, my poor father! It was cruel, cruel!"

"We can at least give you some slight alleviation," said the doctor. "Though he died a cruel death, it was a painless one. He suffered nothing. All the signs show that he was stunned by the blow on the forehead, and when the fatal wound was given, the weapon penetrated to the brain at once, and he could have felt nothing of it."

"Thank you for that comfort, Doctor," said Alice. "I am relieved to know that. But what a cruel thing—so old a man, and a man who had not an enemy in the world."

"I think it will be found that he had an enemy," said the doctor; "there must have been malice as well as cupidity at work. The police will be able, I hope, to find that out with such clues as I shall give them. I will go to headquarters at once. You will please take care that nothing is disturbed in the room before the officers arrive."

A few minutes later the doctor was closeted with the chief of police describing the circumstances. He left with that officer a piece of an awl about an inch long, which he had extracted from the wound at the back of the murdered man's neck. The murderer had used such violence that the instrument had broken, and he had been unable to withdraw it.

Alice received the officer sent to the house with eagerness. One desire, the desire that her father's death should be avenged, held complete possession of her. Grief must wait while the murderer was at liberty. She was prepared for any effort, and no expense should be spared, though her last dollar should be called for, if only the perpetrator of the infamous deed could be brought to justice.

The calm demeanor of the detective irritated the excited woman. Crimes were his natural element. This was no more to him than dozens of other murders on the detection of which he had exercised his skill. It was an interesting case, and nothing more. To Alice it seemed a crime unprecedented, an outrage which should convulse the country. In a quiet, business-like way the man examined the scene of the crime, made a few notes, and questioned every one about the premises. He found that the victim's gold watch had been taken, and his pockets rifled. A box in the room had been broken open and some valuables abstracted. "It was a burglary," he said to Alice. "The old gentleman probably found the man at work when he went to bed, and was struck down as he entered the room. It was a vicious party that did it, and perhaps something the old man said made him think he'd better quiet him, so as he couldn't identify him if he was caught. Leave it to us, madam, we shall catch him when he disposes of the watch. We'll send telegrams to other cities if you will describe it."

Alice did so, and the man departed. But she was not satisfied. She resolved to put a private detective on the case, and that night a gentlemanly man with a bright, intelligent face and a long brown beard arrived in response to her telegram. He introduced himself as John Smith, and explained that he was not regularly employed by the firm. He was from New York, and was already engaged in a case with which he believed this case was connected, and being in the office when Mrs. Vane's telegram arrived, he had proffered his services, and they had been accepted. He made a minute examination of the premises, and then, armed with a note from Alice, he waited on the physician and the chief of police. An hour later he returned, and, finding Mrs. Vane with her son and daughter, who were doing their utmost to comfort their sorrowing mother, he begged for a private interview with her.

They went at once to a room in another part of the house, where there was no danger of eavesdroppers or interruption. There he told her about the broken awl which he had brought.

"Permit me to examine the awl?" she said, as she seated herself in front of him.

He handed it to her, and watched her closely as she examined it.

"You and I have apparently come to the same conclusion," he said.

"What do you mean?"

"You have an idea who killed James Grey, and so have I."

"Whom do you suspect?"

"Stephen Vane."

"Your proof?"

"The awl."

"Do you know Stephen Vane—or anything about his habits?"

"I have been familiar with his habits for forty years."

"Why does the broken awl make you suspect him?"

"He used to have a knife with several tool-blades. One of these blades was an awl, like this."

"How do you know all this?"

"A friend of mine gave him the knife. That friend is dead now, and the knife has undoubtedly been retained as a keepsake."

A sigh of relief escaped Alice, as Smith said this. He noticed it, and smiled.

"Don't you think that you have woven a very fanciful theory around a very trifling point?" she continued.

"There is less of the fanciful about my theory than you are willing to admit," he answered, firmly.

"Will you please explain yourself?"

He bowed. "I will do so with pleasure—to a certain extent—"

"Stop a moment," she exclaimed, impatiently. "Unless this is to be an unreserved exchange of confidences you need not say any more. I have an opinion as to who killed my father, as you have conjectured, but I shall not express that opinion unless you also speak freely."

"I am willing and ready to give you a full knowledge of my theory and discoveries so far as the killing of James Grey is concerned, though the telling of even that much is a decidedly unprofessional thing to do. There is, however, another case of which this murder is a counterpart—a wheel within a wheel, as it were. It is the part of my investigation pertaining to this last case which I must keep to myself for the present. You shall be informed of the whole matter at the earliest practicable moment. To say anything to you as to my plans, aside from your father's murder, would be to place embarrassing limitations upon my own actions."

"Has what you have to say anything to do with the man whom I married in Vermont nineteen years ago?"

Her breath came quick, and her bosom heaved with some powerful emotion. She seemed to regret the question the moment it left her lips.

His answer came slowly, and in the quiet tone which characterized his most striking utterances.

"Yes," he said, "in a short time I shall have something to say concerning the man you married in Vermont, but I shall have still more to say concerning the man who was placed in an English mad-house several months after that marriage."

His piercing black eyes were full upon her as he finished speaking, but her own eyes met them frankly.

There was no mistaking it—she did not understand him.

And then for the first time since he came into the house Smith showed signs of excitement.

"Are you playing upon my credulity?" she demanded.

"No!"

"I believe you. I also believe that you are dealing fairly with me. You are either a very well-informed man or a most successful guesser. In either case you excite my astonishment and have my confidence. Tell me what you choose to, and I will be satisfied. Why do you suspect Stephen Vane of this murder?"

"My reasons are these: The man who killed James Grey entered that unfortunate man's room through the door, and not through the window. The window was open, to be sure, but it could not have been raised from the outside without breaking the glass or forcing the fastening. Possibly it might have been unfastened, and if so, the murderer could have entered the room by means of it without breaking the glass. In that case he must have reached the window by the veranda roof. But had he done so he would have left footprints, as the dust on the veranda roof is half an inch deep. But the dust is undisturbed. There is not a footprint in it. Mr. Grey was also robbed. Had robbery been the sole object of his assailant the blow on his forehead would have been quite sufficient, since that knocked him senseless. Again, a man struck in the face naturally falls upon his back. Your father was found lying upon his face. After knocking him senseless Mr. Grey's assailant deliberately turned him over and drove the awl into the back of his neck. By accident the awl was broken off. Probably because it was driven in with great force. The murdered man was then robbed to make it appear that robbery was the sole object of the assault. And then—"Well?"

"And then the murderer took the morning train for New York."

"The morning train!"

"Exactly. Stephen Vane did not leave Richmond until this morning."

"Can this be proven?"

"By competent witnesses."

"Oh, this is dreadful!" she exclaimed, covering her face with her hands.

DANIEL IN BABYLON.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 31, Dan. i. Golden Text, Ps. 119-9. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Captive Princes—Educated in Babylon—Learning not to be Despised—Not to be Sought for Glory—Daniel's Abstinence—A Test Proposed—The Examination Passed—The Hebrews in Office—A Witness Against Two Wrong Courts—The Despot's Dream—A Fair Challenge to the Astrologers—Their Failure—Sentenced to Death—Daniel's God-honoring Testimony.

WE have already seen that the first installment of the captivity of Judah took place in the reign of Jehoiakim, who was then himself carried captive into Babylon (II Chron. 36:5-7). With the king were carried away other members of his family, and also some of the vessels of the house of God. Nebuchadnezzar, who seems to have possessed many valuable qualities as a ruler, did not ill-treat his captives, but went so far as to seek out some of the royal family, "the king's seed, of the princes" to whom he might give special educational advantages. Doubtless, in those days, Babylon was the world's university; Egypt, the school of learning in Moses' time had declined in importance, and now, instead of the magicians of Egypt; the magicians, astrologers, sorcerers and Chaldeans of Babylon were the men of learning of the then known world.

GOD DOES NOT DESPISE LEARNING.

He can use a Moses "learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians" (Acts 7:22); a Daniel, who in "all matters of wisdom and understanding," was "ten times better than all the magicians and astrologers" in Babylon; a Saul of Tarsus, who was "brought up . . . at the feet of Gamaliel" (Acts 22:3). But He can also dispense with it, as we see from His choice of Peter and John who were "unlearned and ignorant men" (Acts 4:13). Shall young people be indifferent then to their studies? Surely not. "Brethren, let every man, wherein he is called, therein abide with God" (I Cor. 7:24). If a student is called and converted, let him finish his studies, abiding therein with God, but taking God's view of learning and of intellect, "Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom" (Jer. 9:23). "Lean not unto thine own understanding" (Prov. 3:5); "Be not wise in your own conceits" (Rom. 12:16). How many a young student has undermined his constitution for life in seeking for honors which were for his own glory, not the Lord's. He might have known just as much if he had renounced ambition and taken things quietly, and might have been more useful in the world.

Nebuchadnezzar's choice of students was "children in whom there was no blemish, but well-favored and skilful in all wisdom, and cunning in knowledge, and understanding science, and such as had ability in them to stand in the king's palace." Such were Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael and Azariah. All four of these were children of God, and it is very blessed to know that the grace of God in these lads was manifest in their success in study, so that they were chosen out of others—probably unconverted young men—as the chosen subjects for a university education in Babylon. But the same faith in God which had claimed and received His blessing on their studies, led Daniel to purpose in his heart that with the portion of the king's meat, and with the wine which he drank. Nebuchadnezzar had ordained that a daily portion from his own table should be given to these young Hebrews, and Daniel felt that as he studied for God, and not for his own glory, so also whether he ate or drank or whatever he did, he would do all to the glory of God (I Cor. 10:31).^{*} But Daniel did not take matters into his own hands rashly, and offensively speak of his principles. As in all else, he doubtless committed the matter to the Lord, and He made his way for him. "God had brought Daniel into favor and tender love with the prince of the eunuchs," and thus he was disposed to please Daniel, although he might not fully have understood the lad's motives. How far Daniel had spoken to him of the true God does not appear, but it is more than probable that the young Hebrew prince had sought to win this Babylonian to the Lord. The prince of the eunuchs was in a dilemma; he feared to offend the despotic king who had appointed the diet of his Hebrew students, and at the same time he loved Daniel, and respected his scruples.

The young student, guided no doubt by God, at last proposed a solution of the difficulty. He said to Melzar, the steward, who provided their food, "Prove thy servants, I beseech thee ten days, and let them give us pulse to eat, and water to drink. Then let our countenances be looked upon before thee, and the countenance of the children that eat the portion of the king's meat; and as thou seest, deal with thy servants." Nothing could be fairer or more sensible. Daniel knew that "man doth not live by bread only, but by every word which proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live" (Deut. 8:3), and he knew how to commit the matter to God. Daniel rested the matter over upon God as His responsibility, and did nothing further himself. Melzar was agreeable to the test, and at the end of ten days their countenances appeared fairer and fatter in flesh than all the children which did eat the portion of the king's meat.

GOD HAD TRIUMPHED.

And His name was magnified. Three years passed by; the time for the examination in the presence of the king approached, and he conducted it in person. Competitors there were, and many of them, "but among them all was found none like Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, therefore stood they before the king," or, in other words, they were put into office. What was the secret of this? Their own studiousness? No doubt they were among the most thorough, but this would not have carried them through if the hand of the Lord had not been with them; it was He who gave them success. Were they elated with their success, when question after question "in all matters of wisdom and understanding" were answered by them, better than by all the magicians and astrologers in all the realm of Babylon? We think not, for had they been conceited, they would have become independent of God, and this the Bible shows in the next chapter they were not.

There are many young people whose consciences are exercised about amusements, jewelry, dress, about stimulants, etc., God calls first for the "purpose of heart," that all shall be for Him. But there are many who take matters into their own hands, and without waiting for God to make their way, rush on headlong into extremes where God does not stand with them; neglect home duties and become irritable when reminded that those claims are as much from God as the winning of souls. There are others who are contented to go on in the world without caring for the honor of God, and so let all their spirituality be sapped away while they leave the unsaved around them to perish. Daniel is a witness against both classes.

The young man went on walking simply with God. The imperious King of Babylon, who was unused to any opposition to his will, had one night a dream which disturbed his sleep, and which, nevertheless, he could not recall.

is unreasonable in its demands. Nebuchadnezzar required of the Chaldeans and other men of letters, that they should not only interpret the dream, but also recall it to him. With one accord they besought the king to tell them the dream, and they would show him the interpretation. With senseless imperiousness he insisted that they should show the dream on pain of death, and on doing so should be handsomely rewarded. And, "knowing they laid claim to supernatural power, he said: 'Tell me the dream, and I shall know that ye can show me the interpretation thereof.'"^{*} Alas, for poor humanity, which wants to be great in itself! how its impotence is ever coming to light! All power in heaven and earth is given unto Jesus, we have none, our only power is Christ, the power of God. The poor wise men of Babylon were obliged to own: "There is not a man upon the earth that can show the king's matter . . . there is none other that can show it before the king, except the gods, whose dwelling is not with flesh." But these men did not know that men were living with whom God spoke face to face (Ex. 33:11).

SENTENCE ON THE ASTROLOGERS.

Nebuchadnezzar, in his rage, commanded the execution of all the wise men in Babylon, a wholesale destruction of all the professors of the Babylonian universities. Among others, Daniel and his fellows were sought for execution. But Daniel had a resource unknown to the wise men of Babylon, so he went in, and desired of the king time, and he would show him the interpretation. There was no perhaps, Daniel was sure of his God, he knew that nothing was hidden from Him, and thus he claimed his privilege as a prophet: "Surely the Lord will do nothing, but He revealeth His secret to His servants the prophets" (Amos 3:7). So he called together his three friends, and they put the matter so definitely and surely into God's hands that Daniel slept, knowing that all was safe with Him. And the secret was revealed to him in a night vision. The young prophet was in no hurry to go out and tell the wise men that their lives were safe; he took time first to praise God, knowing that He had power to care for those who were in danger. But Arioch, the king's captain, who had been appointed to superintend the massacre, was in haste, and brought Daniel before the king. So the question, "Art thou able to make known the dream?" Daniel answered, the wise men cannot, "but there is a God in heaven that revealeth secrets," and then proceeded to tell the king his dream, and to give God's interpretation of it. Thus God made this simple, faithful, humble young student the means of saving the lives of all the wise men in Babylon, and also of showing them and the king that their claim of possessing power in themselves was false.

^{*} They might deceive the king as to the interpretation, but they could not invent the dream without his discovering their duplicity.

"THIS WILL OF MINE."

Laid on Thine altar, oh my Lord divine,
Accept my gift this day, for Jesus' sake;—
I have no jewels to adorn Thy shrine,
Nor any world-famed sacrifice to make,—
But here I bring within my trembling hand
This will of mine,—a thing that seemeth small,
And only Thou, dear Lord, canst understand
How, when I yield Thee this, I yield mine all!
Hidden therein, Thy searching eye can see Struggles of passion, visions of delight,
All that I love, or am, or fain would be,—
Deep loves, fond hopes, and longings infinite.
It hath been wet with tears and dimmed with sighs,
Clenched in my grasp, till beauty it hath none.
Now from Thy footstool, where it vanquished lies,
The prayer ascendeth, "May Thy will be done."
Take it, oh Father, ere my courage fail;
And merge it so in Thine own will, that e'en
If in some desperate hour my cries prevail,
And Thou give back my gift, it may have been
So changed, so purified, so fair have grown,
So one with Thee, so filled with peace divine,
I may not know or feel it as mine own,
But, gaining back my will, may find it Thine.

Rt. Hon. W. E. Gladstone—Mr. C. S. Parnell, M. P.—Marquis of Salisbury—Lobby of the House of Commons.

THE BRITISH PARLIAMENT AND ITS LEADERS.

ON the first page is a picture of the lobby of the House of Commons, a place where members stroll about while waiting for a division, talk with their friends, and meet any of their constituents who may happen to be in London and desirous of an interview with their representative.

The House of Commons, which assembled on January 12th to take the oath of allegiance, is the eleventh House which the people have elected since Queen Victoria ascended the throne. The English system differs from our own in this, that it is impossible to predict with certainty when a new House will be elected. Under the Constitution a House cannot exist more than seven years, but it may be dissolved in one year, or at any time that the Queen, by the advice of the Premier, decides. If in one, two, or three years after a House has been elected, some great question arises in which the Premier and his Cabinet have not the support of the House, and he thinks that the people agree with him, though their representatives do not, he can have a new election by persuading the Queen to dissolve. As there have been eleven elections in forty-nine years, it appears that the average life of a House is about four and a half years. Then, too, another peculiarity is that all the members of Parliament are out at the same time, not a section only, as with us. They are all eligible for re-election, and, of course, there are some who are always sure of being elected; but it is conceivable that circumstances might arise in which a gang of men might be sent to compose the House of Commons not one of whom had ever sat in Parliament before. That is one of the anomalies of John Bull's system, which he of course considers a pattern for the world.

The new House consists of 670 members, and of these 332 are new men, who have never sat in Parliament before. Four are native born Americans. Some of the new men sent by Irish constituencies are objectionable to the aristocratic members of the House. They include 2 drapers, 3 tavern-keepers, 4 farmers, 2 grocers, 1 carpenter, 1 blacksmith, 1 florist, 1 watchmaker, 1 tailor, 1 dancing-saloon owner, and 1 manager of a dancing-school. Some of the English towns have sent representatives whom the aristocrats dislike quite as much. Among them are a mason, a glass-blower, a tailor, a bootmaker, and a laborer. One of the Americans is Mr. Louis J. Jennings, formerly editor of the New York Times, who will be a great acquisition to the House, being familiar with democratic institutions. A second American is Mr. Ashmead Bartlett, of Philadelphia, who married the philanthropic Baroness Burdett-Coutts. Mr. F. A. Channing, of Boston, Mass., is a third American. He is one of the family made famous by the Unitarian preacher of that name. The fourth is Mr. John H. Puleston, formerly connected with Jay, Cooke & Co.

Prominent among the new members is Joseph Arch, the leader of the agricultural laborers. In 1872 he was working on a farm for $3 a week, and was better paid at that than other laborers. But he organized the Agricultural Laborers' Union, and became its President, and has now persuaded an agricultural constituency to send him to Parliament. He is an earnest Christian man and a lay preacher among the Methodists. William Abraham, the pitman, comes from Wales. His opponent at the polls was one of his former employers, a colliery owner, who must have felt chagrined at being relegated to obscurity, while one of his men was sent in his place to legislate for the empire.

The Pall Mall Gazette says, in its description of the new members, that the most notable thing about them, as a class, is "the increase of professional men. The lawyers in the new House number ninety-five. They are thus far more numerous than any other single interest, and form one seventh of the whole House. To the lawyers must be added sixteen doctors, thirty-one journalists (no profession has increased its representation in so great a proportion as these gentlemen), twelve teachers, and some half dozen members of various other professions which may fairly be called learned. If all these are added together a total is arrived at large enough to give a color of its own to the new House." Another remarkable thing about them is the unusually large number of young men. But whereas in former Houses a young member was generally the eldest son of a Lord, who would be a Lord himself when his father died, in this House there are very few of that kind. The young men, as a rule, are not aristocrats. A large number of "eldest sons" offered themselves at the polls, but nearly all of them were defeated. The people are evidently becoming more intelligent, and realize that the aristocrats have quite enough influence on legislation through the House of Lords, without sending more of them to operate in the Commons. It may be hoped, for the sake of the country, that the House will be wisely guided, for it has much serious business before it, and its decisions will have momentous results on the future of the British Empire.

THE RT. HON. W. E. GLADSTONE.

WILLIAM EVART GLADSTONE, the ex-Premier, whose portrait, taken from the latest photograph he sat for, appears on the first page, was born December 29th, 1809. He is, therefore, in his seventy-seventh year. At the age of twelve (in September 1821), he was entered at Eton College, where the education at that time was largely confined to classics and Latin and Greek compositions; but there were there with him many scholars who afterward achieved fame in public life. Young Gladstone was a studious boy, and became a sound classical scholar.

He entered Christ Church College, Oxford, as a student, in 1829, remaining there until 1831, leaving at Michaelmas in that year with distinguished educational honors—a Double First in Classics and Mathematics. While there he exhibited an almost superhuman industry and a wonderful aptitude for learning, neither of which has in the least abated or become dimmed in his subsequent career, but, on the contrary, they have increased with his years.

After leaving the University of Oxford he spent a year in a Continental tour, which period was devoted to the study of men, manners and things in the various countries of Europe. In 1831 he entered Parliament as a Conservative member for Newark. He had been in "the House" but two years ere Sir Robert Peel, then Prime Minister, appointed him to the unimportant post of a junior Lordship of the Treasury. In the next year, 1835, he was appointed Under-Secretary for Colonial Affairs. But as Sir Robert Peel's ministry was only four months in office, Mr. Gladstone, with his chief, was soon sitting on the opposition benches.

HIS FIRST BOOK.

Relieved of official duties, Mr. Gladstone devoted his leisure to the production of a book which at its appearance created a profound sensation throughout Great Britain. It was entitled "The State in its Relations with the Church." During the same period of exclusion from office he devoted himself with delight to his classical studies. He was then, and still is, a superlative master of the language and literature of Greece and Rome. He has published Latin sacred verses not appreciably inferior in grace to those of Buchanan or Milton, and as a Homeric student his "Studies of Homer and the Homeric Age" entitles him to a well-earned niche among scholarly critics. Classical study is with him a delightful pleasure, and it is related of him that on one occasion, when his seat in Parliament hung in the balance, and he was the prey of torturing anxiety, he shut himself in his study on the decisive polling-day, and spent the anxious hours in translating Homer. He is credited with having written the most elegant Latin translation of Toplady's hymn, "Rock of Ages," while sitting on the Government benches in "the House" at night, to relieve the weariness of a dull debate.

In 1839, when he was becoming prominent in Parliament, Lord Macaulay wrote of him: "He is a young man of unblemished character, and of distinguished Parliamentary talents, the rising hope of those stern and unbending Tories who follow reluctantly and mutinously a leader whose experience and eloquence are indispensable to them, but whose cautious temper and moderate opinions they abhor. . . . But we believe we do him no more than justice when we say that his abilities and his demeanor have obtained for him the respect and good will of all parties." Since that was written Mr. Gladstone has made rapid strides upward, leaving the quagmire of Toryism far behind him. Now, instead of being the rising hope of the Tories, he is their dread and aversion.

OFFICIAL WORK.

In 1841 Mr. Gladstone came back to office, again under the leadership of Sir Robert Peel, and occupied for two years the subordinate position of Vice-President of the Board of Trade. He then stepped into the office of President of the same department, a position in which his ability began to have weight in the ministerial councils.

When the Government, in 1846, proposed the Repeal of the Corn Laws, he resigned his seat for Newark, because the Duke of Newcastle, who owned the borough, and who was his patron, held anti-repeal views. Upon his re-entering Parliament for the University of Oxford he threw the weight of his great debating power into the scale in favor of University Reform and the Removal of Jewish Disabilities. Up to that time no Jew could occupy a seat in Parliament or hold any office under the Crown.

Up to this period Mr. Gladstone had been known as a Conservative, but in 1851 he finally severed himself altogether from the great Conservative party; and in the same year he was called by purely domestic circumstances to Naples. There his humanity was stirred to its very core by the unheard-of brutalities of King Bomba, who had imprisoned twenty thousand of his subjects without trial. His passionate cry for redress sounded throughout the civilized world.

In 1852, when Lord Derby became Prime Minister, Mr. Gladstone declined to join his Ministry; and the Budget, which was propounded by Mr. Disraeli, who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer, was so severely criticized by Mr. Gladstone that Lord Derby's Conservative Ministry was overthrown. Lord Aberdeen then formed a Liberal Government, of which Mr. Gladstone became Chancellor of the Exchequer, and in 1853 he made his first great financial speech, bringing forward a Budget. After the dissolution of Lord Aberdeen's Cabinet, in 1853, Mr. Gladstone did not take any prominent part in Parliamentary affairs for several years, but occupied himself a good deal in literary studies.

In the Administration of 1859 Mr. Gladstone, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, was instrumental in the repeal of the paper duty, and in negotiating the commercial treaty with France. At the general election of 1865 he was defeated at the University of Oxford by Mr. Gathorne Hardy, now Lord Cranbrook, but he was elected for Southwest Lancashire. In the election of 1868, however, he lost his seat after a fierce contest, which excited the most intense interest throughout the country. His victorious opponent was this time Mr. Cross, who became Secretary for the Home Department. This event, however, did not exclude him from Parliament, as the electors of Greenwich had a few days previously returned him by a large majority. He was subsequently elected by the Mid-Lothian district in Scotland, which he still represents.

When the death of Lord Palmerston took place, in 1866, Mr. Gladstone became leader of the House of Commons, and Prime Minister of England, and brought in a Reform Bill. He was, however, displaced by Mr. Disraeli's Ministry for two years; but again, in December, 1868, became Prime Minister, and in 1869 the Irish Church Disestablishment Act was passed.

In January, 1874, Mr. Gladstone dissolved Parliament, and at the General Election which ensued the votes were, for the first time, taken by secret ballot. The result was that 351 Conservative members were elected, and only 302 Liberals. Hence Mr. Gladstone at once resigned, and Mr. Disraeli, afterward Lord Beaconsfield, became Prime Minister. In April, 1880, Mr. Gladstone again became Premier, and held office until June last, when he was succeeded by the Marquis of Salisbury.

PRIVATE LIFE.

Mr. Gladstone is an early riser, and when at Hawarden Castle, his country residence, may be seen, shortly after eight o'clock in the morning, walking down to prayers in the village church, where his son ministers. Early devotion and breakfast over, he gives the remainder of the morning, till the gong sounds for luncheon at two o'clock, to work, reading, writing, meditation, or to the performance of arithmetical feats which no Cabinet Minister has ever surpassed, or, in the proper season, to a bout of tree-felling, at which he is an expert. After luncheon more reading follows, and in due time he shows himself at dinner to be "a singularly temperate man in meat and drink."

Although he is the best controller of the National Exchequer that England has ever had, and is notoriously by no means a wealthy man, his personal charities are almost reckless. In the course of his long walks in the neighborhood of Hawarden his pockets have an astonishing knack of emptying themselves, and amusing stories are told of his having had to walk home inconvenient distances of ten and twelve miles in the dark because of his inability to raise so much as a railway fare. As Prime Minister he refused an increase of salary, and it is not generally known that he has never drawn the pension to which he is legally entitled since his retirement from office, showing plainly that he has no desire to become rich or even to increase his comforts at the nation's expense.

His piety is, in its manifestations, of a humble and unaffected character. Even when Prime Minister of England he has been found in the humblest houses, reading to the sick or dying consolatory passages of Scripture in his own soft, melodious tones.

Two of Mr. Gladstone's sons, William H. and Herbert, are members of Parliament, and a third, Stephen Edward, is a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

MR. C. S. PARNELL,

The Leader of the Irish "Nationalists."

CHARLES STEWART PARNELL, whose portrait also appears on our front page, is the eldest surviving son of the late Mr. John Henry Parnell, of Avondale. His mother is an American lady, now residing in New Jersey. She is the only daughter of Admiral Charles Stewart, of the United States Navy. Mr. C. S. Parnell, the subject of this sketch, was born in 1846, and is therefore now forty years of age. He was educated at Magdalene College, Cambridge. He has acted as a county magistrate, and filled the office of High Sheriff of Wicklow in 1874. He was elected Member of Parliament for Meath in 1875, and at once assumed, with the consent of his fellow-countrymen, the position of in the House of Commons, and more recently of the Irish Land League, and the "Nationalist" party. In April, 1880, his singular popularity among those who are agitating for the separation of Ireland from Great Britain resulted in his being elected simultaneously for the counties of Meath and Mayo, and for the City of Cork, but he chose to sit in Parliament for the last-named constituency, for which he has again been elected.

Mr. Parnell, the professed enemy of Irish landlords, himself belongs to that class. His property is beautifully situated at Avondale, in the heart of the magnificently picturesque county of Wicklow, and consists of four thousand six hundred and seventy-eight statute acres, valued in the Government returns for 1873 at $6225 annually. The mansion of Avondale was built in 1779, and here the Parnell family have resided for a hundred years past. The estate is bounded on the north by the Avonmore River, and on the south by the Avonbeg, and extends to where these waters, immortalized in song by the poet, Thomas Moore, meet in the romantic Vale of Avoca. There are about thirty tenants on the Avondale estate, with holdings varying in extent from four acres upward. Mr. Parnell besides has erected a saw-mill and turnery on his property, and for several years he was employed making borings for lead, and at last succeeded in reaching and striking a rich and most remunerative lode.

A VISIT TO THE PARNELL ESTATE

is thus reported upon by a gentleman connected with a leading London daily contemporary. He says: "I visited tenants at eight different points of the Parnell property. Of these I found that two owed over three years' rent and two over one year. One possessed a lease forever, two held leases for two hundred years each, and three leases for thirty-one years each. In one or two instances the rents were above the Government valuation, but they were mostly below it. Every tenant, in addition, has been receiving a reduction of twenty per cent of the rent for some time past, and the tenants informed me that since the death of Mr. Parnell's father, in 1858, the rents have in several cases been permanently reduced. The Avonmore property is in settlement. New leases can be granted only for thirty-one years, and no fine can be taken on their renewal." This visitor also gives a favorable account of the condition of the work-people employed in Mr. Parnell's saw-mill. The men and youths at work were, a few years before, only ordinary farm laborers. They all seemed exceedingly active and skilful.

THE MARQUIS OF SALISBURY,

The British Premier.

THE British Premier, Robert Arthur Talbot Gascoyne Cecil, Marquis of Salisbury, whose portrait also appears on the first page, was born in 1830, and is therefore now fifty-six years old. The Cecil family, to which he belongs, is descended from Robert Cecil, a younger son of the famous Lord Burleigh, the favorite minister of Queen Elizabeth.

The head of the family in 1789 attained a marquissate, which is the next rank in the peerage to that of duke, which is the highest. In his younger days the present Marquis, being the second son of his father, was known as Lord Robert Cecil. By the death of his elder brother he became Viscount Cranborne, a title borne by the eldest son of the Marquis of Salisbury for the time being, and in 1868, on the death of his father, he became Marquis, and exchanged his seat in the House of Commons for the place in the House of Lords which the marquissate gives.

From the time of his leaving the University, in 1853, Lord Salisbury has been in Parliament. The bulk of the real estate in the town of Stamford belongs to the Salisbury family, and when a member of Parliament is to be elected by that town the man who has the support of the Marquis of Salisbury is sure of his election; as the voters know that they will consult their own interests by voting for their landlord's candidate. Thus it happened that when the present Marquis, then Lord Robert Cecil, a young man of twenty-three, presented himself as a candidate, he was elected. Curiously enough, he made his mark in the House by his attacks on the Conservative administration, which he lashed with a caustic severity in which he has few equals. He assailed it also in the press; for, being poor, as most younger sons of peers are (owing to the law of entail, which compels the estate being carried intact from the father to the eldest son, or the next male heir, if he has no son), he was glad to earn a little money by writing for the press. Many of the most trenchant and vigorous articles which appeared in the London Standard and the Saturday Review were from his pen. It was chiefly owing to his ferocious editorials that the Saturday Review acquired the name of the "Saturday Reviler."

By 1866, however, he had made his peace with the Conservatives, who were much in need of young men of ability, and when, in July of that year, the late Earl Derby became Premier, he gave the young man a seat in the Cabinet. He had by that time become an ultra-Conservative, and when he saw his colleague, Mr. Disraeli, proposing to extend the suffrage, he resigned his office in disgust. He recommenced his assaults on Disraeli, but this time there was a difference. He attacked him personally, while supporting Conservative principles, to which he believed Disraeli to be untrue.

The differences were eventually arranged, and in 1874, when Disraeli returned to power, Salisbury held office under him, and became his warm friend. Together they managed the Russian crisis, and by their firmness and undaunted demeanor compelled the Czar to disgorge his ill-gotten plunder and retire from before Constantinople. He resigned with Disraeli, who had then become Earl Beaconsfield, in 1880, and from that time until last year was out of office. The party have looked to him for guidance since the death of Lord Beaconsfield, and now that Lord Cairns is dead he stands almost alone in his party as a man of capacity and statesmanship. Writing of him recently, in Harper's Magazine, Mr. Henry W. Lucy says:

"As a Parliamentary orator the Marquis of Salisbury is unquestionably the chief figure in the House of Lords. He possesses in almost equal degree with the late Lord Beaconsfield the quality of being personally interesting, of which he is now the only remaining example in either House of Parliament. . . . His very manner in the House of Lords makes his speeches the more charming. Half leaning on the table, and speaking in a level, conversational tone, as if his helpless victims were not of sufficient importance to inspire either gesture or declamation, he lets fall some of the most rasping sentences which it is possible to combine in the English language. . . . Lord Salisbury is the most striking figure in the peerage, the nearest realization modern conditions permit of the capable, headstrong and imperious English baron of the fourteenth, fifteenth and sixteenth centuries."

The Prodigal's Only Friend.—Harry Newham tells a touching story of his prodigal brother. "He had been a fast living young man, and his family had exercised great patience with him. He had been taken back to the house again and again after long spells of absence. One Christmas night when the family were gathered together, Harry's brother came home after an absence longer than usual. He walked in among them, a bundle of rags, and there was a consultation in the family that night. The old father turned to Harry, and said: 'What shall we do with thy brother, Harry?' 'Turn him out, father, he is not fit to live here; he is a disgrace to the family,' was Harry's prompt reply. The father turned with a sad heart to his daughter, and said: 'What shall we do with thy poor brother?' 'Turn him into the street, father, Harry is right,' she said. The father turned to a friend of his who was sitting by, and said: 'What shall we do with my poor prodigal boy?' 'Harry and his sister are right, turn him out, for by keeping him you only encourage him in the course he is taking.' The poor father looked at his outcast son with a pitying glance as he sat crouching near the door. He seemed to be about to seal the doom of the poor trembling wretch. Then rising, he approached his son, and throwing his arms around his neck, he said: 'Thou hearest what thy brother, thy sister, and thy friend have said, but I am thy poor old father and I cannot bear to part with my boy.' He was not turned out, but was led through the loving-kindness of his father to accept of Christ as his Saviour."

CLANDESTINE MARRIAGE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, January 24, 1886.

"Stolen waters are sweet, and bread eaten in secret is pleasant. But he knoweth not that the dead are there."—PROV. 9:17, 18.

THE Garden of Eden was a great orchard of fruit-bearing trees, bushels and bushels of round, ripe, glorious fruit; but the horticulturist and his wife having it in charge hankered for one special tree, simply because it was forbidden, starting a bad streak in human nature, so that children will now sometimes do something simply because they are forbidden to do it. This is not easily unsnarled. Tell a company that they may look into any twenty rooms of a large house except one, and their chief desire is to see that one, though all the others were picture-galleries and that a garret. If there were in a region of mineral springs twenty fountains, but the proprietor had fenced in one well against the public, the one fenced in would be the chief temptation to the visitors, and they would rather taste of that than of the other nineteen. Solomon recognized this principle in the text, and also the disaster that follows forbidden conduct, when he said: "Stolen waters are sweet, and bread eaten in secret is pleasant. But he knoweth not that the dead are there."

In this course of sermons on "The Marriage Ring" I this morning aim a point-blank shot at "Clandestine Marriages and Escapades."

Yonder comes up through the narrows of New York harbor a ship having all the evidence of tempestuous passage: salt water-mark reaching to the top of the smoke-stack; mainmast, foremast, mizzenmast twisted off; bulwarks knocked in; lifeboats off the davit; jib-sheets and lee-bowlines missing; captain's bridge demolished; main shaft broken; all the pumps working to keep from sinking before they can get to wharfage. That ship is the institution of Christian marriage, launched by the Lord grandly from the banks of the Euphrates, and floating out on the seas for the admiration and happiness of all nations. But free-loveism struck it from one side, and Mormonism struck it from another side, and hurricanes of libertinism have struck it on all sides, until the old ship needs repairs in every plank, and beam, and sail, and bolt, and clamp, and transom, and stanchion. In other words, the notions of modern society must be reconstructed on the subject of the marriage institution. And when we have got it back somewhere near what it was when God built it in Paradise the earth will be far on toward resumption of Paradisaical conditions.

DEPLORABLE LAXITY.

Do you ask what is the need of a course of sermons on this subject? The man or woman who asks this question is either ignorant or guilty. In New England, which has been considered by many the most moral part of the United States, there are two thousand divorces per year. And in Massachusetts, the headquarters of steady habits, there is one divorce to every fourteen marriages. The State of Maine, considered by many almost frigid in proprieties, has in one year four hundred and seventy-eight divorces. In Vermont swapping wives is not a rare transaction. In Connecticut there are women who boast that they have four or five times been divorced. Moreover, our boasted Protestantism is, on this subject, more lax than Roman Catholicism. Roman Catholicism admits of no divorce except for the reason that Christ admitted as a lawful reason. But Protestantism is admitting anything and everything, and the larger the proportion of Protestants in any part of the country, the larger the ratio of divorce. Do you not then think that Protestantism needs some toning up on this subject?

GROWING POPULARITY.

Aye, when you realize that the sacred and divine institution is being caricatured and defamed by clandestine marriages and escapades all over the land, does there not seem a call for such discussion? Hardly a morning or evening paper comes into your possession without reporting them, and there are fifty of these occurrences where one is reported because it is the interest of all parties to hush them up. The victims are, all hours of the night, climbing down ladders or crossing over from State to State, that they may reach laws of greater laxity, holding reception six months after marriage to let the public know for the first time that a half year before they were united in wedlock. Ministers of religion, and justices of the peace, and mayors of cities, willingly joining in marriage runaways from other States and neighborhoods; the coach-box and the back seat of the princely landau in flirtation; telegrams flashing across the country for the arrest of absconded school misses, who started off with arm full of books, and taking rail trains to meet their affianced—in the snow-drifts of the great storm that has recently passed over the country some of them, I read, have perished—thousands of people in a marriage whose banns have never been published; precipitated conjugality; bigamy triumphant; marriage a joke; society blotched all over with a putrefaction on this subject which no one but the Almighty God can arrest.

We admit that clandestinity and escapade are sometimes authorized and made right by parental tyranny or domestic serfdom. There have been exceptional cases where parents have had a monomania in regard to their sons and daughters, demanding their celibacy or forbidding relations every way right. Through absurd family ambition parents have sometimes demanded qualifications and equipment of fortune unreasonable to expect or simply impossible. Children are not expected to marry to please their parents, but to please themselves. Given good morals, means of a livelihood, appropriate age and quality of social position, and no parent has a right to prohibit a union that seems deliberate and a matter of the heart. Rev. Philip Henry, eminent for piety and good sense, used to say to his children: "Please God and please yourselves, and you shall never displease me."

A MATRIMONIAL TRAGEDY.

During our Civil War a marriage was about to be celebrated at Charleston, S. C., between Lieutenant de Rochelle and Miss Anna, the daughter of ex-Governor Pickens. As the ceremony was about to be solemnized a shell broke through the roof and wounded nine of the guests, and the bride fell dying, and, wrapped in her white wedding robe, her betrothed kneeling at her side, in two hours she expired. And there has been many as bright a union of hearts as that proposed that the bombshell of outrageous parental indignation has wounded and scattered and slain.

If the hand offered in marriage be blotched of intemperance; if the life of the marital candidate has been debauched; if he has no visible means of support, and poverty and abandonment seem only a little way ahead; if the twain seem entirely unmatched in disposition—protest and forbid and re-enforce your opinion by that of others, and put all lawful obstacles in the way; but do not join that company of parents who have ruined their children by a plutocracy of domestic crankiness which has caused more than one elopement. I know of a few cases where marriage has been under the red-hot anathema of parents and all the neighbors, but God approved, and the homes established have been beautiful and positively Edenic.

But while we have admitted there are real cases of justifiable rebellion, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred—yea, in nine hundred and ninety-nine cases out of a thousand, these unlicensed departures and decampments by moonlight are ruin, temporal and eternal. It is safer for a woman to jump off the docks of the East River and depend on being able to swim to the other shore, or get picked up by a ferry-boat. The possibilities are that she may be rescued, but the probability is that she will not. Read the story of the escapades in the newspapers for the last ten years, and find me a half dozen that do not mean poverty, disgrace, abandonment, police court, divorce, death, and hell. "Stolen waters are sweet, and bread eaten in secret is pleasant. But he knoweth not that the dead are there." Satan presides over the escapade. He introduces the two parties to each other. He gets them to pledge their troth. He appoints where they shall meet. He shows them where they can find officiating minister or squire. He points out to them the ticket-office for the rail train. He puts them aboard, and when they are going at forty miles the hour he jumps off and leaves them in the lurch; for, while Satan has a genius in getting people into trouble, he has no genius for getting people out. He induced Jonah to take ship for Tarshish when God told him to go to Nineveh, but provided for the recreant prophet no better landing-place than the middle of the Mediterranean Sea.

THE DIME NOVEL.

The modern novel is responsible for many of these abscondings. Do you think that young women would sit up half a night reading novels in which the hero and heroine get acquainted in the usual way, and carry on their increased friendliness until, with the consent of parents, the day of marriage is appointed, and amid the surrounding group of kindred the vows are taken? Oh, no! There must be flight, and pursuit, and narrow escape, and drawn dagger, all ending in sunshine, and parental forgiveness, and bliss unalloyed and gorgeous. In many of the cases of escapade the idea was implanted in the hot brain of the woman by a cheap novel, ten cents' worth of unadulterated perdition.

THE SCHEME OF BAD MEN.

These evasions of the ordinary modes of marriage are to be deplored for the reason that nearly all of them are proposed by bad men. If the man behave well he has a character to which he can refer, and he can say: "If you want to inquire about me there is a list of names of people in the town or neighborhood where I live." No; the heroes of escapades are nearly all either bigamists, or libertines, or drunkards, or defrauders, or first-class scoundrels of some sort. They have no character to lose. They may be dressed in the height of fashion, may be cologned, and pomatumed, and padded, and diamond-ringed, and flamboyant-cravatted, until they bewitch the eye and intoxicate the olfactories; but they are double-distilled extracts of villainy, moral dirt and blasphemy. Beware of them. "Stolen waters are sweet, and bread eaten in secret is pleasant. But he knoweth not that the dead are there."

SOCIAL DEGRADATION.

Fugitive marriage is to be deplored because it almost always implies woman's descent from a higher social plane to a lower. If the man was not of a higher plane, or the marriage on an equality, there would be no objections, and hence no inducement to clandestinity. In almost all cases it means the lowering of womanhood. Observe this law: a man marrying a woman beneath him in society may raise her to any eminence that he himself may reach; but if a woman marry a man beneath her in society she always goes down to his level. That is a law inexorable, and there are no exceptions. Is any woman so high up that she can afford to plot for her own debasement? There is not a State in the American Union that has not for the last twenty years furnished an instance of the sudden departure of some intelligent woman from an affluent home to spend her life with some one who can make five dollars a day, provided he keeps very busy. Well, many a man has lived on five dollars a day and been happy, but he undertakes a big contract when with five dollars a day he attempts to support some one who has lived in a home that cost twenty thousand per annum. This has been about the history of most of such conjunctions of simplicity and extravagance, the marriage of

OX AND EAGLE.

The first year they get on tolerably well, for it is odd and romantic, and assisted by applause of people who admire outlawry. The second year the couple settle down into complete dislike of each other. The third year they separate and seek for divorce, or, as is more probable, the man becomes a drunkard, and the woman a blackened wail of the street. "Stolen waters are sweet, and bread eaten in secret is pleasant. But he knoweth not that the dead are there."

These truant marriages are also to be deplored because in most instances they are executed in defiance of parental wisdom and kindness. Most parents are anxious for the best welfare of a child. If they make vehement and determined opposition, it is largely because it is a match unfit to be made, and they can see for their daughter nothing but wretchedness in that direction. They have keener and wiser appreciation, for instance, of the certain domestic demolition that comes from alcoholism in a young man. They realize what an idiot a woman is who marries a man who has not brains or industry enough to earn a livelihood for a family. No bureau of statistics can tell us the number of women who, after marriage, have to support themselves and their husbands. If the husband becomes invalid, it is a beautiful thing to see a wife uncomplainingly by needle, or pen, or yardstick, or washing-machine, support the home. But these great, lazy masculine louts that stand around with hands in their pockets, allowing the wife with her weak arm to fight the battle of bread, need to be regurgitated from society.

REVERSED RELATIONS.

There are innumerable instances in these cities where the wife pays the rent, and meets all the family expenses, and furnishes the tobacco and the beer for the lord of the household. No wonder parents put on all the brakes to stop such a train of disaster. They have too often seen the gold ring put on the finger at the altar turning out to be the iron link of a chain of domestic servitude. What a farce it is for a man who cannot support himself, and not worth a cent in the world, to take a ring which he purchased by money stolen from his grandmother's cupboard, and put it on the finger of the bride, saying: "With this ring I thee wed, and with all my worldly goods I thee endow."

It is amazing to see how some women will marry men knowing nothing about them. No merchant would sell a hundred dollars' worth of goods on credit without knowing whether the customer was worthy of being trusted. No man or woman would buy a house with encumbrances of mortgages, and liens, and judgments against it uncanceled; and yet there is not an hour of the day or night for the last ten years there have not been women by hasty marriage entrusting their earthly happiness to men about whose honesty they know nothing, or who are encumbered with liens, and judgments, and first mortgages, and second mortgages, and third mortgages of evil habits. No wonder that in such circumstances parents in conjugating the verb in question pass from the subjunctive mood to the indicative, and from the indicative to the imperative. In nearly all the cases of escape that you will hear of the rest of your lives there will be a headlong leap over the barriers of parental common sense and forethought. "Stolen waters are sweet, and bread eaten in secret is pleasant. But he knoweth not that the dead are there."

INVOLVES DECEPTION.

We also deplore these fraudulent espousals and this sneaking exchange of single life for married life because it is deception, and that is a corroding and damning vice. You must deceive your kindred, you must deceive society, you must deceive all but God, and Him you cannot deceive. Deception does not injure others so much as it injures ourselves. Marriage is too important a crisis in one's life to be decided by sleight of hand, or a sort of jugglery which says: "Presto, change! Now you see her, and now you don't."

Better to wait for years for circumstances to improve. Time may remove all obstacles. The candidate for marital preferences may change his habits, or get into some trade or business that will support a home, or the inexorable father and mother may be promoted to celestial citizenship. At the right time have the day appointed. Stand at the end of the best room in the house with joined hands, and minister of religion before you to challenge the world that "if they know of any reason why these two persons shall not be united, they state it now or forever hold their peace," and then start out with the good wishes of all the neighbors and the halo of the Divine sanction. When you can go out of harbor at noon with all flags flying do not try to run a blockade at midnight.

In view of all this I charge you to break up clandestine correspondence if you are engaged in it, and have no more clandestine meetings, either at the ferry, or on the street, or at the house of mutual friends, or at the corner of the woods. Do not have letters come for you to the post-office under assumed address. Have no correspondence that makes you uneasy lest some one by mistake open your letters. Do not employ terms of endearment at the beginning and close of letters unless you have a right to use them. That young lady is on the edge of danger who dares not allow her mother to see her letters.

CONFIDE IN PARENTS.

If you have sensible parents take them into your confidence in all the affairs of the heart. They will give you more good advice in one hour than you can get from all the world beside in five years. They have toiled for you so long, and prayed for you so much, they have your best interests at heart. At the same time let parents review their opposition to a proposed marital alliance, and see if their opposition is founded on a genuine wish for the child's welfare, or on some whim, or notion, or prejudice, or selfishness, fighting a natural law and trying to make Niagara run up stream. William Pitt, the Prime Minister of England in the reign of George III., was always saying wise things. One day Sir Walter Farquhar called on him in great perturbation. Mr. Pitt inquired what was the matter, and Sir Walter told him that his daughter was about to be married to one not worthy of her rank. Mr. Pitt said: "Is the young man of respectable family?" "Yes." "Is he respectable in himself?" "Yes." "Has he an estimable character?" "Yes." "Why, then, my dear Sir Walter, make no opposition." The advice was taken, and a happy married life ensued. Let ministers and officers of the law decline officiating at clandestine marriages. When they are asked to date a marriage certificate back, as we all are asked, let them peremptorily decline to say that the ceremony was in November instead of January, or decline to leave the date blank, lest others fill out the record erroneously. Let a law be passed in all our States, as it has already been in some of the States, making a license from officers of the law necessary before we can unite couples, and then make it necessary to publish beforehand in the newspapers, as it used to be published in the New England churches, so that if there be lawful objection it may be presented, not swinging the buoy on the rocks after the ship has struck and gone to pieces.

And here it might be well for me to take all the romance out of an escapade by quoting a dozen lines of Robert Pollock, the great Scotch poet, where he describes the crazed victim of one of these escapades:

"... Yet had she many days
Of sorrow in the world, but never wept.
She lived on alms, and carried in her hand
Some withered stalks she gathered in the spring.
When any asked the cause she smiled, and said
They were her sisters, and would come and watch
Her grave when she was dead. She never spoke
Of her deceiver, father, mother, home,
Or child, or heaven, or hell, or God; but still
In lonely places walked, and ever gazed
Upon the withered stalks, and talked to them;
Till, wasted to the shadow of her youth,
With woe too wide to see beyond, she died."

UNDER THE LIGHT.

But now I turn on this subject an intenser light. We have fifteen hundred lights in this church, and when by electric touch they are kindled in the evening service it is almost startling. But this whole subject of "Clandestine Marriages and Escapades" I put under a more intense light than that. The headlight of a locomotive is terrible if you stand near enough to catch the full glare of it. As it sweeps around the "Horseshoe Curve" of the Alleghanies, or along the edges of the Sierra Nevadas, how far ahead, and how deep down, and how high up it flashes, and there is instantaneous revelation of mountain peak and wild beasts hieing themselves to their caverns and cascades a thousand feet tall, or clinging in white terror to the precipices! But more intense, more far-reaching, more sudden, swifter and more tremendous is the headlight of an advancing Judgment Day, under which all the most hidden affairs of life shall come to discovery and arraignment. I quote an overwhelming passage of Scripture, in which I put the whole emphasis on the word "secret." "God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good or evil."

What a time that will be in which the cover shall be lifted from every home and from every heart. The iniquity may have been so sly that it escaped all human detection, but it will be as well known on that day as the crimes of Sodom and Gomorrah, unless for Christ's sake it has been forgiven. All the fingers of universal condemnation will be pointed at it. The archangel of wrath will stand there with uplifted thunderbolt ready to strike it. The squeamishness and prudery of earthly society, which hardly allowed some sins to be mentioned on earth, are past, and the man who was unclean and the woman was impure will, under a light brighter than a thousand noonday suns, stand with the whole story written on scalp, and forehead, and cheek, and hands, and feet; the whole resurrection body aflame and dripping with fiery disclosures, ten thousand sepulchral and celestial and infernal voices crying, "Unclean! Unclean! Unclean!"

All marital intrigues and all secret iniquities will be published, as though all the trumpets spoke them, and all the lightnings capitalized them, and all the earthquakes rumbled them. Oh, man, recreant to thy marriage vow! Oh, woman, in sinful collusion! What, then, will become of thy poor soul? The tumbling Alps, and Pyrenees, and Mount Washingtons cannot hide thee from the consequences of thy secret sins. Better repent of them now, so that they cannot be brought against thee. For the chief of sinners there is pardon, if you ask it in time. But I leave you to guess what chance there will be for those who on earth lived in clandestine relations, when on that day the very Christ who had such high appreciation of the marriage relation that He compared it to His own relation with the Church shall appear at the door of the great hall of the Last Assize, and all the multitudes of earth, and hell, and heaven shall rise up and cry out from the three galleries: "Behold, the bridegroom cometh!"

THE SOLDIERS' CHRISTMAS-TREE.

THE following is a touching episode from the Franco-German War of 1870-71, which may be profitably related at the present time. It is narrated by an eye-witness:

"It was a bitterly cold night in the railway-carriage. We soldiers had but our threadbare cloaks, in which we had been lying for weeks before Metz, and then marching for almost two months. Ours was a remarkable journey. At Rouen we had received sudden orders to conduct a transport of prisoners far into Germany. We had started on the 15th of December; this was the 24th, and we had only just passed Berlin. Many of the rails having been destroyed in France had much impeded our progress. Darkness had for some time surrounded us, the carriage being but dimly lighted by a bayonet thrust into the ceiling, and a candle end fastened into the socket.

"Deep silence reigned in the dreary carriage, only interrupted by the clinking and clashing of the muskets which lay piled up in the racks overhead. My thoughts were at home. I pitied myself, and considered I had a right to be pitied, not knowing whether others were giving me the sympathy I felt to be my due. Yes, it is hard to the heart of a German Christian to be far away from those who are dear to it on Christmas Eve. Our comrades in France were well off in comparison to us; they were receiving presents from beloved hands, they were arranging some sort of Christmas-tree, they were snugly united in a warm room, and thinking together of wife and child, father and mother of victory and peace. We were in our own country, it is true, but yet far more miserable than we had been with them. No doubt my companions in adversity had much the same thoughts, if I interpreted aright the deep sighs which now and again broke the silence.

"The engine gave a shrill whistle. That was nothing new. We knew that we were nearing a station at which no change in our position was to be expected. At last one of us let down the window with much difficulty and looked out. At first he only half put out his head, then his shoulders followed, and—'A Christmas-tree!' burst from his lips into the dead silence of the snowy night. 'A Christmas-tree!' he shouted, with a voice of thunder, into the railway carriage. In another moment we were all up, pushing toward the door, scrambling on to the steps. Yes, there on the platform of B— stood a tall, glorious Christmas-tree! The train stopped. Quick as thought the carriages were left, every one crowding round the beloved tree. Tables also stood there, heavily laden with a solid supper, which the patriotic feeling of the women of B— had provided for our refreshment.

"The cold was forgotten, blood again circulated freely in our veins, and when a clear, sweet voice began a well-known Christmas hymn, hundreds of hearty voices joined. Many who had long ago left off singing hymns now helped to swell the strain; the hymn was one they had sung in childhood, and even if now and then a wrong note was heard, the song of praise rang out through the silent night up to the starry skies, and found its way straight to the throne of grace. The half-frozen, stiffened hands of many were folded in prayer. Tears born of child-like pure emotion ran down the weather-beaten cheeks and rough beards of those hardened men. Yes, in the midst of that bitter winter's night a warm sunny breath of spring stole, as it were, into our hearts; the angel's message came to us: 'Behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people; for unto you is born this day a Saviour which is Christ the Lord.'

"Hardly had the last sounds of the hymn died away when a number of ladies, wrapped in furs, came forward to welcome us to our Christmas supper, and give us each a small Christmas present. A half-hour more, and we were again in our train. One Christmas hymn after another was sung, followed by patriotic songs. And then we related to each other how we had passed our Christmas Eves at home, till the morning came, and our thoughts were full of peace and joy. We also had celebrated the day of our Saviour's birth, and a Christmas-tree had been prepared for us by some unknown friends. Never has this 24th of December been forgotten by me, nor ever will be. The true Christmas joy was surely revealed to many of those who were among us that Christmas Eve."

FIVE APOCALYPTIC PICTURES.

By G. B. Taylor.*

The Seer's Introduction—I. The Seal, Trumpet and Vial Version—II. The Message of the Two Witnesses—III. The Man-Child and his Deliverance—IV. The Political Version—Antichrist and the Celestial Warnings—V. The Version of Babylon and Jerusalem—The Wail of the Despoiled Ecclesiastics.

THE Apocalypse of St. John in its entirety embraces a history of the Universal Church from the time of the seven Apostolic Churches addressed by Christ, quite down to the entire vanishing of the present social, moral and physical order of things, and the substitution, therefore, of the new heavens and new earth wherein shall dwell righteousness. After its unique introduction of the first chapter, the next two are taken up with the history of the Church (as exemplified by the character and standing of the seven churches successively addressed) quite up to the Rapture of the First-fruit Saints.

Breaking off with the history of the universal churches at the "Church of the Laodiceans," chapter 4 plunges into the Apocalypse proper—the wailing scenes of

THE GREAT TRIBULATION.

The seal, trumpet, and vial version of this "time of trouble such as never was" is but one view of it among others from other standpoints that occur in this precious Book. It views the great tribunal in its judgments on the Church as such, on the world as such, and on the hell-abandoned Antichrist as such. These latter-day judgments are propounded under the title of "seals," "trumpets" and "vials."

The Church receives the first four seal judgments; and the fifth is the hinge on which the judgments turn from the Church to the world. The world receives the sixth seal and the trumpets, and the branded Antichrist the vial judgments.

The Church first undergoes the persecution of the world under those seals. The disembodied spirits of the martyred saints are there represented as justly praying for vengeance on their murderers for the glory of God. God hears, and sends the sixth seal (in answer) and the trumpet judgments against those murderers. This version of the great tribulation is wound up by the vial judgments being summarily emptied on the devoted heads of Antichrist and his blasphemous hordes! The seals, trumpets and vials would seem to take place in the same chronological order as given in this version.

The next version of the Great Tribulation (as viewed from a different standpoint) is contained in chapter 11: 1-12. It has reference to God's mercy during the period of the seal and trumpet judgments, in the miraculous ministry of

THE TWO SACK-CLOTHED WITNESSES.

From the way in which they are spoken of they would seem to be human, and yet superhuman. They are, doubtless, the prophets Elijah and Enoch, returned to die for the truth.

The measuring of the "temple of God, and the altar, and them that worship therein" would seem to import that from that period the nominal professing churches—the Laodicean—would have to endure the fires of the Great Tribulation for a term of "forty and two months," or three and a half years. During this time those blessed servants of God (like Elijah in the time of Ahab) will encourage the people of God where found. They are martyred just previous to the pouring forth of the seven vials, during which time there would seem to be no more mercy for the world!

Another version of the Great Tribulation is contained in chapter 12. It commences (as usual) with the rapture of the saints under the appropriate figure of

A "MAN-CHILD"

"being caught up unto God and to His throne." This account explains approximately the functions and agency of the devil in the Great Tribulation. He will attempt to "devour" the true waiting children of God as soon as they are "born" to the true Second Advent faith and hope—the scorned, yet blessed and ineffably precious heritage of the entire redeemed Church. Not succeeding in this, Satan now persecutes the "woman," or those true Christians who were not ready for transplantation to heaven at the secret Second Coming of Christ. God in His mercy (seeing that they were true Christians ere the era of the Great Tribulation set in) miraculously transplants them to a place of safety during this culminating time of "fiery trial." Satan now makes war with "her seed," or them who shall be converted during the Great Tribulation, who will become the martyrs of that crucially time.

The next account of the same period, viz., that of the Great Tribulation, is contained in the thirteenth chapter. It has reference to the Roman Empire as

FINALLY DIVIDED INTO TEN KINGDOMS, and Antichrist, the "beast," who is an impersonation of that Empire, the "false prophet" (under the type of the "lamb-dragon" beast), as Antichrist's high priest, and the "dragon," or Satan, who gives his power unto the "beast," i.e., Antichrist. These all persecute the children of God for not worshipping the devil and Antichrist and the "image of the beast."

And now comes the first angel's message, by whomsoever delivered the event will show. It is to the effect that God must be feared—not Antichrist; that the hour of God's judgment has come; and that they must worship Him who "made heaven and earth and the sea"—and not him who will shortly "sit in the temple as God." Sad to say, the message is unheeded by the world; and under the régime of Antichrist and the false prophet the second angel's message is delivered. It is to the effect that Babylon, the Roman Empire, here in its religious aspect "has fallen" even from the profession of the Christian religion, and has become intoxicated with the seductive lies of the wily Antichrist and his blasphemous false prophet. A third angel follows, delivering a fearful warning (verses 9-13).

Now comes an encouragement to the persecuted non-worshippers of the "beast and his image." And anon the "harvest" of the translated saints is gathered in; and the "vintage" of God's great wrath on the finally impenitent wicked follows that event. This is a very instructive view of the Great Tribulation (chapter 14).

A last view or version of this fearful period is presented in chapters 17, 18. It presents

BABYLON ENTHRONED AND DESOLATED.

The history of the world and God's true Church are presented to us in Holy Writ under the types of two hostile cities. The historical cities of Babylon and Jerusalem are those cities in naked reality; but the whole wicked world and the Heavenly New Jerusalem (which will become the metropolis of the new earth) are the antitypes of these two original cities.

The seventeenth chapter commences with an epoch which is slightly prior in time to that in which the Apostle John observed the crowned ten-horned beast ascend out of the sea of political commotion, as detailed in chapter 13. This version, therefore, antedates by some short while the version given in that chapter.

Here, accordingly, the "beast" of ten horns is ridden by a woman arrayed "in purple and scarlet color, and decked with gold." The sense is that after gigantic upheavals and revolutions the limits of the ancient Roman Empire will comprise of ten distinct divisions, with the coming Antichrist as their federal head, and the Roman Catholic religion universally dominant over all other religions, powers and authorities! Popery will promise to curb the turbulent spirit of the new-born democracies, and will be accepted by the secular authorities to try its sorcery and magic and "fires" in that direction. After a while, however, on her failing to do so, these rulers will cast her off, become themselves crowned, and act in concert with Antichrist as their imperial head—their prince, their god!

Thus stripped of all her dignities and temporalities, her wicked ecclesiastics turn round, and give in their adhesion to Antichrist and to his blasphemous presumptions, and become the priests of the devil, and the persecutors of the saints of God in the Great Tribulation; so that another angel is represented (in chapter 18) as descending from Heaven, and crying, "Babylon the Great is fallen, is fallen, and is become the habitation of devils, and the hold of every foul spirit, and a cage of every unclean and hateful bird!" Such are the terms applied to the demonized mortals who make up the abetting hordes of the Antichrist of the "last days!"

But ere they do this they wail with a great lamentation for their lost offices and emoluments. And under the titles of "merchants," "kings," "shipmasters," and "sailors," these disgraced ecclesiastics bemoan the loss of their "delicacies" with great lamentations! The wares mentioned in this chapter signify the richness of the spiritual "commerce" of the Roman Catholics, as the phrase "souls of men" (verse 13) goes to prove. And "as a great millstone" that is "cast into the sea," so shall be at length all spiritual jobbery and truckage for filthy lucre!

The nineteenth chapter constitutes a common termination to all the concurrent versions of the Great Tribulation going before. It gives a detailed account of the visible descent of Christ, with all His saints, to the closing battle of Armageddon.

MR. SPURGEON TO MR. STEAD.

LAST Christmas and New Year's will be memorable festivals to the brave editor of the Pall Mall Gazette. He spent the holidays in prison in company with thieves and law-breakers. It was a strange place for a Christian man and a Sunday-school teacher to find himself at such a time. No disgrace to him, however; the disgrace was to the Christian land in which such an outrage could take place. But while the criminals whose crimes Mr. Stead had exposed were spending their holidays gaily, the man whom they, aided by an infamous judge, had succeeded in sending to prison, was not forgotten. Large numbers of letters from Christian ministers and other eminent men were sent to him. One of them was from Mr. C. H. Spurgeon, whose sermons appear in this journal every week. The readers of those sermons will, we think, be interested in knowing what the great preacher thinks of Mr. Stead and his work.

Mr. Stead has been denounced by several American journals of wide circulation which profess to deplore the injury done to public morals—not by the crimes being committed, but by their being exposed and denounced. It is amusing to notice that among the journals so concerned about public morality are the New York Evening Post and the New York Herald, which is owned by Mr. James G. Bennett. They are the bitterest assailants of Mr. Stead. In arriving at a just judgment in his case our readers will not hesitate to decide whether they will be guided by such men as Mr. Spurgeon or by the journals named. Mr. Spurgeon, under date of December 24th, from Mentone writes as follows:

"MY DEAR SIR: I have often thought of you and lifted up my heart in prayer for you, that you may be of good cheer while in durance, and may suffer as little as possible from its after-consequences. Rest assured that your motive and zeal have secured for you the high esteem of all lovers of purity. Whenever observations are made upon the mode of your operations they only imply that you are liable to error, like all your fellows; but when your self-sacrificing spirit is thought of, it is with glowing admiration. You cast yourself into the abyss to rescue and to preserve innocent children, and you are had in honor among the honorable. At the same time, as you made hideous crime somewhat inconvenient, and threatened to remove some of the screens which give immunity to vice, you are thoroughly hated among those to whom life means bestial licentiousness. You can rejoice that you have thus a double homage paid you, for contempt and hate are the obeisances which iniquity renders to its vanquisher. Be of good cheer. In your retirement you will be able to buckle on your armor with supreme care and sacred vigil for the future fray, in which we shall see you the equally stalwart and still more skilful champion. I wish joy to your heart and power to your arm.

"Mrs. Spurgeon desired me to say what a grand, brave man she judged you to be, and in this she speaks for tens of thousands of the women of England. Yours very heartily,

"C. H. SPURGEON."

REMARKABLE ANSWER TO A PRAYER IN A BROOKLYN HOME.

MANY Christian people who firmly believe in the efficacy of prayer, and who would be offended if they were told that their daily lives were inconsistent with such belief, nevertheless are showing by their actions that they have not fully realized its value. God is willing to help them in every trouble, yet when trouble comes they do not ask His help, but try to extricate themselves by their own efforts, without seeking guidance from their Heavenly Father. A remarkable case of answered prayer, which we personally know to be true in every particular, occurred in Brooklyn, N. Y., on Wednesday, November 25th, last year. We have obtained permission to publish it, with the view of encouraging God's people to rely upon Him in their difficulties and trials.

A Christian worker well known and loved in Brooklyn and New York, whose faith in God is exercised daily, and who depends upon Him, as George Müller does, for the means of carrying on his manifold works of charity, was at home on November 25th preparing for the next day, which was Thanksgiving Day. About seven o'clock in the evening a summons came for him to go to the house of a Christian friend, who was in heavy trouble. He went, and found the mother of the family in a state of distraction bordering on dementia. Her husband was away visiting the police stations, seeking aid in his distress.

"What is the matter?" the faithful Christian inquired. The story was a sad one. The eldest daughter, a beautiful and accomplished girl, was missing. There had been a little unpleasantness in the morning at the breakfast-table, and the girl, who was a sprightly, vivacious young lady, just budding into womanhood, but with the unworldliness and inexperience of a child, had shown temper unusual with her. The mother blamed herself for having used less tact, and perhaps a little more harshness than was absolutely necessary; and the girl, feeling that she ought not, at her age, to be treated as a child, went away, with some vague expression of a design not then understood. But she did not return at her usual hour, and, on sending to inquire, it was found that she had not been at her usual place all day. Then there was consternation in the home, and the mother was almost beside herself with apprehension.

"You have no idea where she is gone?" he asked. "Not the slightest," was the reply. And the heartbroken mother continued her walk around the house, weeping and wringing her hands. "It is a mystery, then," said her comforter, and we have no right at all; don't you think it would be well to tell the Lord about it?" That had not been done, though it was a Christian home.

Soon the afflicted mother and her friend were on their knees, and an earnest prayer was offered that the all-seeing God would protect the wanderer, wherever she might be, and send her to her home. It was an earnest prayer, for the man who offered it believed in God, and believed that "He is the rewarder of them who diligently seek Him." As he rose from his knees his assurance was so strong that he said to the sorrowing mother: "Now be calm; God has surely heard, and your daughter will be home to-night." The mother had no such faith, and she dwelt on the dangers to which an innocent and unwary girl must be exposed in a city where bad men abound, as they do in all large cities. But nothing more could be done, and it was useless to agitate herself, so after a time she became calmer, but was without hope.

Seeing her more tranquil, her friend prepared to leave, assuring her that she had only to trust God and all would be well. He bade her adieu, but she clung to him, wishing that she had such faith as he had shown. "I have no fear," he said. "God has heard our prayer; she will be at home, you will see, in less than an hour." There was a ring at the bell as he said this, and he heard it. "There she is," he said; "now I will go; you will be best alone."

But it was not the daughter. It was a lady who was a stranger to the family. When she was admitted she told a remarkable story. She said that that morning she had business at the office of a certain lawyer whom she named. He was engaged when she called, and she was shown into an adjoining room to wait until he was at liberty. While there she could hear the conversation in the lawyer's private room. She heard a lady's voice pleading with him to marry her or find her a home, as she had quarrelled with her family. It was plain to the listener that the relations of the two were friendly, that, though the girl was innocent of evil, she had evidently been deluded by the silly compliments of the man, and had accepted lover-like attentions from him which he did not mean. Presently the girl came out of the room weeping, and the lady, forgetting her own business, joined her, and with some difficulty made friends with her, and took her to her own home. There she had spent the whole day winning the girl's confidence, pleading with her, and warning her of her danger. It seemed that the girl made the lawyer's acquaintance some time before, during her daily rides on the horse cars, and he had flattered her and won her regard, whether with intentions of evil or otherwise. Probably he had thought of it as a "flirtation;" but the girl clearly had taken his professions in good faith, and in her disappointment at her appeal to him being fruitless was ready for any desperate course. But she listened to her new friend's Christian appeal, and finally, after hours of entreaties, she broke down and gave her the name and address of her parents, and allowed her to go and plead for her with them for forgiveness.

The agonized mother, with tears, called down blessings on the stranger's head, and gladly went with her to receive her daughter.

It was remarkable that the Christian lady should have "happened" to have business with the lawyer at that particular time, and that she should have "happened" to overhear the conversation, and that she "happened" to be one who would put aside her own business to work for the Master. It was a singular series of "coincidences." As one unbeliever said who heard the story, the lady could not have been sent there in answer to the prayer, because the prayer was not offered until night, and she had gone to the lawyer's office the previous morning. But all these happenings and coincidences and time-calculations are explained when we turn to the Word, and read: "And it shall come to pass that before they call I will answer; and while they are yet speaking I will hear" (Isa. 65:24).

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Repeal of the Civil Service Reform Law is not making the progress claimed for it by its friends. The House Committee on Civil Service Reform very promptly, at its first meeting, decided unanimously to report adversely the bill introduced by Mr. Seney, of Ohio, to repeal the law. The Committee was prompt, because it desired to have it understood at the outset that a repealing law is not to be thought of. That the law is imperfect and should be amended the Committee believes, but its members say that there was no word uttered that evinced a disposition to take any backward steps. The Committee proposes in shaping its amendments to be guided by the friends of Civil Service Reform, and at the next meeting held it will listen to suggestions from the Civil Service Commissioners.

Another Effort to Prompt Congress to the performance of its duties in the matter of the urgently needed national bankruptcy law was made on January 19th. Mr. Morris S. Wise appeared on that day before the House Judiciary Committee in behalf of the commercial bodies of the United States represented in the Bankrupt Law Convention of 1884, and presented an argument in support of the proposed legislation. These commercial bodies were at the time of the Convention eighty-nine in number, and represented twenty-nine States of the Union. Since then fifty other trade organizations have joined in the demand for the passage of the act. The mercantile organizations of the country and the whole community of traders appear to be substantially in unison in this matter. At present business is crippled by the losses sustained under fraudulent bankruptcies and the risks to the creditors involved in the distribution of a bankrupt's assets.

Another Anti-Chinese Outrage is Reported from Wyoming. Happily there were no fatalities like those which shocked the whole country at the previous outrage there, but it shows that there is no decrease in the antipathy of the miners to the Chinese. On January 20th a band of hoodlums went to the Chinese Section House at Chehalis, and ran the Chinamen into the brush. When the Section foreman attempted to protect the Chinese the hoodlums drew their revolvers on him. The gang then proceeded to another section house, one mile south of Centralia, and drove the Chinese from there also.

The Chinamen escaped bareheaded and with only sandals on their feet. It was snowing hard at the time. They were half scared to death. It is remarkable that on the same day the Governor of Wyoming said in his message: "Wyoming within the past five months has achieved an unenviable notoriety on account of the unlawful assault made upon the Chinese miners at Rock Springs. The inhuman and heartless attack on the part of the white miners showed such an utter disregard of all moral and civil power that it deservedly received the severest condemnation throughout the country."

A Significant Sign of the Prevalent Apprehension of coming danger from the compulsory coinage of the silver dollar is seen in the action of several New York financial institutions which do a large business in Western and Southern mortgages. They are inserting a clause in all new deeds as a means of providing against the danger of further demonetization; whether the loans are on mortgages or on miscellaneous security, payment in gold coin is stipulated, both of principal and interest. A large number of merchants last week joined in a letter to Senator Evarts, asking him to use his influence in the Senate to secure a suspension of the coinage.

A Distressing Mining Catastrophe Occurred at Newburg, W. Va., on January 21st, at the Orrell Coal Company's mines. The company employs about two hundred men, and forty of them were working in one of the headings when an explosion occurred. The shock was felt throughout the village so forcibly that persons in the streets were thrown down and windows shattered in all directions. Instantly a dense stream of dust and smoke was seen ascending from the shaft. A search was organized as soon as possible, but it was conducted with great difficulty, owing to the immense quantity of rubbish accumulated about the mouth of the shaft. Four dead bodies were found, and the state of the mine encourages no hope that any of the miners will be found alive. Twenty-two of the missing men are married, and the distress in the village is consequently heart-rending. It is supposed that the explosion was caused by the fire damp being ignited by a naked lamp. The mine has hitherto been free from fire damp, but owing to a change recently made in the ventilating apparatus it has found its way in.

A Serious Labor Disturbance Occurred Last week in Western Pennsylvania. Over four thousand men employed in the coke district have struck for an advance of wages. They demand a rise of ten per cent. More than one half of them are Hungarians, and they have taken the lead in the disturbances. About three thousand ovens, which are nearly one half of the whole number, have been closed. Men who still remain at work, and others who have been taken on in the place of the strikers, have been molested. On January 19th the Sheriff of Westmoreland County was so much alarmed at the threatening attitude of the strikers that he applied to the Governor for troops. On the following day there was a conflict in which much damage was done. A crowd of disaffected men, some armed with revolvers, and others with iron bars, assembled and marched to the works in different localities threatening the men, and commanding them to quit work. The ovens were stove in, and everything breakable was destroyed. The sheriffs and deputies fired into the mob, and there was a fierce hand-to-hand battle. Finally the mob retired, but their demeanor is sullen and desperate. It is feared that there will be more bloodshed unless the employers concede the terms demanded by the men. Emissaries from the Chicago Lodge of Socialists are busy among the strikers.

Queen Victoria Performed the Ceremony of opening Parliament on Thursday last. Some curiosity was felt about her reasons for breaking through her seclusion. It is now declared, in the light of the speech delivered in her name, that her object was to give the emphasis her personal presence implied to the utterances respecting Ireland. On this matter the Queen is reported by persons high in court to have very decided opinions, and to have criticised the paragraph referring to the Irish question in order to make it the expression of her own personal views. The pageant on the occasion was very brilliant, and the Queen exerted herself to render it a success. The Princess of Wales was absent; so invidious comparisons were avoided between the reception accorded by the people to the elder and the younger lady. A boy, too, who was watching the procession, was kicked by a trooper's horse conveniently near to the Queen's carriage, and Her Majesty stopped the procession to inquire after the lad's injuries. But it did not have the desired effect: the Queen's reception was cold, and the dramatic incident of the boy failed to enthuse the press or people. It may be hoped that the failure will not cause the boy to lose any reward to which he may be entitled. The tone of the press and the Parliament seems to indicate that the approach of home rule for Ireland was not retarded by the Queen's implied opposition.

The Interest in the Queen's Speech in America, as in England, centred in the allusion to Irish affairs. The following extract shows its tenor: "I have seen with deep sorrow the renewal, since I last addressed you, of the attempt to excite the people of Ireland to hostility against the legislative union between that country and Great Britain. I am resolutely opposed to any disturbance of that fundamental law, and in resisting it I am convinced that I shall be heartily supported by my Parliament and my people." Though it is stated that the Queen is responsible for the paragraph, it is according to the English traditions, a pledge of the Administration to the line of policy indicated. The policy was further outlined by another paragraph intimating that the coercion acts would be again proposed. Some declaration of policy on the question was anticipated from Mr. Gladstone, but he was extremely cautious in his remarks. He gave no encouragement to the Nationalists beyond the vague statement that he "was convinced that only a gentle and conciliatory handling of the Irish question would be effectual. The exercise of candor and justice could alone afford the smallest hope of solving the difficulty." It is, however, stated by a reliable journal that Mr. Gladstone nodded assent when Mr. Sexton stated that, as he understood him, he was in favor of the restoration to Ireland of a native Legislature, so long as the integrity of the Empire, the supremacy of the Crown, and the authority of the imperial Parliament were secured.

The Situation in the Balkans, Though outwardly peaceful, is watched with suspicion by European statesmen and journalists. The correspondent at Constantinople of the New York Herald cables to that journal his opinion that the present "peace will prove but the prelude to greater strife in southeastern Europe in the coming spring." This view is confirmed by the correspondent of the Times, who says that "so many sparks are in the air from so many quarters that it is impossible to doubt that some of them will ignite—it may be Greece or Russia, Turkey or Bulgaria, Servia, Montenegro, or Austria. Who can tell? But with all these cut-throats armed to the teeth, and half of them already out on pillage bent, the chances for peace seem to be melting away like winter snow." The English attitude is not concealed. The following paragraph from the Queen's speech clearly intimates where British sympathies are given: "The rising in Eastern Roumelia has given expression to a desire of the inhabitants for a change in the political arrangements under which they were placed by the Treaty of Berlin. My object in the negotiations which have followed has been to bring them, according to their wish, under the Prince of Bulgaria's rule, while maintaining unimpaired the essential rights of the Sultan." In this there is no difference between parties as Mr. Gladstone explicitly stated his approval of the policy pursued by the Marquis of Salisbury.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying Colored ministers in the South with the CHRISTIAN HERALD were received last week to the amount of $15, as follows: From Kirkwall, Ont., $1; Jacksonville, Fla., $2; Seaward, Me., $8; South Greece, N. Y., $3; Bayonne, N. J., $1.

Mrs. M. Baxter Has Been Conducting Evangelistic meetings at Milton, Pa., during the last week, concluding on Sunday last. The arrangement made for meetings at Erie could not be carried out on account of so many other meetings already arranged for the same week. Mrs. Baxter will take part in the Convention at Boston, beginning February 3d.

The Tuesday Meeting Which is Held Weekly at the residence of Mrs. Dr. W. C. Palmer, 316 East Fifteenth Street, New York, for the promotion of Christian Holiness, will on Tuesday, February 9th, reach its semi-centennial anniversary. For fifty years it has been held without intermission. The Lord has greatly honored these stated gatherings of His people, representing various branches of the Evangelical Church. It is proposed to celebrate the approaching anniversary by an ALL-DAY SERVICE in St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Church, Twenty-second Street and Fourth Avenue, New York. Rev. Dr. J. R. Jaques, late President of Albert University, Canada, will preach a memorial sermon at 10.30 A.M. At 2:30 and 7:30 P.M. there will be meetings for Christian testimony and prayers, in which ministers and people of various denominations will participate. It is hoped that the day will be one of peculiar interest and spiritual edification.

Mr. William Noble's Meetings at Bristol, Mass., on Monday and Tuesday of last week, were the largest meetings ever held in that place. The Daily American says that the Coliseum was densely crowded. The audience listened attentively, and were at times deeply moved by the simple yet convincing address of the temperance evangelist. Mr. Noble's approaching departure from this country was alluded to with regret by other speakers, and large numbers remained after the conclusion of the meetings to bid him farewell.

The Rev. W. Hay M. H. Aitken's Farewell service in America will be held at East Orange, N. J., to-morrow, January 29th, in the Harrison Street Rink, which has been gratuitously offered for the purpose. A special service, authorized by the bishop of the diocese, will be held. Then follow brief addresses of gratitude by Assistant Bishop H. C. Potter and other clergymen, after which Mr. Aitken will deliver his farewell address. Special cars will be run on the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad from both New York and Morristown and intermediate places, for the accommodation of Mr. Aitken's many friends who may wish to hear his last words in America. He will sail the next day (Saturday, January 30th) for England.

The "Tongue Guard" is the Name of a New society formed by the Christian young ladies of Hartford, Conn. Each member agrees to pay a penny into its treasury every time she says anything against another person. The money thus raised is used for charitable purposes. If the young ladies are, as may be supposed, desirous of having a large fund for charitable purposes, we presume they may add to it voluntarily, and not by fines only. If uncharitable speaking becomes less common in Hartford than in other places charity doubtless will thrive, though there should be few fines.

The Annual Day of Prayer for Colleges is this year fixed for this date (January 28th). As many requests for information have been sent to the College Secretary of the Y. M. C. A., Mr. Wishard has issued a statistical statement for publication, which reached us too late for insertion last week. The following facts gleaned from its pages will be of interest. There are now 45,000 young men in the 300 colleges of the United States, and 155,000 in the entire number of institutions of learning which, including law schools, schools of science, medical colleges, etc., are stated at 1215. Of these institutions 210 have Y. M. C. A.'s connected with them. Nearly 10,000 have professed conversion during the past eight years; 2370 students are reported as candidates for the ministry, 116 of whom have been converted since entering college, 35 of whom were converted last year; 187 are reported as intending to be foreign missionaries, several of them medical missionaries; 11 of these have been converted since entering college. It is an encouraging fact that the day of prayer last year was followed by a period of revival in all the colleges, and testimonies to the value and permanence of the movement came from all quarters.

The Drying Up of the Euphrates, which is predicted (Rev. 16:12), is, it appears, actually taking place. Thus the prophecy is being literally fulfilled as its metaphorical fulfilment draws near. The Times of India says: "The once mighty Euphrates seems likely to disappear altogether. For some years past the river-banks below Babylon have been giving way, so that the stream spread out into a marsh, until steamers could not pass, and only a narrow channel remained for native boats. Now this passage is becoming obliterated, and unless matters improve the towns on the banks will be ruined, and the famous river itself will be swallowed up by the desert."

A Thousand Dollars for a Soul was the Rate quoted at the conference of Methodist ministers in Chicago on January 18th. It was stated by one clergyman that, dividing the money expended last year by the Rock River Conference by the number of members added to the church, it was found that each had cost $431. These figures caused a debate, in the course of which another clergyman said that six Chicago churches had spent in the same time $100,000, and only one hundred members had been gathered in, making the cost of each $1000. The record is not pleasant reading. The result seems small, and in these matters money estimates seem to be much out of place. Nevertheless, accepting the quotation and ignoring the other good effected through the churches, the money was well spent. What is one soul worth? (Matt. 16:26).

A Political Outcast is in Trouble at St. Louis, Mo. The Globe-Democrat states that recently, when the new Democratic postmaster succeeded his Republican predecessor, he received an application for promotion from one of the personal appointees. When asked for the reason why the promotion should be made, he said that though he had represented himself to the late postmaster and his immediate predecessors as a Republican, he was in reality a Democrat, had always voted with that party, and otherwise had supported the ticket. "But you represented to Mr. Wells you were a Republican," said the postmaster. "Oh, yes. I couldn't have kept my place otherwise." "And you want a promotion. Well, I guess you can go into the cashier's office and get your pay. I would rather not have you employed under me." After his confession the man will not be welcomed by the Republicans, and it seems that the Democrats do not want him, so that he is politically homeless. It may be hoped that he will learn from his loss of office the folly of duplicity. He may learn from the Bible that it is wicked as well as foolish. There is, however, reason to fear that many will persist in it to the last (Luke 13:25-27).

A Life of Forty Years in a Cave Ended at Port Jervis, N. Y., on Monday, January 18th. Some hunters in the woods of Pike County mountains were surprised ten years ago at finding in a cave about nine feet square a wretched looking man, who had evidently been living in that seclusion for many years. He looked wild and fierce. His hair, long and shaggy, seemed as if it was never combed, and his matted beard hung over his chest. His clothes were held together with withes, and patched here and there with pieces of rabbit-skin. The man was surly, and refused to answer any questions about himself or his object in living so unnatural a life,

But his features were somewhat remarkable, and, in spite of the dirt with which they were encrusted, they were sufficiently distinct to enable his visitors to describe him, and the description was published in the local papers and copied into those of other States. Soon afterward a well-dressed lady arrived and said she believed that the man was her brother, who had disappeared thirty years before. She was conducted to his cave, and recognized him instantly. The hermit admitted that he was her brother, and that he had been living in the cave for thirty years, seeing no one, and subsisting on rabbits and birds, which he snared, and the vegetables he raised on a little clearing in the forest. His sister offered him a comfortable home with her, but he would not accept it, and continued his secluded life. Soon after last New Year's he suddenly appeared in Lehman Township, and accepted the invitation of a farmer to stay with him a few days. He was evidently infirm and suffering. He grew worse, and died on January 18th. He was eighty-three years old, and had spent nearly half his life in the forest cave. He gave no clue to his motive for his strange life, but insisted that he was doing the will of God, and he had read the Bible much during all those years of solitude. Evidently he had read to little purpose, as others do who live in the world, but are doing nothing for God. The unprofitable servant is not held guiltless in the judgment (Matt. 25:30).

An Engineer on a Burning Bridge Saved the lives of his passengers by his presence of mind and courage on January 4th. A despatch from Petersburg, Va., says that the fast mail train from the South on the Atlantic Coast Line had a narrow escape just before reaching there on that day. About a mile north of Rocky Mount Station is a bridge which spans a stream thirty feet beneath. The train had just reached the bridge when the engineer, in the dim morning light, noticed that a portion of the structure was on fire. He was too near to stop his train, but had recourse at once to a bold and dangerous alternative. He opened wide the valve, put on all steam, and, bravely standing to his post, dashed over the burning bridge at a speed of sixty miles an hour. The plan worked successfully, and the train had just cleared the bridge when a section of it fell in. There are some crises in life which it is wise to face in the same way. He who voluntarily goes into temptation has no claim on God's protection, but when in the course of duty danger is seen in the way, a swift and direct passage through it is the only safe course. It is those who loiter and trifle with it who are lost (Prov. 4:25-27).

A Reply to a Matrimonial Advertisement has entailed annoyance as well as disappointment on a young lady residing at Rollin, Mich. Some months ago she noticed an advertisement in a local paper inviting correspondence with any young lady who was willing to marry. She replied, inclosing her photograph. The advertiser answered her letter, describing himself as a handsome man, with black eyes, hair and moustache, and representing himself as in prosperous circumstances. Several letters were interchanged, and finally the young lady, unknown to her parents, promised to marry her correspondent. He professed himself unable to leave home, and urged her to come to him at Hartsville, N. Y. The infatuated girl consented, and on January 5th left her comfortable home for the purpose. When she arrived she found her correspondent an ugly man, with red hair and a cast in his eyes, and in needy circumstances. She promptly and decisively refused to marry a man who had so grossly deceived her, and returned to her home much wiser than when she left it. It may be hoped that she is wise enough to see that her error lay in promising to marry a man whom she had not only not seen, but of whose character she knew nothing. The man's fatal defect was in his character, not in his ugliness. If she becomes truly wise she will yet give her heart to One whom she has never seen, (1 Peter 1:8).

A TRAITOR SUSPECTED AND CONVICTED.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"The carnal mind is enmity against God."—ROMANS 8:7.

The World's Catechism—Immortality Ignored—The Dominance of the Animal—Its Intrinsic Enmity a Fact—I. Discovered and Exposed—Inimical as a Servant—As a Subject—As an Equal—A Love-Letter from God—II. Deplored—III. Removed—Love Implanted.

MEN naturally mind the things of the flesh. This is as sad as if a seraph should rake upon a dunghill. It is not wonderful that a brute beast cares for the flesh, for it is only flesh; but it is lamentable in the highest degree that man, in whom there is a principle infinitely superior to mere materialism, should nevertheless so generally give himself up to minding the things of the body—the things of time and earth.

THE WORLD'S CATECHISM

is, "What shall we eat? What shall we drink? Wherewithal shall we be clothed?" Men begin with these questions as soon as they leave their father's roof, and they often die with them upon their lips. It is said of the peasants around Nice that they seem to have no thought of anything but how they can make a living, and save a little money; and I am afraid they are by no means a singular people; in some form or other the world is in all men's hearts and thoughts. The dust of earth has blinded eyes that were meant for heaven. Yet there is in us an immortal spirit. A future state is plain upon the face of things. Every thoughtful man can see that there is a wide difference between the brute that grovelleth and man that aspireth.

Yet men by nature do not give dominion to their nobler part, but allow the brute in them to overrule the mind in them. They are earthly-minded; and then, because they are earthly-minded, spiritual things are despised by them, and the great God, who is the Spirit of all spirits, is most of all neglected, and treated as if He were of small account. The minding of the flesh sours the soul against God, so that he who minds the flesh is soon filled with enmity against God. Our apostle declares this fact, and declares it very positively. He does not say that the carnal mind is at enmity to God, but he gives us the solid noun; he says: "The carnal mind is enmity against God." It is enmity in essence, altogether and always enmity against God. It is a solid block of aversion to God and animosity against Him.

THE NEUTRALS.

Of some men this need not be stated, for they declare it themselves. There are men (God be merciful to them, and change them!) who deliberately say that they do not believe in God, and who use all kinds of opprobrious epithets toward our Lord and the divine truth which He has been pleased to reveal. Many others would not care to confess their enmity so distinctly, and yet their lives proclaim it. Their outward conduct shows that they are not only enemies to God and to His Christ, but that their heart is a mass of enmity to Him; their speech betrays the fact that they are not reconciled to God. I am not at this time intending to speak to these persons, of whom I will only say, The Lord have mercy upon any of us if that be our unhappy case! But I am going to deal at this time with another class of persons, who would say, each one for himself, "I am not a Christian, but I hope to be so one of these days. I do not think that I am converted. I could not claim to be a believer in Christ savingly, or a lover of God so as to take my place among His people; but yet I do not think that I am an enemy to God."

The accusation of our text is very distasteful to such persons; they think it too harsh a charge to bring against them. Yet, dear hearer, you live not for the world to come, nor for spiritual things, nor for God; and, therefore, according to the teaching of the text, your mind, being carnal or fleshly, is enmity against God. If you are not born again from above, I am compelled to say, even of the best of you, that your fleshly mind is enmity against God. At this time my business shall be, first, to discover that enmity; secondly, to deplore it; and then, thirdly, may God the Holy Spirit be pleased to deliver you from it, and deliver you from it even while we are talking about it!

I. First, then, I have to discover THIS ENMITY which is in your heart. The man who does not love God, nor serve Him, nor even profess to do so, has in his heart a settled enmity against God. Let me show it to you. Do not shut your eyes to clear evidence.

First, the carnally-minded man is enmity against God as a servant. Take this description of yourselves, and see if it does not lead to your conviction. You are all servants to God, for He has made you, and not you yourselves, and He that made you ought to have the use of you. You are under obligations to your Creator, your Preserver, your Redeemer; and these obligations ought to be recognized; but you do not recognize them; on the contrary, you act in a way which leads me to charge you with enmity against God, your liege Lord and King. Judge ye if it be not so. Here is a servant of yours, and he will not serve you. Set that down to laziness if you please, and the case will be bad enough. But suppose it should turn out that he actually does heavier work for another than he would have been expected to do for you. Suppose that he does harder and more degrading labor than you could have required of him; and that he does it willingly, does it with all his might, and yet you. I think you would say: "This man must be filled with enmity to me. He works for another, and will not work for me; he does far harder work for another than ever I have proposed that he should do for me." Forget not that the slavery of sin is much harder and much more degrading than the service of God. The service of the world is much sterner, much more exacting, much more wearisome, than the service of the Lord Jesus Christ. If a man prefers to bear the weary burden of the world, the flesh, and the devil, and will not take upon his shoulders the lighter load of Christ, what can be the reason of it but that he is at enmity with God?

HE WILL NOT SERVE

And suppose, moreover, that your servant, who is working for somebody else, should get very poor wages, while you are willing to pay to him the largest wages that can be proposed; and yet he will take the harder work and the less wage, and will not come to you and take the easier work at higher wages; how could you account for this, except upon the supposition that the man hated you? Sirs, the case is thoroughly parallel with yours. The service of God is a remunerative service; He gives wages in the work, and an abundant reward, according to His grace, when the work is done. If men refuse such service what can their motive be? The wages of sin is death—eternal death; infinite misery follows upon the course of this world. If men choose such service, what can be their motive, what but downright hatred of God as a Master, and a resolve to have the devil himself for lord, and hell for a wage, sooner than serve the living God?

DISLOYALTY.

Let me consider you under another figure. This time it shall be that of a subject toward a king. Suppose that we are living in times in which there is a king, a rightful monarch upon the throne, but there is also a pretender who has set up a claim for the crown, and there is a war going on between the true monarch and the pretender. Suppose that a certain man lives in your street, and you meet with him in business, in trade, and in common conversation from day to day, and yet you never hear him mention the name of the king; would not his silence be suspicious? If anybody else mentions the king's name he edges off from it. He never utters a word that would enable you to feel that he is a loyal subject. He does not openly propose three cheers for the pretender in a public meeting, nor does he hang out the pretender's flag; but, on the other hand, you noticed that the last time they were crying "Bravo" for the king he was as quiet as if he had been dumb; and you have also seen that whenever conversation has gone that way he has been as mute as a fish. I feel morally certain that in his heart this close-mouthed being must be an enemy to the king. Are you not very much of my mind?

DISCREET SILENCE.

Do you want me to explain the parable? Does it not fit your case, my friend? All these years you have been hearing about God and His Christ, but you have not had a good word to say for either of them. When you are in company you manifest a discreet silence. If there were a debate upon vital godliness you would take no side. You have nothing to say for Jesus and His precious blood. You are neutral and silent; and why? You are such "a good, easy man," that you are not willing to fight for truth and righteousness. I suspect you greatly. I am solemnly afraid that you are an enemy.

Now, suppose that the king has achieved a great success. News has come that in a great battle the pretender has sustained a heavy defeat. The flags are hanging out along the streets, and there is an illumination at night. There is no flag at your house. At night there are no candles in your window. I am afraid that, if there were any spies about, they would report him for an enemy; and I do not think they could be much blamed if they did so. Dear hearers, some of you feel no interest in the triumphs of Messiah's kingdom, and are under no concern about His Gospel. So many persons were converted under a revival, but it is nothing to you. Whole streets in this city are Godless and Christless, but what of that? You show no opposition to King Jesus; but still you take no delight in the growth of His dominion or the increase of His glory. I might work out this subject further, but I only need to light the candle of your conscience, and you will not have to look far to find a traitor.

INACTIVITY.

Further than that, they have been raising regiments in the city to help the king. There have been enthusiastic meetings of young men who have enlisted in his cause. They have shouldered their rifles, and have been ready to shed their blood on the behalf of their lawful sovereign. There is news of an invasion: the enemy's ships are near the shore; the citizens have come together in crowds. This man was not at the meeting. He did not propose to be a soldier; he did not contribute a farthing to the expenses of the campaign; he did nothing whatever for his king. Putting all this with the rest, it seems to me that he must be an enemy. In such a world as this, where sin is rife, if a man does not contend against evil he is on the side of it. If a man does not serve Christ, and endeavor to extend His kingdom, however humble may be his power, surely it must be that his carnal mind is enmity against God.

And suppose, further, that this man should find that the king had issued a certain proclamation and promulgated a code of laws, and that this man should say, "Read them? No, not I! I would not read such dry book stuff as that!" The proclamation of the king is posted up publicly, and the man turns his back upon it. A play-bill is pasted on the wall; he reads that, and is very interested in it. Now, I should say that he must be an enemy, for he will not even read what is the will of his king, and what is the law of his country. There must be in his heart some enmity against the law-giver who promulgated that law. My hearer, your non-searching of the Scriptures, your weariness under Gospel-preaching, your want of care to understand the mind of God, is prima facie evidence that there is some enmity in your heart against the Most High.

Suppose, once more, that you had offended this king, and you had been tried for treason against him, and had been found guilty, and he were to say to you, "Freely confess your treason, and there is the pardon drawn out for you by which your life shall be spared, and you yourself shall be taken into favor;" if you were to reply, "I will not have it"—aye, and if you were not even to say as much as that, but only neglected to accept it, and just sat carelessly in prison until the day of execution, I should say that you must have a most awful enmity in your heart against your sovereign! He that will not even accept pardon must be rancorous indeed. My hearer, your not accepting the free pardon of Christ, your not receiving the benefit of the act of amnesty and oblivion which the great God has passed, prove that your traitorous heart is dyed to the very core with the blackest enmity against the Majesty of heaven. Is it not so? Do you not begin to suspect yourself of not being quite all you fondly hoped you were?

UNFRIENDLINESS.

So I will use yet another similitude, and but one, that I may not weary you. This time it shall merely relate to the common conduct of one person to another. I might profess of a certain person that I had no enmity against him; but suppose that whenever I met him in the street I would not see him, and if he was on my side of the street I somehow or other had a call over the other side of the way; and suppose that when I came into a room to meet friends I saw him there, and always backed out, and went somewhere else; I should think that people would, before long, suspect that I had great enmity toward that person. There are people who act in that manner toward God. They find hearing sermons very dull work. Talking with Christian people about divine things they cannot endure. Reading a religious book is slavery. They find themselves very soon reduced to a state of slumber by treatises upon true religion. They have no care about such things. They want to get out of God's way.

Again, suppose that a person has written you a letter, and you have taken no notice of it. When did it come? It came last Monday morning. Have you read it? "Oh, no!" you say; "I do not bother to read his letters." When you did read one of his letters, what was it about? "Well, it was about wishing to be at peace with me, and desiring to do me good. He spoke of my being in great danger, and said that he would help me; and of my being poor, and offered to make me rich." Did he talk so, and have you never read any more of his letters? What can ail you? From this I feel sure that you hate the writer very heartily. Have I not described your conduct toward your Bible? That blessed Book is a love-letter from God, the great Father, and you do not read it nor care about it; and therefore I am sure that there must be in your heart enmity against Him.

NO COMMUNICATION.

Is prayer neglected by you? Is it a burden? Have you no pleasure in it? Then how can you say that you are a friend of God? Do you utterly neglect all communion with God? Do you never speak with Him? How can you think that you love Him? If I had a son who lived in my house, and fed at my table, and was clothed by my kindness, and that boy were to say to people outside, "I never speak to my father; he speaks to me, but I never listen to him; I live in his house, but I treat him as if he were dead;" would not everybody rightly conclude that there was a deadly animosity in the heart of such a son toward his father? I cannot help thinking that if you live without speaking to God, or hearing Him speak to you, you have a carnal mind which is enmity against God. There I leave the matter, hoping that conscience will awake and concern itself about this business.

DISHONORABLE.

II. But now, secondly, and very briefly, let us deplore this enmity against God. For, first, what an injustice it is! I cannot bear for anybody to speak ill and think ill of one who is good, and kind, and generous. I would interpose, if possible, to rectify that mistaken judgment. But for you not to think well of God, for you not to love the God of love, for you not to be at peace with the sweet Lord Jesus, for you not to delight in Christ, is a gross injustice to Him. Oh, do not continue in it! If you have any sense of rightness, may God make you to feel shame that you should treat Him ill!

In addition to all this, I would say, What an injury is this to yourself! It is a very great injury to any man not to be perfectly at peace with God. You are losing happiness; you are losing holiness, which is still more; you are losing the full development of your being; you are missing the destiny for which a God-created soul is intended. You are finding your way into darkness which will gather blackness upon blackness for ever. Oh, sirs, I cannot bear that this should be the case—that you should be at enmity with God! I would sooner be blind, and deaf, and dumb, and lose all feeling, than lose the sense of the beauty and perfection of God. The capacity to enjoy God, and to understand His superlative excellence, is the grandest faculty that a being can possess, and he that has it not is dead while he liveth. He who does not love the ever-blessed Lord is a very Nabal, whose heart is like a stone within him. He is a fool writ large who knows not God. May the Lord manifest His grace to those of you who are in such a condition, and bring you to deplore it and escape from it!

THE ENMITY REMOVED.

III. This brings me to a close. The third point was to be: Let us seek deliverance from this condition of enmity against God. How is it to be done? Truly, I do not believe it ever will be done in any man except by the Holy Ghost. This incapacity to see the beauty and loveliness of God is such an inveterate disease that none can remove it but the Holy Ghost. Ye must be washed, I know. Ye must be healed, I know. Ye must be clothed, I know. But I know another thing quite as clearly, "Ye must be born again." Do you say, "How can a man be born when he is old?" There is but one way; He that first made you must make you over again. The change in you must be radical and thorough, and you cannot work it of yourself. It is the work of the Holy Spirit to lead you to accept of Jesus, and so to be delivered from your enmity.

LOVE PLANTED.

How can the enmity itself go? I have shown you that this must be removed by the heart being changed by the Holy Spirit; but the means of it will be this—your enmity will depart by a sense of God's love to you. I think that it is Aristotle who says that it is impossible for a person to believe that another loves him without feeling some kind of love in return. I concede that it is almost impossible; but I am not sure that it is quite so. However, this I know: if you could but believe at this moment that God loves you; if, trusting in Christ, you could but know the infinite affection that there is in the heart of the great Father toward you, His child, you would love God in return—you could not help it. May you receive a sense of that love at once, and you will then find that your enmity is gone, that you are spiritually-minded, and that you love God!

For that—to conclude with—is the main thing. While the man continues to mind the flesh he cannot love God. While his first business is his body, and the things of time and sense, he is and must be at enmity with God. But when the Lord Jesus Christ wins his heart; when the Spirit of God renews his mind; when he comes to love God—then he cares for spiritual things, then his treasure is in heaven, and his heart is there also. Then his hopes are in the advent of the Lord Jesus Christ when He shall come a second time, and then his life tends toward glory, and honor, and immortality. Thus the man is raised from being a worm of the earth to kinship with angels. He drops the serpentine slough, and puts on the seraphic wing. He gets away from the mole-life, burrowing under ground in the dark, and gains the eagle's eye and the eagle's pinion. He quits the gloom and night of earth, and mounts aloft with his eye upon the sun of glory, delighting in the holy and the heavenly. God bring you to that state by faith in Jesus Christ! Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

"SERMONS IN SONGS,"

by Charles S. Robinson, D.D. As a hymnologist Dr. Robinson has earned a reputation almost equal to his fame as a preacher. Probably in extent it is greater, for it is only in New York City that the fulness, and freshness, and variety of his preaching are fully known. The title of this volume is suggested by the fact that each text of the twenty-seven sermons it contains is taken from one of the songs, psalms or hymns of the Bible. Here Dr. Robinson is at home; his love of strong practical teaching and his love of spiritual poetry are combined. The King's Daughter, The Prince's Bride, and The Bride's Presents are the titles of three sermons on the forty-fifth Psalm. The Gloria in Excelsis, The Nunc Domittes of Simeon, The Benedictus of Zacharias, The Eucharist Hymn, and The Magnificat of Mary, each form the subject of a sermon full of beauty and high spiritual teaching. The sermons on The Folded Hands, The Realized Beatitude, Under His Shadow, and Guidance by the Eye belong to another class of exposition, and are singularly clear and invigorating. Even experienced readers will be surprised, as they read these sermons, to find how inexhaustible is the wealth of poetry alone, contained in the precious book which is not only the Word of Life, but a priceless literary treasure. Pp. 322; price, $1.25. Published by Funk & Wagnalls.

"THE GREEK ISLANDS

and Turkey After the War," by Henry M. Field, D.D., is another of those volumes of travels with which Dr. Field has delighted American readers. It is remarkable how wide is the difference between two descriptions of the same scenes, one of which is written by a man of piety, and the other by a mere worldly scholar. As the worldly man treads the classic soil his soul is moved by the consciousness of the fact that there on the very place where he stands a mighty king, or general, or statesman, or philosopher once stood and spoke and acted. Dr. Field, with all his profound scholarship, is less moved by such things than by the thought that he is treading in the steps of a poor, despised missionary, who gave his whole life to the work of preaching to the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ. The Christian cannot be hid. He reveals himself at every turn. For him the objects that claim his reverence and interest are not the objects that move other men, and we see the fact very conspicuously in this volume. The fact that in one place Paul confronted Elymas, the Sorcerer, that in another Paul went into the synagogue on the Sabbath day, and that there in Cilicia he was gazing on the very landscape which the great apostle must have looked upon morning and evening while he dwelt in Tarsus, was more to the follower of Jesus than all the associations the place had with Alexander the Great. Then, too, there is the Island of Patmos, a name forever sacred, not from its association with kings and conquerors, but with a poor prisoner who, in his exile, was "in the spirit on the Lord's day," and there saw "things which must be hereafter." Besides these hallowed spots, Dr. Field has much to tell us of Turkey, the country about which are centring the expectations of every student of prophecy, who looks at Constantinople as the farmer looks at his barometer for the indications of the storm, which will surely arise at no distant date. Dr. Field's book is thus both interesting and instructive to the students of the Bible, and as it is, to a large extent, a diary of personal experience, it has the charm of personal letters. Pp. 228; price, $1.50. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons.

Searching the Vaults under the British Houses of Parliament for Dynamite.

A Calendar of Scripture Texts prepared for the use of prisoners has been issued by Mrs. J. K. Barney, national Superintendent of the prison, jail, police, and almshouse work of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Jail superintendents tell us that there is no article in a cell so frequently consulted as a calendar, on which the unhappy occupant marks off "another day gone." Mrs. Barney has noted this fact, and by her arrangement of texts hopes to teach a needed lesson to the prisoners. Christians who visit the jails to work among the prisoners may obtain these calendars at ten cents each by addressing Mrs. Barney, 521 Broad Street, Providence, R. I.

A REVIVAL IN INDIA.

A CHRISTIAN gentleman in India has sent home the following letter for publication, hoping that its welcome news will prove a stimulus to Christians in Gospel lands:

"We have been much in prayer for the past six months that a manifestation of power from on high might come upon the natives here, and it really seems as if the Lord was about to work mightily. We have lately started classes for young men, English and Tamil. We have an average of from ten to fifteen in each class every Sunday morning. It is deeply interesting and encouraging to see how eager they seem for the Word, quite drinking it in, each member bringing a number of texts most carefully learnt. One who had been given a Tamil Bible thanked me very much, and said, since reading it, the word had begun to work in his heart. He is a writer on a coffee plantation, and now daily reads a few verses to the coolies as they assemble for roll-call.

"On Sunday afternoons, from 12 to 2, quite a number of us go out to preach in a large market held for the natives. Tamil lyrics are sung and short addresses given. We also exhibit some colored pictures on Scripture subjects, on which we speak to the crowds that collect around us. Last Sunday we had an especially solemn time; the natives listened in rapt attention, as we spoke upon the follies of idolatry, and the happiness and joy of having Christ as their Saviour. One who spoke was an old gray-haired, high-caste man, converted at the age of thirty-three. He had been through it all, and so was able to give a most powerful testimony. Conviction seemed written on many faces, and eternity only will reveal the results. On Sunday evenings we have a sort of praise and experience meeting. I close with an earnest request for prayer that God would abundantly bless His work in this far-off land."

SEARCHING THE VAULTS.

A SINGULAR procession, quaint and historical in significance, is witnessed annually in the subterranean recesses of the foundations of the British Houses of Parliament. The illustration shows the manner of the investigation as it took place on Tuesday, January 12th. It is a search for explosives as a precaution before the assembling of the Queen and her family and the Lords and Commons at the opening of Parliament. Four of the Queen's Marshals led the way, followed by twelve of the Queen's Body Guard from the Tower, then the Lord Great Chamberlain, or his deputy, and the officer known as Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, with his staff, comprised of officers of the House of Lords. Having passed through the body of the House of Lords, they then went through the central hall to the House of Commons, and descended by a small staircase immediately behind the Speaker's chair. At this particular point the real search begins; every nook, corner and cranny is carefully examined by the light of the lanterns which the searchers carry. As the area to be examined is nearly eight acres in extent the search occupies over an hour.

The origin of the custom was the discovery of the Gunpowder Plot in 1605, when Guy Fawkes and about eighty other conspirators arranged to blow up by gunpowder King James I. and his Parliament. The King had made himself obnoxious to certain nobles, who wished for his death. Gradually the project of assassinating him took shape. As he had children to succeed him the plot was enlarged to include them, and finally to take in the statesmen who were his advisers. As they would all be assembled in one place when the Parliament met to hear the King's speech, it was resolved to blow the whole building up with gunpowder. Thirty-six barrels were secretly conveyed into one of the vaults and covered over with billets of wood. The conspiracy was discovered November 5th, 1605, and Guy Fawkes was arrested on the spot, with the matches in his pocket ready to fire the train communicating with the barrels.

Every time that a Parliament has met since then a search has been made. It has been a matter of form and ceremony rather than of actual search until recently; but since O'Donovan Rossa and his friends have begun to use dynamite there is more reason for making the examination careful and thorough.

ALDEN'S FALSE STEP.

"WHAT'S the matter, Alden? You look as blue as if you were going to be hung to-morrow." The inquiry was addressed by a sprightly clerk in a large commercial house in New York to a young man who had recently secured a position in the same house, and had come, fresh from college, to the city from his home in Massachusetts. Alden's was a godly home, and his pious father and mother had sent him out with many prayers among the temptations of a city about the dangers of which they knew little. He was good-humored, intelligent, and fond of pleasure; but he meant to "keep straight," and give no anxiety to his people at home, whom he loved dearly. For a time he kept away from theatres and all questionable resorts, but gradually, finding himself ridiculed, he had ventured into some of the better-class of places, where he met young men of his own class, and where the evenings passed merrily in gay pleasure. After a time he found that his income, supplemented, as it was, by regular remittances from home, was insufficient to cover his increased expenses, and he began to get into debt. He was always promising himself to economize, but as the people he owed did not press him for payment the economy was not inaugurated. But that morning he had received an urgent request from one of his creditors, and then for the first time he had taken courage to make a list of his debts. The total appalled him, and as he went down to business that morning he was casting about for some plan of extricating himself. He had just decided upon making a full confession to his father, and was nerving himself for the miserable task, when his gay companion, Hatton, put the question to him.

"The fact is, Hatton," he said, "I am in a bad hole, and I don't see how I can get out."

"What is it, old fellow? Can I help you?"

"It is a money trouble; I find I owe a great deal more than I know how to pay."

"That is the case with most of us, my boy," said Hatton. "You have plenty of partners in that kind of misery. Anything pressing?"

"Yes. I have a tailor's bill for a hundred, and one or two others that will be pressing soon."

"What are you going to do about it?"

"I don't know. I was just making up my mind to write home, but I hate to do that. I should have to explain, and it would worry my father."

"I would not do that, Alden. It might involve your having to make awkward promises, and perhaps you would have to go home and be buried alive in that wretched village. Come up to my place to-night, and let us see if something better cannot be done. Courcy is going to sup with me; he and I are in the same boat as you in money matters, and we can consult together."

Alden promised to go, and that night he and his two friends gathered around a table on which, after supper, liquors and cigars were placed as aids to the conference.

"Now," said Hatton, "I have been considering this money difficulty, and I think I know of a way in which we can help each other. I have had some dealings before this with an agent who lays himself out to help young men in difficulties. I have seen him to-day, and he will do nothing more for me because I already owe him a little matter; but he will find money if he can get two names to a bill. I suppose two hundred would make you easy, Alden? You, Courcy, want about the same amount, and I need that and a great deal more, if I could get it. Now, my man will advance the six hundred on a three months' bill, half to be renewed for another three months, if we wish it, if we all put our names to it. I have promised to send him the bill to-night if we agree, and he will have the money ready by twelve o'clock to-morrow."

"What is the amount of the bill to be?" Alden asked.

"Why, you see these men are sharks. They are all alike. They know we cannot get the money on fair terms, or we should not go to them. They lose heavily sometimes, so they charge high, and then what they get from those who do pay makes up for what they lose by those who don't. They average their business, and I suppose, when all is balanced, they don't get much above the legal rate. This bill is to be for $750."

"Why, that's a hundred per cent," said Alden. "That is an outrage. I do not feel like paying that."

"Your share will only be fifty dollars. Would you not rather pay fifty than write home?"

"Yes, I would; but it seems a fearful cost." Alden's real objection to the scheme, however, he did not like to state. He saw that he was making himself liable for the whole amount of the bill, and he knew that both of his companions were men noted for their lack of principle in money matters.

"I agree," said Courcy. "Fifty dollars is well paid for two hundred down; I have paid that before."

"I never have, and never mean to pay it," said Alden. "I must decline to join in the bill, Hatton."

"Oh, you will join, I know, Alden; you are too good a fellow to refuse. It will disappoint Courcy and me. Come; just consider what a relief it will be to us as well as to you." He filled Alden's glass as he spoke, and the young man drank it off.

Half an hour later the bill was produced. Hatton and Courcy signed, and it was then offered to Alden. He made one more struggle, but at last, with evident reluctance, he wrote his name. Hatton quickly enclosed it in an envelope, and rang the bell for the maid to send it to the mail. Alden, who had turned away with a vexed, perplexed face, said: "I wish you would not send it now, Hatton; one of us can mail it as we go home. I know I am doing a foolish thing. I wish you would give me another half hour."

"No, no, it is all right; it's only the first plunge that frightens you. Here, Janet, send this to the mail right away."

"And kiss it for luck, Janet," added Courcy, with a leer, "unless you would rather kiss me instead."

Alden, disgusted with the young man's indelicacy, turned his back upon him, and sighed heavily as he thought how low he had sunk to be mixed up with such a man in any enterprise. He continued moody and dispirited until the further potations imparted a forced and unnatural gaiety to his spirit.

Three months later Hatton and Courcy were both in Canada, their accounts showing heavy defalcations, and Alden was being pressed for payment of the bill. He was sitting in his boarding-house, miserable and depressed, not knowing what to do, while a Satanic temptation was being fought within him. Should he join those defaulters in Canada, or commit suicide? What could he do? Happily the teachings of his pious father and mother were not quite obliterated, and in his emergency he prayed. Then he received light, and sitting down he wrote a full account of his trouble to his father. His trust was not misplaced. The old man, grieved though he was, accepted his son's promise of amendment and paid his obligation.

Many years afterward Alden told his own son his story as a warning to him against evil companions who say, "Cast in thy lot among us; let us all have one purse" (Prov. 1:14).

A FATAL FRAUD.

AN ORIGINAL SERIAL STORY. BY LEW VANDERPOOLE.

At Bay.

THERE was no way of escape from the conclusion that was forced upon the miserable wife. Her husband was undoubtedly guilty of the shocking crime which had been committed. The detective's presentation of the facts left Alice no ground for any other conviction. What she knew of her husband was locked in her own breast. Her conversation with her father showed that her knowledge of him was not favorable, but hitherto she had kept his secrets, whatever they were.

The man who called himself Smith remained silent, watching Alice closely. He knew that it was only natural that the wife should have to nerve herself for decisive action, and he delicately forbore to intrude himself upon her thoughts. She kept her face buried in her hands, so that the detective was unable to read the expression that was shaping itself there in reflection of the mental process going forward. But he waited patiently for her decision, though evidently with anxiety.

Each was busily thinking. What was to be done in a case so painful and so difficult? That Alice was suffering under conflicting emotions was evident. It was not that love for her husband kept her undecided, but some duty was certainly due him or of what value were the pledges at the altar? But on the other side there was filial duty calling for action, and between them Alice sat uncertain in an agony of doubt.

Smith remained silent for several minutes. He, too, seemed to be suffering.

"Does your theory of the murder agree with mine?" he asked, after a while, more to break the silence, apparently, than for any other reason.

"I have no theory," she answered. "I merely have an opinion. Still, circumstantial evidence, however strong, cannot be relied upon altogether. While there is much to cause me to suspect that Stephen Vane killed my father, there was no motive that I know of for his doing so. He is capable of committing the crime, but there was only a single reason—a mere passing reason—for his having done so."

"A passing reason?"

"Yes."

"Will you please explain?"

"Certainly."

And then she told him of the letter which Stephen had received the day before. When she repeated the one brief line which it contained Smith started with surprise.

"It was signed 'J. T. B.'?" he said.

She bowed.

"Do you know who 'J. T. B.' is?" he asked, suddenly.

"No."

"Can you think of no one of whose name these letters are the initials?"

After several moments' silence she shook her head. "I can think of no one," she said.

"And Vane knew that your father saw what was in that letter?"

"Yes, I believe he did. If the knowledge was dangerous to him, that must have been his incentive to do this murder."

"That was but one of his incentives—a mere secondary consideration."

"What do you mean?"

"I must answer your question by asking another. In what shape is your father's property?"

"It is all in personal property."

"I thought so. What are the terms and conditions of his will?"

"His money is on deposit in a New York bank. In the event of his death it is subject to my draft."

"Just as I expected," said Smith, rubbing his hands and smiling.

"I am too stupid to see your drift," said Alice, "and once more must ask for an explanation."

Smith seemed to be very much excited at this, or at something which it suggested to him, and leaving his chair he began pacing up and down the room.

Presently he seated himself before her again. His face was very pale.

"You must pardon my agitation, Mrs. Vane; I have something deeper than a professional interest in this case. A matter which has puzzled me for years has been wholly cleared up to-night, and temporarily it unmanned me."

"Something concerning Stephen Vane?"

"Yes."

Alice looked long and searchingly into his eyes. The perfect frankness of her gaze seemed to afford Smith much gratification, for he began humming a part of an old love-song.

It was her turn to be startled now.

"Don't she said, reaching her hands out to him imploringly. "Don't sing that. A dear dead friend used to sing it—a man who is in heaven now."

It was fortunate for Smith that he wore a heavy beard. Otherwise his face might have betrayed to her the thing which he was most anxious to conceal.

"What reason did Stephen Vane have for killing my father, aside from the reading of the letter?"

The question brought Smith quickly back again to the matter in hand.

"The control of your father's property would be in your hands, according to his will, at the moment of his death. Vane, supposing that you would immediately draw that money and place it in your own bank, removed the sole obstacle to such a transaction—that is, he killed your father."

"I don't agree with you. Vane has sufficient money for his own needs from his own estates."

"He has found it sufficient up to the time that letter came. The letter made more money an immediate and imperative necessity."

"How?"

"For several years Stephen Vane has had a prisoner kept in an English mad-house. That prisoner has just escaped, and that is what the letter meant."

He paused a moment, but as her face only showed increased horror, he continued.

"The escape of that prisoner of course places Stephen Vane in great danger. He will need money to pay for a thorough and protracted search over the whole world for that man. He knows well that while the prisoner is free his life is in danger. To find him is the first business, and agents must be set to work in England, France, and Italy, as well as in America. That will cost a large sum in ready money, and when the man is found there will be still more needed for bribes, hush-money, and travelling expenses. Twenty thousand dollars will not cover all he must pay out in a few weeks, and Vane does not know where to put his hand on so much. He would think of all that. Then he would realize that if your father were dead he could persuade or force you to supply him with funds. From wishing him dead he would easily pass to the next step of compassing his death, especially as the old gentleman knew so much that it would be convenient to have him silenced. So, you see, there were two motives that might influence him—one, the urgent need of money which the crime would supply, and, two, the silencing of a man who held the clue to his secret. Either motive would be strong enough to incite a man like Vane to the commission of the crime, but, combined, they would be irresistible with him."

Before Alice Vane could answer him there was a rap at the door. She opened the door and found a servant there.

"Mr. Vane has returned, madam, and would like to see you at once," the servant said.

"Show him in here."

"You had better leave me," said Alice, to the detective Smith. "If my husband sees you here it will put him on his guard, and prevent my learning anything of his guilt."

"No," said Smith, "I dare not leave you. As he has committed one crime to gain his end, he may be tempted to commit another if he finds that he is thwarted. Let me step into the adjoining room, where I can hear you call if you need protection."

Alice nodded her assent, and Smith moved quietly into the next room. She sank into a chair, and buried her face in her hands. It was a terrible situation for a woman. The man whom she had sworn to love, honor and obey was charged with a terrible crime. There was enough of the heroic in her character to defend him, to help him, even to sacrifice her life for his sake, if she believed that he was innocent; but she could have no such belief now. The facts disclosed to her by the detective had swept away any doubt of his guilt that she might have cherished. He was clearly guilty, and he had robbed her of the only protector she had in the world. He had killed her father, whom she had loved with a new-born intensity that in her earlier years she did not experience. The old man, so affectionate, so devoted, so good, had been brutally struck down by the strong man who had shown himself a despicable coward. Alice would be no ally of such a man. Her love for her father would preclude her from showing a wife's comfort to his murderer. It was not as her husband that she would receive Stephen Vane, but as the slayer of that good old man. She looked up as he entered, and if he had possessed penetration he would have seen in her eyes the fact that he was in the presence of an enemy, not of a friend.

"This is a terrible calamity, Alice," he said. "I heard of it on the cars, and I thought I had better return immediately. My business must wait. You will need some one to see to things for you."

"Go away," Alice said, and she shuddered as he approached her; "I do not need you. You ought never to have come back here. If you value your life you will go away instantly. If you do not I will give you up to the police. How dare you come here stained with my father's blood?"

"I stained? Alice, what do you mean? You surely do not suspect me of the crime? This shock must have turned your brain. You are raving."

"I am doing nothing of the kind. I am serious, and I am desperately in earnest. If you stay here you will compel me to do a thing unnatural in a wife. I must denounce you and give you up to justice. You are guilty."

"You do not know what you are talking about, Alice. How can you imagine such a horrible thing? Some one must have been prejudicing you against me. It is a baseless suspicion. There is not the slightest evidence against me. Who accuses me of the crime?"

"The man who has in his possession a part of the knife the other part of which you have in your pocket," said Alice, with slow and emphatic utterance. She looked at him sternly and searchingly as she spoke, and she saw that the shaft went home. The man's face became ashy pale, and he trembled visibly. There could be no mistake about the expression on his face; it was one of guilt. He was detected, and he knew it.

For more than a minute Vane stood speechless. His mind was working violently. It was too sluggish to frame a scheme of exculpation rapidly in that moment of sudden terror. The smooth story he had concocted early in the day was useless to him now. The bottom had fallen out of it. The rôle he had imagined himself playing of the bereaved son-in-law, clad in ostentatious mourning garb attending the funeral, comforting his wife, attending to the duties of executor, which she naturally would be too agitated to perform herself, could not now be acted, that he saw as in a flash. What other rôle could he take up? An adroit, clever villain might have seized upon one, and have adapted himself to the new combination of circumstances. Not so Vane. He was too dull, too slow a man to deal with the situation as a man. He met it like an animal. A sullen, fierce look took the place of that of terror which had come upon him when Alice mentioned the knife, and he glared at her like a hunted beast at bay.

"You mean to give me up?" he said, hoarsely.

"I will certainly do so if you do not leave this place instantly."

"You are an unnatural woman. Give me some money and I will go. You shall never see me again."

"I will give you nothing," said Alice, decisively. "I will aid you in no way. You deserve nothing at my hands. You have forfeited the claims of a husband. You are nothing but a cowardly criminal, and, though I will not betray you myself, I hope you will be caught and brought to justice. Oh, my poor, murdered father!" And for the first time since he came in Vane saw tears in her eyes.

"I know you have money," he said, "and I must have it. Will you give it me, or must I force you to give it? I am in no mood to bear a refusal. I insist on having every cent you have in your possession. How can I escape without money? Give it me instantly, if you value your life."

"I will give you nothing, and if you are violent I will call for assistance."

Instantly Vane was at her side, with a heavy hand on her shoulder and the look of a maddened beast in his eyes. Alice shook herself free with a cry of pain and alarm. The detective in the next room heard it, and, rushing in, interposed between the desperate man and the woman he was struggling with. They grappled, and for several minutes there was a life and death wrestle. Though Smith had great nervous strength, it was no match for the brute force of the other, who was fighting desperately for life and liberty. Vane, collecting his gigantic physical power for one tremendous effort, flung his assailant from him clear against the opposite wall, where he fell stunned and unconscious. Then Vane turned, and ran. He knew every moment was precious, and he soon reached a disreputable resort in the city where he knew he would be sheltered, and might secure the counsel and assistance of men as unscrupulous as himself, and far more crafty.

THE FIERY FURNACE.

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 7, Dan. 3: 8-28. Golden Text, ver. 17. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The King's Self-Esteem—Increased by His Position in the Image—Desires to be Worshipped—A Subtle Influence—The Dedicatory Festival—The Jewish Non-Adorers—Denunciation by their Jealous Enemies—Their Calm Confidence—Well Grounded—The Furnace of Modern Days—The King Convinced.

KING NEBUCHADNEZZAR had acted boldly upon his convictions when he declared to Daniel: "Of a truth it is, that your God is a God of gods, and a Lord of kings, seeing that He could reveal this secret." And yet the king's heart was not thoroughly turned to God. In point of fact, he was greater in his own eyes than Him whom he had declared to be a "Lord of kings." That which most remained with him of the dream and its interpretation, which Daniel had recalled and interpreted to him, was his own part in it: "Thou art this head of gold." Instead of seeking further acquaintance with the wonderful God who revealed secrets, he gloried in his own greatness, until he persuaded himself that he was the greatest among men; and then it was but a little step to claim that he should be worshipped.

There is little doubt that the image of gold which he made was formed after the model of the image which he saw in his dream. But he, seeing

HIMSELF AS THE GREAT MAN, sought to improve on the thought of God, and made the whole image to be of gold—i.e., the whole image represented him, and his personal glory absorbed in his own eyes not only the present, but even the future of the known world. Oh, how subtle is that self-life within us which measures all things and persons by itself, weighs all characters and actions by comparison with itself, and sees all circumstances as they affect itself! How often have we seen those who have had revelations from God in danger of being exalted above measure, like Paul, until, as in his case, some messenger of Satan was sent to buffet them, and show them that God's grace, and not the revelations they had received; God's grace, and not their purity or power, was to be sufficient for them! Self likes to take occasion to glorify itself, and be satisfied with itself—to rest in self-complacency; but God teaches that Christ is He in whom we may glory: "Not I . . . but Christ."

Nebuchadnezzar was probably in an ecstasy of delight as he saw the colossal image of gold, sixty feet high, at least ten times larger than life, figuring forth his glory, and he longed to drink of the cup of flattery and earthly glory to the very dregs. Therefore he proclaimed a grand festival for the dedication of the image, and made it obligatory on all who held public office in his immense empire to present themselves as worshippers on this occasion. The preparation for this festival in those days of slow travelling must have taken a year or more. Governors of all degrees, from princes or tributary kings, down to the simple magistrates, and even the police officers of those days, would be represented there. The programme provided that the representatives of the various provinces should be ranged in order (no doubt according to their rank) before the image, and at a given signal, when an immense orchestra should sound an appropriate burst of music, the whole vast congregation should prostrate themselves before the image and worship, each in his own language, under penalty of being cast into a burning fiery furnace.

The ceremony was at an end; the king flattered himself that in the eyes of others, as well as in his own eyes, he was a greater man than ever before, and no doubt he was revelling in self-gratulation and self-complacency when certain Chaldeans (remembering, no doubt, their humiliation regarding the king's dream) came and

ACCUSED THE JEWS.

With all the appearance of loyalty, they came and said, "O king: live for ever. Thou, O king, hast made a decree, that every man that shall hear the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, and dulcimer, and all kinds of music, shall fall down and worship the golden image: and whoso falleth not down and worshippeth, that he should be cast into the midst of a burning fiery furnace. There are certain Jews whom thou hast set over the affairs of the province of Babylon, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego; these men, O king, have not regarded thee; they serve not thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up."

Such was the charge. Nebuchadnezzar was not, just at this time, in a mood to look reasonably on anything. His will had been crossed on the very point on which he had set his heart—his own imperial dignity and power as the master of the then known world; how should it matter to him who they were that resisted him, or for what purpose?

Nebuchadnezzar's greatness did not consist in self-control. In "rage and fury" he commanded that the accused should be brought before him, and he put to them the question: "Is it of purpose, O Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, that ye serve not my god, nor worship the golden image which I have set up?" (Rev. Ver.) Without waiting for an answer, he offered them another opportunity to obey him, and added: "But if ye worship not, ye shall be cast the same hour into the midst of a burning fiery furnace; and who is that God that shall deliver you out of my hands?" These last words betray the fact that the king knew these three men well enough to be sure that their motive was a conscientious one, and that the God whom he himself acknowledged to be "Lord of kings" was greater in their eyes than he was, although the monarch of the known world. The very sting to his conscience, while his will was still unyielded, rendered him more furious. God's three witnesses were unanimous in their answer: "O Nebuchadnezzar, we are not careful (or anxious) to answer thee in this matter. If it be so, our God whom we serve is able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace, and out of thine hand, O king. But if not, be it known unto thee, O king, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up." These men were not treading upon new ground; they knew the God in whom they believed. In answer to their prayer, joined with Daniel's, the king's dream had been revealed to him, and the wise men of Babylon spared when the king had already pronounced sentence on them all; and it was in the confidence of a God known and proved that they could say with such assurance, "He will deliver us out of thine hand, O king." More than a century previous God had given this promise through His servant Isaiah: "When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee: when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned; neither shall the flame kindle upon thee" (Isa. 43: 2). These men stepped out upon the promise, like Peter on the water, and they knew God would not fail them or break His word.

In the lives of all men there come moments when they must make a decisive stand. Those who have authority over us which is permitted by God call upon us to do something in obedience to them which is directly against the plain command of God. There is no room for parleying here; there is nothing for it but a direct, point-blank refusal, leaving the consequences in God's hands. Better lose a situation than tell a lie in the way of trade. Better for a young woman in a shop or store to be thrown out of employment, than to permit for a moment the unbecoming familiarity of manner or action of an employer who may take advantage of her position and lead her the first step toward ruin. Better by far offend such by the plainness of her dress than accept of him the tempting offer of such and such ornaments or clothing as may lay her under an obligation to him, and at the same time make her appearance unsuitable or questionable. It is the privilege of every true child of God to bear witness for Him under such circumstances: "I will not serve thy gods, and my God is able to deliver me out of thy hand."

Nebuchadnezzar was mad with rage, and commanded the furnace to be heated seven times more than it was wont to be heated. Then he gave orders that the most mighty man in his army should bind the three defaulters and cast them into the fiery furnace. The king's command was so well executed that he lost the mightiest men of his army, for the furnace was so hot that in order to cast in Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, these men had to go so near that they themselves were burnt to death. But the men of God, who were bound that they might have no chance to escape, walked loose in the burning fire as though it were their natural element. And the king saw it, hardly able to believe his own eyes; and, lest he should be under a delusion, he called his counsellors to ask: "Is it true, or is it a dream that we cast three men bound into the midst of the fire?" They answered, "True, O king." "Lo, I see four men loose, walking in the midst of the fire, and they have no hurt; and the form of the fourth is like unto the Son of God." Yes, it was the Son of God with His people.

The king was honest; he forgot all his greatness, and went in person to the mouth of the furnace, and called the men of God out. It was a glorious witness for God. These men had preached such a sermon to that assembled multitude as could be understood without translation into their languages. They would all go back into their lands and say: "There is a God that can and does deliver from fire, so that the fire has no power upon the bodies of those who trust Him, and they know Him to be so faithful that they risk death sooner than grieve Him." God orders all things well. The immense convocation which the king convened to strengthen idolatry was turned into an occasion for preaching of the true God, and Nebuchadnezzar himself was the preacher. He addressed the immense crowd, and no doubt his words were translated into other languages: "Blessed be the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, who hath sent His angel, and delivered His servants that trusted in Him, and have changed the king's word, and yielded their bodies, that they might not serve nor worship any god, except their own God. Therefore I make a decree. That every people, nation, and language, which speak anything amiss against the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, shall be cut in pieces, and their houses shall be made a dunghill; because there is no other God that can deliver after this sort."

Thus we see how the simple faithfulness of these young men was used of God to preach the knowledge of Him throughout the then known world, and that without doing anything but simply counting upon God and being true to Him at any cost.

"ONLY."

"Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these My brethren, ye have done it unto Me."—MATTHEW XXV. 40.

Only a word for the Master,
Lovingly, quietly said;
Only a word!
Yet the Master heard;
And some fainting hearts were fed.

Only a look of remonstrance,
Sorrowful, gentle, and deep;
Only a look!
Yet the strong man shook;
And he went alone to weep!

Only one cry from the sinner,
Bitterly earnest, and wild:
"Help, Lord! I die!"
Rose in agony;
And the Saviour saved His child.

Only some act of devotion,
Willingly, joyfully done;
"Surely 'twas naught"
(So the proud world thought);
But yet souls for Christ were won!

Only an hour with the children,
Pleasantly, cheerfully given;
Still seed was sown
In that hour alone, [Heaven!]
Which would bring forth fruit for "Only"—but Jesus is looking Constantly, tenderly down

To earth, and sees
Those who strive to please;
And their love He loves to crown.

THE DOVE OF PEACE.

A GEM OF BEAUTY. An Exquisitely Engraved and Colored Dove floating on the wing, upon a deep, blue sky, which forms the background, and with every feather so carefully drawn as almost to deceive one into the belief that it is a THING OF LIFE. Upon this background, in choice lettering is the text, "MY PEACE I GIVE UNTO YOU" etc. Upon the coming light of the morning dawn, which brightens up the foreground of the picture in similar letters, is the text, "THE PEACE OF GOD WHICH PASSETH ALL UNDERSTANDING," the whole forming a perfect gem of art. Like all fine works its value consists not so much in its size 8x10, as in its beauty of detail, and it possesses the great advantage of needing no frame, being printed on a gold border upon a heavy card plate, so that it can be placed upon the table or mantel if preferred. If you want a choice ornament for your home, or a remembrance to a friend, especially to one in sickness or trouble, it cannot be equalled, either in beauty or price. REMEMBER IT CAN BE FRAMED OR NOT AS YOU PLEASE. Safely packed, we send it postage paid on receipt of Twenty-Five Cents.

It was a remarkable scene, that of the funeral of good, brave, honest, loving Charles Kingsley, on January 28th, 1875. Around the grave where they laid the grand Christian pastor, teacher and writer were peers and members of the House of Commons, an aristocratic gentleman specially sent to represent him by the Prince of Wales, and, rubbing elbows with these patri- cians, a band of gipsies from the common near the parsonage, who knew and loved him. Clergy- men, too, of all denominations were there. Some of them had in his life said hard things of him, criticised, blamed and denounced him, but they were all sorry that he was gone, for he loved them all, and they were poorer by his death in what is more precious than gold. His watchword through life was "God is love," and the words, by his request, are cut on the marble that gleams above his grave. His life was one long living sermon on that text, and every year seemed to raise him nearer to his conception of the godlike in man, for he loved much. Thou- sands of hearts in America have read his books, not a few have listened to his voice, and all of them loved him. To all such and to others who did not know him, but who can appreciate true, vigorous, Christian character, a brief sketch of the man and his life will be welcome.

BIRTH AND EARLY LIFE.

Charles Kingsley was born at the parsonage at Holne, Devonshire, England, on June 12th, 1819, and died January 23d, 1875, aged fifty-six years. His father was the Vicar of Holne, and in that picturesque locality Charles spent his earliest years. His precocity was remarkable. When little over four years old he began making little poems and sermons, which were so remarkable in a child that his father showed them to the Bishop of the Diocese, who predicted for the boy a useful and brilliant career. His love of nature, birds and animals was early de- veloped, and all the time that he could spare from his studies was devoted to country excu- sions to add specimens to his collection, and to study the beauties of creation. His daring was a strong feature of his character then, as it was in after life. It is related of him that, having a strong desire to possess a hawk's egg, he climbed a tree in which he had detected a hawk's nest, and, regardless of the presence of the mother- bird, he thrust in his hand. The bird attacked the hand vigorously, but it did not scare off the intruder. When the boy descended his hand was lacerated and bleeding, but it held the egg. (See illustration No. 1.)

The family in 1836 removed to London, where a living had been presented to Charles's father. The removal was a sore trial to the nature-lov- ing lad, who could not sympathize with Samuel Johnson in his preference of Fleet Street over green fields. Charles became a student at King's College, London, where he worked hard for two years, walking there and back from his father's house at Chelsea every day, reading all the way and studying all the evening.

Charles Kingsley left King's College for Mag- dalene College, Cambridge, in the autumn of 1838, and in May, 1839, he gained a scholarship, being first in classics and mathematics.

At this time he was much agitated by relig- ious doubt. He was an omnivorous reader, and some of the books he had read had sapped the foundations of his belief. Still more potent had been the inconsistencies of the clergymen who had visited at his father's house, whose conver- sation showed intense bigotry and malevolence toward any who differed with them even on minor points of doctrine, and whose love for the brethren would not bear the apostolic test (1 John 4 : 7, 8). It was at this crisis of his life that he met the lady who afterward became his wife. She was an earnest believer, and his ac- quaintance with her gradually developing into a close intimacy and then into love, was the means which God used to lead him to the truth. He made her his confidante, and she, with her strong faith and fervent love to God, vanquished his doubts.

He was at that time studying for the profes- sion of the law, but the way by which he had been led could have but one ending; all his life and all his powers must be consecrated to God. In a letter to his friend, written on his twenty-second birthday, he said: "I have been for the last hour on the seashore, not dreaming, but thinking deeply and strongly, and forming determinations which are to affect my destiny through time and through eternity. Before the sleeping earth and the sleepless sea and stars I have devoted myself to God; a vow never, if He gives me the faith I pray for, to be recalled." He left the University in February, 1842, ex- hausted in body and mind, having, by six months' desperate reading, done work which should have spread over three years, and com- ing out first-class in classics and senior optime in mathematics. He then read theology, and at the end of his course he was ordained by Bishop Sumner.

HIS MINISTRY.

He was invited to become curate of the parish of Eversley, a picturesque but spiritually neg- lected place, on the borders of Old Windsor Forest, and was then mostly common land. It was divided into three hamlets, surrounded by the moorlands, with young forests of self-sown fir-trees cropping up in every direction. Its population was scattered, and a rendezvous of poachers from time immemorial.

Charles Kingsley's first day of public ministra- tion in Eversley Church was July 17th, 1842. "I was not nervous," he says, "for I had prayed before going into the desk that I might remember that I was not speaking on my own authority, but on God's, and the feeling that the responsibility was on God and not on me, quieted the weak terror I have of offending people." Hitherto the sanctuary services had been utterly neglected. Consequently he found the ale- houses full on Sunday and the church empty, and it was up-hill work.

GETTING A CONGREGATION

But he soon began to exercise a mighty influence. He commenced a course of prodigious labor, in which he knew no rest except such as came from the change of one mode of exertion to another. Very few of his parish- ioners could read or write; he established night classes for adults in the parsonage, which were held three nights in the week, and to which every one was welcome. These he taught him- self with no assistance. In the village school he taught the children regularly every day, and yet found time for a regular house-to-house visita- tion. He organized a school club, a coal club, a maternal society, a loan fund, and a lending library; and his energy in keeping all moving seemed inexhaustible. To spend and be spent in the Lord's service was his only satisfaction.

The people of the parish soon discovered that this aristocratic gentleman who had come among them was the friend of every man there, no mat- ter how poor and ignorant he might be, and when their rector died they one and all peti- tioned that the young curate might have the liv- ing. It was done, and Charles Kingsley became and married the lady to whom he had long been attached, and who had been instrumental in leading him to the light. His exertions in his higher sphere were not relaxed. He was con- stantly at work, and was more than ever anx- ious for the welfare of all around him. He set himself to the study of sanitary science that he might find out a remedy for the periodical sick- nesses that afflicted his parish, and listened patiently to the complaints of any one whom he met about their troubles, physical or pecuniary. His advice was always given, and if he did not feel sure about a case, he would study for hours, and spend a night searching his library for in- formation on the subject.

A friend who visited him during those early days of his work, relates that the young clergy- man could not be held for conversation. He was restless, and at last said he had to visit a sick man and would talk as they walked if his friend would accompany him to the house. The clergyman prepared for his visit by putting into his pockets and started forth. He said he would not ask his friend to go into the cottage as it was a bad case of fever, but if he would remain by the river outside, he would rejoin him when the visit was over. The friend, however, preferred to accompany him. The atmosphere of the little ground-floor bedroom was horrible, his friend says. There was no ventilation whatever. The rector, however, had been there before, and knew all about it. He ran up-stairs, and with the auger he had brought, bored several holes just over the sick man's head. The change in the atmosphere was sudden and delightful, and the sufferer was surprised and relieved. Then the rector read and prayed with him, and left the cottage with two blessings behind him. That was always Kingsley's way of work; the Bible and the auger went together. Those who came to him for help found that he was concerned for their bodily welfare as well as for their spiritual health. He had a strong belief that the spiri- tual life was affected by the body, and he be- lieved this for himself as well as for his people. He was an enthusiastic athlete, and by walking, riding, jumping, swimming, and other athletic exercises endeavored to keep his constitution strong for spiritual labor.

THE PATIENCE OF THE MAN

was amazing. People went to him for help in every trouble, and no one in the parish hesitated to go to him for advice in any difficulty, whether it was the laying out of his garden, the drainage of a field, or anxiety about his soul. No wiser advice than the parson's could be had anywhere, and his patience was inexhaustible. Even that horror of the literary man, the strolling musi- cians, could not disturb him. On one occasion when it was very trying (see illustration No. 2) he simply laid aside the composition to write to a friend: "I have been making a fool of myself for the past ten minutes, according to the world's notion of folly, for there have been some strolling fiddlers under the window, and I have been listening to them and crying like a child. Some quick music is so inexpressibly mournful. It seems just like one's own feel- ings, exultation and action, with the remem- brance of past sorrow wailing up, yet without bitterness, tender in its shrillness, through the mingled tide of present joy; and the notes seem thoughts—thoughts pure of words, and a spirit seems to call to me in them, and cry, 'Hast thou not felt all this?' And I start when I find myself answering unconsciously, 'Yes, yes, I know it all.' Let us never despise the wander- ing minstrel. He is an unconscious witness for God's harmony."

"I have seen him," says a friend, "seat him- self, hatless, beside a tramp on the grass outside his gate in his eagerness to catch exactly what he had to say, searching him, as they sate, in his keen, kindly way with question and look. The sight of unmistakable misery, however caused, covered, to him, the multitude of sins. Noth- ing roused him to anger so much as cant. Once a scoundrel, on being refused alms on the ground that he was notoriously dissolute, and thinking that at a parsonage and with a parson it would be a successful trick, fell on his knees on the doorstep, turned up the whites of his eyes, and began the disgusting counterfeit of a prayer. In an instant the man found himself, to his astonishment, seized by collar and wrist, and swiftly thrust outside the gate, with a shake that he never thought a parson's arm could give. (See illustration No. 3.)

His favorite relaxation was fishing, probably because it gave him leisure for thought. He once came into danger in prosecuting his favorite sport owing to his aversion to being toiled in anything he undertook. He was in Ireland for a brief holiday with his friend, Mr. J. A. Froude, the historian, and there engaged for the first time in salmon-fishing. To his delight he hooked a monster fish, and in his anxiety to land it went waist deep in water and came near being carried out to sea. (See illustration No. 4.) The line, however, fouled a ship's hawser and broke, so the exciting chase was abandoned.

A SURPRICED FIREMAN

is a sight not often seen, but Charles Kingsley's strong practical common sense, prompted by his regard for the temporal interests of his parishioners, led him to appear in that character. He had an instinctive knowledge of the right time for a duty, and did not hesitate to let the temporal have precedence over the spiritual when occasion demanded it, having a supreme contempt for the spirit that forgets that people have bodies as well as souls.

While he was conducting service one Sunday morning he learned that the heath was on fire and the cottagers' homes were in peril. Kingsley immediately left the curate to finish the service for any who remained, and quietly but rapidly quitted the church. Not waiting to divest himself of his surplice, he jumped over the churchyard fence and ran at full speed in surplice, hood and stole (see illustration No. 5) to the scene of danger. He was one of the first men to get to work, and, armed with a bill-hook was cutting down with might and main a circle to check the flames. A little later, as assistance came, the surplice was taken off and cast aside, and Kingsley was in command, busy everywhere, organizing bands of beaters, and, begirt with smoke and flame, resisting the advance of the fire at every advantageous point.

He could not have preached so powerful a sermon—powerful as his pulpit efforts were—had he remained at the church. It was the principle of the Bible and the auger again, and it told on the people who had to thank him for deliverance from ruin. Nevertheless, in spite of all his activity and his energy in the use of means, his faith in God was unbounded. He showed this particularly on one occasion, when a continuance of wet weather had prompted his clerical brethren to use in their services the prayer for fair weather. Kingsley declined to use it, believing that God had some design in the rain that would be for the benefit of the people.

One other incident must complete the material from which a conception of his character as a clergyman can be constructed. He had a great desire to visit a certain exposition, in which he was much interested. The fact was known to a clerical friend on the spot, who waited, wondering, for Kingsley's arrival. Still he did not come, and the time for closing the exposition was near at hand. Then he wrote to him, and Kingsley replied, expressing his regret that he would not be able to visit the exposition. His friend was curious to find out the reason, which Kingsley did not explain. He subsequently found that one of his parishioners was seriously ill, and Kingsley could not bring himself to go away for a week because the sick man would miss his daily visits.

PUBLIC LABORS.

In 1848 the publication of a series of articles entitled "Yeast" brought Kingsley into notoriety, revealing, as they did, the deep yearning in the soul of a Christian clergyman and a member of the aristocracy over the wrongs and miseries of the poor. He also, in other articles and lectures, endeavored to arouse public interest in the necessity of intelligent drainage and sanitary reform. His income was small, and as his expenses increased he entered more extensively on literary work. In 1850, a powerful, healthy story from his pen, entitled "Alton Locke," appeared, and in the following year "Hypathia" came out and had a large sale. Two volumes of sermons followed, and in 1854 was published "Westward Ho!" the book by which he is best known in this country.

A little relief from the tension of money difficulties came in 1860, when he was appointed Professor of Modern History at Cambridge, a position he held for nine years, doing much valuable work among the rising generation of clergymen and statesmen. He was subsequently appointed to a canonry at Chester, and there, as everywhere else, he won the love of all with whom he came in contact by his manly sense and practical work.

VISITS AMERICA.

He left Chester in 1873 to fill a canonry in Westminster Abbey, but his health was so undermined by ceaseless labor, that at the end of a year a change of scene and occupation was imperative. To this fact we in America are indebted for the only glimpse we had of Charles Kingsley. He arrived in New York in January, 1874, and made an extensive tour through the United States, crossing the country to San Francisco. The poet, J. G. Whittier, whom he visited, says of him: "His heart seemed overcharged with interest in the welfare, physical, moral and spiritual, of his race. I was conscious in his presence of the bracing atmosphere of a noble nature. He seemed to me one of the manliest of men."

On his return to England he plunged with renewed vigor into his beloved work. He still delighted in preaching and teaching and visiting the sick in his own parish of Eversley, to which he had given his earliest labors, and going up to London at regular intervals to perform his duties as Canon of Westminster Abbey. It was during one of these journeys, in November, 1874, that he contracted the illness which terminated his life on earth.

As soon as the Abbey service was over, he returned home, much exhausted, and described the service to his wife, who was in delicate health. He, too, had caught a severe cold, and as his duties in London were finished for the time, both he and his wife were glad to return to Eversley for Christmas, and the quiet winter's work. His cold was renewed on the journey home, and became worse afterward. Bronchitis appeared after a few days, and finally pneumonia set in. He lingered until January 17th, 1875, when he peacefully passed away.

A few sweet lines which he addressed to his niece, a young lady who was leaving him to take an important step in life, are so characteristic of the man that, although they are doubtless familiar to many of our readers, should be given here to complete the picture of a beautiful career. They were written in 1856, in the midst of his severest labors and anxieties.

"My fairest child, I have no song to give you;
No lark could pipe in skies so dull and gray;
Yet if you will, one quiet hint I'll leave you,
For every day.

"I'll tell you how to sing a clearer carol
Than lark who hails the dawn or breezy down;
To earn yourself a purer poet's laurel
Than Shakespeare's crown.

"Be good, sweet maid, and let who can be clever;
Do noble things, not dream them all day long;
And so make life, death, and that vast forever,
One grand sweet song.

GOSPEL WORK AT PORT SAID.

SINCE the opening of the Suez Canal there has been a constant stream of travellers of all nationalities by that great highway of commerce. Some of them are merely tourists bent on pleasure, others are going or returning on business, and some are going to take part in pilgrimages or religious observances. British ships, too, are constantly passing through the canal, and the officers and sailors belonging to them are frequently to be seen ashore at the towns at the extremities of the canal. Thus opportunities for Christian work have been multiplied, and God has put it into the hearts of His servants to use them. Good seed has been sown by Christian men and women amid many discouragements, and they have seen no result from it. It has seemed as though in leaving their homes, and submitting to the hardships and inconveniences of life in Egypt, they have gone on a fruitless errand. But it is not so. Though they have not seen the fruit of their labors, there has been fruit. The travellers have gone their way, and when they have reached the end of their journeys the results have been seen. Thus the good seed planted has ripened under other skies, and God's Word has been found exercising its beneficent influence in strange places.

One of these Christian workers, Mr. George A. Eöhl, who is residing at Port Said, states that at that place alone, since April of last year, twenty-one thousand Gospels, Testaments and Bibles, in twenty-three languages, and nineteen thousand books, tracts, and periodicals, have been given away, and are now spread abroad to all parts of the globe. The following is a description of the work being done by Mr. Eöhl and his friends:

"Opportunities have been afforded me to speak words of warning or encouragement to many individually, and to preach the Gospel on board English, German and French passenger steamers; also English, American, Turkish, German, French and Italian man-of-war ships. On such occasions permission was given me to hand over to each man on board a New Testament. Frequently I have met with many God-fearing passengers and missionaries on their way to India, China, Australia, and the neighborhood of Syria and Palestine. Lately we had the joy of meeting with Miss Anstey and other friends on their way to India, Mr. Stevenson and other whole-hearted workers for China. Miss Reuter and lady workers passed through here last week for the same place, beside Miss Nicolson for Jaffa, and a lady doctor, Miss Taylor, for Beyrout and the Lebanon. It has been a time of refreshing to our own souls to meet with these Christian workers of various denominations, going out in His service, besides the privilege to lend an helping hand to them all during their short stay in this place, so full of moral darkness.

"Our Gospel meetings have, at times, been well attended, and of late some have truly been born from above, and confessed the Lord boldly before the world. The meetings are at present held in our house until we are able to have a Rest for soldiers and sailors. How much such a place is needed here is well known to our Heavenly Father, and the earnest of our prayers He has already given us through some of His children encourages us to trust Him for the whole amount needed. The intended Rest will not be only for meetings and reading-room (for the latter many soldiers and sailors have expressed the hope to see a place to go to, as there is none but the public-house or dens of vice, from which places the Lord has enabled me to rescue many by inviting them to our house), but also to take in such who are in a helpless condition, either as convalescent, coming out from the hospital, or other poor ones without means. These we have at times taken into our own house, which is only composed of four rooms, but of late I have been able to hire a shed to sleep in. This, even, is found better than the so-called lodgings.

"Many families of French, Italian and Greek nationalities in the town have been visited, with whom I have been permitted to place more than four hundred Testaments and one hundred Bibles.

"The Arabs have not been forgotten; over one thousand Gospels have been distributed among them. This does not include the Pilgrims going to Mecca, to whom also many hundred copies have been given. Only lately I was told by a missionary from the Lebanon, who used to visit the Druses, that he was quite astonished to find them possessed of the Arabic Gospels, and, on inquiry, was told it had been given to them while they were at Port Said waiting for the steamer."

MATRIMONIAL HARMONY OR DISCORD.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, Jan. 31, 1886.

"Can two walk together unless they be agreed?"
—AMOS 3:3.

An Impossibility—Mutual Duties of Husband and Wife—The Home the Highest House of Congress—The Social Balance—Home a Relic of Eden—Its Assailants—The Sordid—The Beneficent Guest—Forbearance Needed—A Grandfather's Apology—Parental Absentees—A Godless Mother's Grief—Matrimonial Congeniality—The Martyrs of the Kitchen—The Genteel Business—Love as President—Splendid Misery—Happiness in Poverty.

No, Amos, they cannot. They will be tripping each other up, or pushing each other down. Married life under such circumstances will be the sounding of perpetual war-whoop. In this course of sermons on "The Marriage Ring," I will to-day speak of the of husband and wife, preparatory to discourses on their individual duties.

A church within a church, a republic within a republic, a world within a world, is spelled by four letters—Home! If things go right there, they go right everywhere; if things go wrong there, they go wrong everywhere. The door-sill of the dwelling-house is the foundation of Church and State. A man never gets higher than his own garret or lower than his own cellar. In other words, domestic life overarches and undergirds all other life. The highest House of Congress is the domestic circle; the rocking-chair in the nursery is higher than a throne. George Washington commanded the forces of the United States, but Mary Washington commanded George. Chrysostom's mother made his pen for him. If a man should start out and run seventy years in a straight line he could not get out from under the shadow of his own mantelpiece. I therefore talk to you this morning about a matter of infinite and eternal moment when I speak of your home.

THE SOCIAL BALANCE.

As individuals we are fragments. God makes the race in part, and then he gradually puts us together. What I lack, you make up; what you lack, I make up; our deficits and surpluses of character being the cog-wheels in the great social mechanism. One person has the patience, another has the courage, another has the placidity, another has the enthusiasm; that which is lacking in one is made up by another, or made up by all. Buffaloes in herds, grouse in broods, quail in flocks, the human race in circles. God has most beautifully arranged this. It is in this way that he balances society; this conservative and that radical keeping things even. Every ship must have its mast, cutwater, taffrail, ballast. Thank God, then, for Princeton and Andover, for the opposites.

I have no more right to blame a man for being different from me than a driving-wheel has a right to blame the iron shaft that holds it to the centre. John Wesley balances Calvin's Institutes. A cold thinker gives to Scotland the strong bones of theology; Dr. Guthrie clothes them with a throbbing heart and warm flesh. The difficulty is that we are not satisfied with just the work that God has given us to do. The water-wheel wants to come inside the mill and grind the grist, and the hopper wants to go out and dabble in the water. Our usefulness and the welfare of society depend upon our staying in just the place that God has put us, or intended we should occupy.

A RELIC OF EDEN.

For more compactness and that we may be more useful we are gathered in still smaller circles in the home group. And there you have the same varieties again; brothers, sisters, husband and wife; all different in temperaments and tastes. It is fortunate that it should be so. If the husband be all impulse, the wife must be all prudence. If one sister be sanguine in her temperament the other must be lymphatic. Mary and Martha are necessities. There will be no dinner for Christ if there be no Martha; there will be no audience for Jesus if there be no Mary. The home organization is most beautifully constructed. Eden has gone; the bowers are all broken down; the animals that Adam stroked with his hand that morning when they came up to get their names have since shot forth tusk and sting and growled, panther at panther; in mid-air iron beaks plunge till with clotted wing and eyeless sockets the twain come whirling down from under the sun in blood and fire. Eden has gone, but there is just one little fragment left. It floated down on the River Hiddekel out of Paradise. It is the marriage institution. It does not, as at the beginning, take away from man a rib. Now it is an addition of ribs.

THE HOME ASSAULTED.

This institution of marriage has been defamed in our day, and influences are abroad trying to turn this earth into a Turkish harem or a great Salt Lake City. While the pulpits have been comparatively silent, novels—their cheapness only equalled by their nastiness—are trying to educate, have taken upon themselves to educate, this nation in regard to holy marriage, which makes or breaks for time and eternity. Oh, this is not a mere question of residence or wardrobe! It is a question charged with gigantic joy or sorrow, with heaven or hell. Alas for this new dispensation of George Sands! Alas for the mingling of the nightshade with the marriage garlands! Alas for the venom of adlers spit into the tankards! Alas for the white frosts of eternal death that kill the orange blossoms! The Gospel of Jesus Christ is to assert what is right and to assert what is wrong.

THE ASSAULT OF THE SORDID.

Attempt has been made to take the marriage institution, which was intended for the happiness and elevation of the race, and make it a mere commercial enterprise; an exchange of houses and lands and equipage; a business partnership of two, stuffed up with the stories of romance and knight-errantry, and unfaithfulness and feminine angelhood. The two after a while have roused up to find that, instead of the paradise they dreamed of, they have got nothing but a Van Amburgh's menagerie, filled with tigers and wild-cats. Eighty thousand divorces in Paris in one year preceded the worst revolution that France ever saw. It was only the first course in that banquet of hell; and I tell you what you know as well as I do, that wrong notions on the subject of Christian marriage are the cause at this day of more moral outrage before God and man than any other cause.

There are some things that I want to bring before you. I know there are those of you who have had homes set up for a great many years; and then there are those here who have just established their home. They have only been in it a few months or a few years. Then there are those who will, after awhile, set up for themselves a home, and it is right that I should speak out upon these themes.

THE BENEFICENT GUEST.

My first counsel to you is, have Jesus in your new home, if it be a new home, and let Him who was a guest at Bethany be in your household; let the Divine blessing drop upon your every hope and plan and expectation. Those young people who begin with God end with heaven. Have on your right hand the engagement-ring of the divine affection. If one of you be a Christian, let that one take a Bible and read a few verses in the evening-time, and then kneel down and commend yourselves to Him who setteth the solitary in families. I want to tell you that the destroying angel passes by without touching or entering the door-post sprinkled with the blood of the everlasting covenant. Why is it that in some families they never get along, and in others they always get along well? I have watched such cases, and have come to a conclusion. In the first instance, nothing seemed to go pleasantly, and after awhile came devastation, domestic disaster or estrangement. Why? They started wrong! In the other case, although there were hardships and trials, and some things that had to be explained, still things went on pleasantly until the very last. Why? They started right!

FORBEARANCE NEEDED.

My advice to you in your home is to exercise to the very last possibility of your nature the law of forbearance. Prayers in the household will not make up for everything. Some of the best people in the world are the hardest to get along with. There are people who stand up in prayer-meetings and pray like angels, who at home are uncompromising and cranky. You may not have everything just as you want it. Sometimes it will be the duty of the husband, and sometimes of the wife, to yield; but both stand punctiliously on your rights, and you will have a Waterloo with no Blucher coming up at nightfall to decide the conflict.

A GRANDFATHER'S APOLOGY.

Never be ashamed to apologize when you have done wrong in domestic affairs. Let that be a law of your household. The best thing I ever heard of my grandfather, whom I never saw, was this: that once, having unrighteously rebuked one of his children, he himself having lost his patience, and, perhaps, having been misinformed of the child's doings, found out his mistake, and in the evening of the same day gathered all his family together, and said, "Now I have one explanation to make, and one thing to say. Thomas, this morning, I rebuked you very unfairly. I am very sorry for it. I rebuked you in the presence of the whole family, and now I ask your forgiveness in their presence." It must have taken some courage to do that. It was right, was it not? Never be ashamed to apologize for domestic inaccuracy. Find out the points; what are the weak points, if I may call them so, of your companion, and then stand aloof from them.

Do not carry the fire of your temper too near the gunpowder. If the wife be easily fretted by disorder in the household, let the husband be careful where he throws his slippers. If the husband come home from the store with his patience all exhausted, do not let the wife unnecessarily cross his temper; but both stand up for your rights, and I will promise the everlasting sound of the war-whoop. Your life will be spent in making up, and marriage will be to you an unmitigated curse. Cowper said:

"The kindest and the happiest pair
Will find occasion to forbear;
And something, every day they live,
To pity, and perhaps forgive."

I advise, also, that you make your chief pleasure circle around about that home. It is unfortunate when it is otherwise. If the husband spend the most of his nights away from home, of choice, and not of necessity, he is not the head of the household; he is only the cashier. If the wife throw the cares of the household in the servant's lap, and then spend five nights of the week at the opera or theatre, she may clothe her children with satins and laces and ribbons that would confound a French milliner, but they are orphans. Oh, it is sad when a child has to say its prayers alone because mother has gone off to the evening entertainment! In India they bring children and throw them to the crocodiles, and it seems very cruel; but the jaws of New York and Brooklyn dissipation are swallowing down more little children to-day than all the monsters that ever crawled upon the banks of the Ganges!

A GODLESS MOTHER'S GRIEF.

I have seen the sorrow of a godless mother on the death of a child she had neglected. It was not so much grief that she felt from the fact that the child was dead as the fact that she had neglected it. She said: "If I had only watched over and cared for the child, I know God would not have taken it." The tears came not; it was a dry, blistering tempest—a scorching simoon of the desert. When she wrung her hands it seemed as if she would twist her fingers from their sockets; when she seized her hair it seemed as if she had, in wild terror, grasped a coiling serpent with her right hand.

No tears! Comrades of the little one came in and wept over the coffin; neighbors came in, and the moment they saw the still face of the child the shower broke. No tears for her. God gives tears as the summer rain to the parched soul; but in all the universe the driest and hottest, the most scorching and consuming thing is a mother's heart if she has neglected her child, when once it is dead. God may forgive her, but she will never forgive herself. The memory will sink the eyes deeper into the sockets, and pinch the face, and whiten the hair, and eat up the heart with vultures that will not be satisfied, forever plunging deeper their iron beaks. Oh, you wanderers from your home, go back to your duty! The brightest flowers in all the earth are those which grow in the garden of a Christian household, clambering over the porch of a Christian home.

MATRIMONIAL CONGENIALITY.

I advise you also to cultivate sympathy of occupation. Sir James Mackintosh, one of the most eminent and elegant men that ever lived, while standing at the very height of his eminence, said to a great company of scholars: "My wife made me." The wife ought to be the advising partner in every firm. She ought to be interested in all the losses and gains of shop and store. She ought to have a right—she has a right—to know everything. If a man goes into a business transaction that he dare not tell his wife of, you may depend that he is on the way either to bankruptcy or moral ruin. There may be some things which he does not wish to trouble his wife with; but if he dare not tell her, he is on the road to discomfiture.

On the other hand, the husband ought to be sympathetic with the wife's occupation. It is no easy thing to keep house. Many a woman that could have endured martyrdom as well as Margaret, the Scotch girl, has actually been worn out by house management. There are a thousand martyrs of the kitchen. It is very annoying, after the vexations of the day, around the stove or the table, or in the nursery or parlor, to have your husband say: "You know nothing about trouble; you ought to be in the store half an hour." Sympathy of occupation!

If the husband's work cover him with the soot of the furnace, or the odors of leather or soap factories, let not the wife be easily disgusted at the begrimed hands or unsavory aroma. Your gains are one, your interests are one, your losses are one; lay hold of the work of life with both hands. Four hands to fight the battles; four eyes to watch for the danger; four shoulders on which to carry the trials. It is a very sad thing when the painter has a wife who does not like pictures. It is a very sad thing for a pianist when she has a husband who does not like music.

GENTEEL BUSINESS.

It is a very sad thing when a wife is not suited unless her husband has what is called a "genteel business." So far as I understand a "genteel business," it is something to which a man goes at ten o'clock in the morning, and from which he comes home at two or three o'clock in the afternoon, and gets a large amount of money for doing nothing. That is, I believe, a "genteel business;" and there has been many a wife who has made the mistake of not being satisfied until the husband has given up the tanning of the hides, or the turning of the banisters, or the building of the walls, and put himself in circles where he has nothing to do but smoke cigars and drink wine, and get himself into habits that upset him, going down in the maelstrom, taking his wife and children with him.

There are a good many trains running from earth to destruction. They start all the hours of the day, and all the hours of the night. There are the freight trains; they go very slowly and very heavily; and there are the accommodation trains going on toward destruction, and they stop very often and let a man get out when he wants to. But genteel idleness is an express train; Satan is the stoker, and Death is the engineer; and though one may come out in front of it and swing the red flag of "danger," or the lantern of God's Word, it makes just one shot into perdition, coming down the embankment with a shout and a wail and a shriek—crash, crash! There are two classes of people sure of destruction: First, those who have nothing to do; secondly, those who have something to do, but are too lazy or too proud to do it.

LOVE TO PRESIDE.

I have one more word of advice to give to those who would have a happy home, and that is, let love preside in it. When your behavior in the domestic circle becomes a mere matter of calculation; when the caress you give is merely the result of deliberate study of the position you occupy, happiness lies stark dead on the hearthstone. When the husband's position as head of the household is maintained by loudness of voice, by strength of arm, by fire of temper, the republic of domestic bliss has become a despotism that neither God nor man will abide. Oh, ye who promised to love each other at the altar, how dare you commit perjury? Let no shadow of suspicion come on your affection. It is easier to kill that flower than it is to make it live again. The blast from hell that puts out that light leaves you in the blackness of darkness forever.

A HOUSE NOT A HOME.

Here are a man and wife; they agree in nothing else, but they agree they will have a home. They will have a splendid house, and they think that if they have a house they will have a home. Architects make the plan, and the mechanics execute it; the house to cost one hundred thousand dollars. It is done. The carpets are spread, lights are hoisted, curtains are hung, cards of invitation sent out. The horses in gold-plated harness prance at the gate; guests come in and take their places; the flute sounds; the dancers go up and down; and with one grand whirl the wealth and the fashion and the mirth of the great town wheel amidst the pictured walls.

Ha! this is happiness. Float it on the smoking viands; sound it in the music; whirl it in the dance; cast it on the snow of sculpture; sound it up the brilliant stairway; flash it in chandeliers! Happiness, indeed! Let us build on the centre of the parlor floor a throne to Happiness; let all the guests, when they come in, bring their flowers and pearls and diamonds, and throw them on this pyramid, and let it be a throne; and then let Happiness, the Queen, mount the throne, and we will stand around and, all chalices lifted, we will say: "Drink, O Queen! live forever!"

LIGHTS OUT.

But the guests depart, the flutes are breathless, the last clash of the impatient hoofs is heard in the distance, and the twain of the household come back to see the Queen of Happiness on the throne amid the parlor floor. But, alas! as they come back the flowers have faded, the sweet odors have become the smell of a charnel-house, and instead of the Queen of Happiness there sits there the gaunt form of Anguish, with bitten lip and sunken eye, and ashes in her hair.

The romp and joyous step of the dancers who have left seems rumbling yet, like jarring thunders that quake the floor and rattle the glasses of the feast, rim to rim. The spilled wine on the floor turns into blood. The wreaths of plush have become wriggling reptiles. Terrors catch tangled in the canopy that overhangs the couch. A strong gust of wind comes through the hall and the drawing-room and the bed-chamber, in which all the lights go out. And from the lips of the wine-beakers come the words: "Happiness is not in us!" And the arches respond: "It is not in us!" And the silenced instruments of music, thrummed on by invisible fingers, answer: "Happiness is not in us!" And the frozen lips of Anguish break open, and, seated on the throne of wilted flowers, she strikes her bony hands together, and groans: "It is not in me!"

HAPPINESS IN POVERTY.

That very night a clerk with a salary of a thousand dollars a year—only one thousand—goes to his home, set up three months ago, just after the marriage-day. Love meets him at the door; love sits with him at the table; love talks over the work of the day; love takes down the Bible, and reads of Him who came our souls to save; and they kneel, and while they are kneeling—right in that plain room, on that plain carpet—the angels of God build a throne, not out of flowers that perish and fade away, but out of garlands of heaven, wreath on top of wreath, amaranth on amaranth, until the throne is done. Then the harps of God sounded, and suddenly there appeared one who mounted the throne, with eye so bright and brow so fair that the twain knew it was Christian Love. And they knelt at the throne, and, putting one hand on each head, she blessed them, and said: "Happiness is with me!" And that throne of celestial bloom withered not with the passing years; and the queen left not the throne till one day the married pair felt stricken in years—felt themselves called away, and knew not which way to go, and the queen bounded from the throne, and said: "Follow me, and I will show you the way up to the realm of everlasting love." And so they went up to sing songs of love, and walk on pavements of love, and to live together in mansions of love, and to rejoice forever in the truth that God is love.

Dr. Talmage Has Consented to Present a petition to the Mayor of Brooklyn, N. Y., praying for a relaxation of the city ordinances, which operate prejudicially to religious movements. Recently arrests have been made of young men for distributing cards and handbills, inviting young men to the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association. A few weeks ago a man was arrested for giving away a reprint of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, containing a notice of Dr. Pentecost's special services. The Mayor has also forbidden the Salvation Army to parade the streets. The petition which Dr. Talmage has waiting the signatures of all who desire to sign it, refers to both these vexatious city laws, and asks for their repeal.

The New York Young Men's Christian Association celebrated its thirty-third anniversary on January 25th. A crowded public meeting was held, in which Assistant-Bishop Potter, the Hon. Seth Low, and other distinguished guests took part. The work done by the association during the past year shows that the energy and activity for which its officers have long been noted has increased rather than diminished. The opening of the Young Men's Institute in the Bowery is alone a work to render the year memorable. That branch is doing a grand work in the heart of the city, right in the midst of rampant vice and degradation. Other branches of the association are also prospering. In the chief building on Twenty-third Street and Fourth Avenue, the year has been a busy one. The report read by Mr. McBurney, showed that 1670 secular gatherings were held, with an aggregate attendance of 72,003. The reading-room has been more numerously attended than in any previous year—by 127,065 or 405 a day. Into the reception-room for the various purposes of the association, including those visiting the reading-room, came last year 272,221, or 820 a day. Of these a considerable number were seeking employment. There were held in the building 1219 religious services, with an attendance of 49,834. In connection with these services, and through other agencies employed, young men to the number of 351—a much larger number than in any former year—received personal instruction in the way of life. The report of the Treasurer showed the receipts of the year to be $34,104.67, and the expenses $33,835.59. For the support of the work in the main building and various branches during 1886 he said that it would be necessary to raise $18,000.

GREECE IN PROPHECY.

The Grecian Movement—The Character of Turkey's Decay—English Intervention—Its Motives—Eventually Futile—The English Friend of Greece—A Newspaper Correspondent on the State of Turkey—The Exact Fulfilment of Prophecy.

ON Monday, January 25th, the cable brought the intelligence that Greece was threatening to declare war against Turkey, and had actually dispatched her fleet with sealed orders, its destination probably being some Turkish port. The significance of this intelligence to the student of prophecy consists in the fact that the enlargement of Greece at the expense of Turkey has long been seen to be an event necessary to the fulfilment of prophecy. The downfall of Turkey, as described in prophecy, is in the nature of atrophy, not conquest. The phrase used is "drying up" (Rev. 16:12), implying that Turkey would shrink by a gradual process.

For a long time it seemed as if the Sultan would fall before the gigantic power of the Czar, but students of prophecy never expected that such an event would take place. The sure word of prophecy indicated rather national death by a wasting away, a nibbling at her territory by her neighbors, internal weakness, and gradual decay, which was to be in an advanced stage at the time of the Great Tribulation. It also indicated that one of the powers to profit by the fall of Turkey would be Greece. She has not attained her ancient dimensions, and will not do so until her boundaries include Epirus and Macedonia, and the part of Thessaly still held back from her. When that is done, and Syria becomes a separate kingdom, Turkey will have shrunk to the size and exactly the area of ancient Thrace. A year ago, with Roumelia under her domination, the shrinkage seemed distant; but events are moving rapidly as the final consummation approaches, and scarcely has Turkey seen Roumelia slip from her grasp when she is threatened with a further loss.

ENGLISH INTERVENTION.

The ultimate success of Greece is assured. It may not be achieved now, and appearances indicate that it will not. The Marquis of Salisbury has threatened Greece with the castigation of England if she persists in fighting. He intimates that England, with the other powers which signed the Berlin Treaty, will not permit the fierce little Power to infringe the provisions of that treaty. There is more to be said in this matter for his policy than his principle. As a question of principle there is no more harm in Greece seizing the Sultan's territory than in the Prince of Bulgaria taking possession of Roumelia. Lord Salisbury consented to that arrangement, which was in contravention to the Berlin Treaty, and on the same principle he should permit Greece to run her sword through the document. In fact, on principle, Greece has a better right for action than had Bulgaria, because the diplomats at Berlin advised the Sultan to cede the territory which Greece now demands—advice which the Sultan disregarded. The diplomats wished, though they did not command, the cession, and Greece is therefore only carrying out their wishes. Lord Salisbury is inconsistent when he talks about principle in this case.

There are, however, weighty reasons of policy for his attitude. When he stood aside to allow Bulgaria to absorb Roumelia he was pleasing his sovereign, who, having taken a Battenberg into her family as the husband of her favorite daughter, in spite of the opposition of her friends and relatives, was delighted at seeing his brother, the Prince of Bulgaria, aggrandizing himself and becoming a power in Europe. But Greece has no friends at the English Court. It is true that the King of Greece is a brother of the Princess of Wales, but that fact does not recommend him to the favor of the Queen, but rather the reverse.

As Lord Beaconsfield at the Berlin Congress tried to thwart the course of events laid down in prophecy, so Lord Salisbury is moving in the same direction. He may succeed for this time, but in the end he will fail, and Greece will get the prize she covets. Her present demand is for the portion of Albania and Thessaly bounded respectively by the Kalama River on the northwest side, Janina on the north, and the Salembria River onward as far as Tempe on the east. In other words, for Macedonia, Epirus, and Thessaly. That she will eventually obtain these, prophetic expositors believe. Even now her case is not hopeless. England, which has taken the initiative in opposing her, may change her policy. The power now wielded by Lord Salisbury may pass into the hands of Mr. Gladstone, who is and an enemy of Turkey. Whether, if he were in power, Greece would be allowed to pursue her course cannot be certainly stated. As a statesman, he might feel it his duty to exercise a friendly restraint upon Greece for a time; but it is certain that, as a man, he would rejoice in the extension of the Grecian boundaries in the direction proposed. He has already, during his last term of office, proved his regard for Greece by voluntarily presenting her with the Ionian Islands formerly held by England. It is certain, too, that with him the Queen's wishes would not weigh, as they do with Lord Salisbury. In fact, his notorious unpopularity at Court is due to the indifference he has uniformly displayed as to whether she approved his policy.

In any case, whether Lord Salisbury or Mr. Gladstone directs the policy of England, it is manifest that the effort to prop up the Turkish power in Europe will fail. The Euphrates will be dried up—indeed, is drying up now—and the desiccation is far advanced. On December 28th last year the New York Times published a letter from a correspondent in Constantinople, who has exceptional opportunities for acquiring accurate information. In the course of his letter the correspondent said: "The recent events have shown strikingly that since the Russian War the decline of Turkey has been very rapid. Some months ago I called attention to the fact that Turkey was falling to pieces, and I mentioned many circumstances which justified me in arriving at such a conclusion. The events of the last month have shown that I rather under than overestimated the progress of her decadence. Turkey has no longer even such statesmen as she possessed in 1876. No department of the Government is so efficient as it was ten years ago. The signs of decay are everywhere. The machine of Government can hardly be made to go even at a snail's pace. The law courts are worse than ever. Corruption is general."

"Throughout the empire the Turkish population is decreasing at a rate which it is difficult to account for, while the Christian populations are increasing. An English consul told me that where, in journeying between the capital and his post, he had a dozen years ago passed through eighteen Turkish villages, there were now only twelve; that these twelve were smaller than they had previously been; that where there had been three or four mosques there were now only two or three. The Christian villages, on the contrary, were increasing in numbers and in population. In fact, the Eastern question is settling itself, and if a policy of 'hands off' could be maintained and Turkey left without external interference of any kind the inevitable result would ensue very quickly in Europe, and not very remotely in Asia Minor."

That is the opinion of a man upon the spot describing what is taking place before his eyes. Comparing his narrative with the sketch made of future events, as indicated by prophecy, by expositors who wrote long before this desiccation set in, the correspondence is remarkable.* It is the distinguishing characteristic of the sixth vial, under which we are now living, that it would witness the drying up of the Euphrates,

* It is a remarkable fact that the intelligence given by the Times of India, mentioned last week in these columns, that the literal river Euphrates is drying up, was anticipated twenty years ago. The Rev. M. Baxter, writing in 1866 ("Coming Wonders," p. 24), said: "Undoubtedly the actual river Euphrates will be really dried up during the fulfilment of these vials."

that "the way of the kings of the East might be prepared." Thus is the Word of God being fulfilled, and thus is decaying the once mighty power which holds in its powerful grasp the land given by the Most High to Abraham and his seed forever.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Wasp Preaching Good Tidings.—Mr. McKenzie remarked: "Naturalists tell us that when a wasp finds a plot of honey it does not eat by itself, but goes to the other wasps at once, and makes known to them the good news, that they may come and share the feast. So you see that even a wasp may bear good tidings. How much more should we bring others to drink of the water of life, of which we have so freely partaken ourselves!—for Christ has commanded, Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every nation."

Rescuing a Sinking Woman.—The Late Dr. McKay, of Hull, visited a dying woman, and when he asked if she were saved her reply was, "No, sir; I feel that I am condemned." "There you err," said the doctor; "you cannot feel condemned, you believe it; and if in the same way you would just believe that there is no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, and rest your soul there, you will then know that you are safe for eternity." The dying woman grasped at the truth as a drowning man clutches at a straw, and she died sweetly resting in Jesus.

Trying to Find the Break.—Mr. Jack Said: "A man who was the driver of a stage-coach some years ago was lying at the point of death. In his life he had listened to the Gospel many times, but always turned a deaf ear to it, till now it was too late. He began to work with his feet, as if he were in some desperate struggle, and a friend bending over the dying man said, 'What is the matter? Can I give you anything?' 'Oh,' groaned John, 'I am going down an awful incline, and I cannot find the brake!' 'Oh, friends, take warning! Behold, now is the accepted time, behold, now is the day of salvation.'"

Visit to a Mountain Cave.—Dr. Lindsay Related the following incident: "Years ago, when I was in Germany, some friends and myself once went up into the heart of a great mountain, where there was a cave, which we entered. It had a great many winding passages, and we would certainly have lost our way had it not been for our guide, whom we closely followed. Accustomed as our guide was to the cave, he, too, would have lost his way, so intertwined were those long passages, but I noticed when we started he had in his hand a large ball of string, the end of which he fastened on to an iron hook which was driven into the wall, and as we went on he unwound his string. But when he came to the end of it he dared not go further, and as we came back he wound up his string, and thus we were led to the light. Well, that string is like faith; get hold of it, and although you may unhappily wander away from the Lord, if you have a firm hold of that string it will lead you safely back to the light of God."

An Inebriate's Suicide.—Mr. Love Said: "I remember about twelve years ago a servant entered the breakfast-room, and informed me that a body had been found in the loch not far from the house. I was very grieved to hear the sad news, as it was I who caused the loch to be made. I inquired into the case, and went down myself to see where the man had come from. He had been under the influence of drink, and it had not been the first time he had tried to commit suicide. I had to take the widow and fatherless children under my care. The hand of the Lord was in it all. I cared for them until they were old enough to go into proper employment. Shortly afterward the mother died, and they were left entirely in my care. The eldest boy Duncan went to sea, and as time went on I lost sight of the other children, as they were scattered in different parts of the country. About a fortnight ago I was in the seaman's meeting, and at the close a fine looking young sailor, twenty-two years of age, came forward, and holding out his hand, he said: 'Mr. Love, do you not remember me?' But I did not, and he said: 'Do you not remember wee Duncan Ferguson?' Yes, the whole incident came to my recollection now, although I had almost forgotten it. I inquired for the others, who, he said, were all well; and, better still, all in the fold of the Good Shepherd. 'Ah,' I thought, 'how the Lord had been guiding them. In His infinite mercy He had removed the father who was bringing up his children in sin.' I thank God that He has blessed me in my efforts to bring these lambs to Himself."

A Meal with an Empty Spoon.—Mr. Love said: "I heard of a young minister who went to preach to his congregation one Sunday, and instead of preaching Christ to the needy people, he read an elaborately prepared essay. Many of God's own dear children went away mourning for the great lack of the Gospel in the discourse. In the afternoon, the minister went out to take a walk with a friend. On their way they passed a little cottage and they paused there, for they were attracted by the sound of voices within; as they drew closer they found that the humble inmates were doing their utmost to sing praises to the Lord, and the minister laughing sarcastically, remarked: 'The singing is poor enough, I wonder how they are going to manage the prayer?' So saying, he went forward, and looking through the little window he saw an aged man with hoary locks. It was indeed a touching sight as the old man knelt and raised his voice in prayer. The young minister listened eagerly to catch every word, and as the aged pilgrim was concluding his devotions, he said in a more fervent voice: 'O Lord, have mercy on the poor congregation that was fed this morning with a tin spin' (empty spoon)! The minister turned from the window; he had learned a lesson from that humble cottar which he never forgot."

A Demand from Alexander's Treasurer.—Mr. Dale observed: "One day Alexander the Great was out reviewing his troops, when his horse suddenly became alarmed at some object, and started off at a galloping pace. In vain did the rider try to stay his steed, but the frantic animal rushed on heedless of where it was going; a minute more and the emperor must be dashed to pieces. A soldier seeing his terrible danger rushed from the ranks, and caught the horse in time to save his commander. The emperor, looking at the young man who had saved his life, quietly said: 'Thank you, captain, go to my treasurer, and ask what you want.' The young captain at once went to the treasurer, and demanded a very large sum of money; but the treasurer refused, saying: 'I cannot give you such an enormous sum without having a letter to that effect from the emperor himself.' The emperor came himself to ask the reason of his command not being obeyed, and the treasurer naming the amount which was asked for, said: 'Sire, did you tell him to get so much?' The emperor looked much surprised, and said: 'No, but if the sum is not too much for the man to ask, it is not too much for me to give; give it to him at once.' Friends, if a fellow-creature could be so generous, how much more willing to give must the Lord be?"

An Adopted Waif's Sorrow.—A Child Was laid down by its unhappy mother at a gentleman's door-step in New York. The servant brought it in, and the family were called together to hold a conference as to whether it should be kept or sent to an institution. The children pleaded that the child should be kept. 'Well,' said the father, 'if it is kept it must be just like the rest of you, and be adopted into the family as our own child, and get the same portion as the others.' But still the children cried to keep the baby, and make it as one of themselves. So it was unanimously agreed, and the child was kept. When she grew old enough she was sent to a boarding-school with the rest of the children. She was very unlike them in her appearance. She had dark hair, and a dark complexion, while the others were very fair; and often she was asked by the children of the school if she was the daughter of Mrs. So-and-so? Soon it got abroad that she was not, and the poor little thing was often annoyed by being told that she did not belong to that family at all, that she was found on the door-step. One day, after being teased very much at school, she went home with tears in her eyes, and said: 'Mamma, am I your child?' 'Yes, darling, you are my child,' was the reply. 'Am I your real child?' she said. 'Yes, you are my real child,' said the mother, looking down into the little pleading face. But the child was not satisfied, and she said: 'Mamma, did you born me?' The mother could not say that, and her tender heart was full of compassion for the little one. How anxious was the child to know if she were really one of the family by birth. Friends, are you half as anxious to know if you are sons and daughters of God—if you are born into God's family? If not, seek it at once, for the Lord says: 'Ye must be born again.'"

THE CHURCH IN THE HOUSE.

[We learn from letters sent to us by subscribers in the West and South, and in some parts of Canada, that many of them live at a long distance from a place of worship—so far, indeed, that it is impossible for them to attend, except at long intervals. Other readers in the cities are confined to their homes by sickness, and are unable to take part in the services of the sanctuary. For the benefit of all who by any reason are precluded from worshipping God in public the following suggestions for a service at home are here offered. We are indebted for them to the Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D., whose sympathy is always quick to respond to the spiritual need of God's people.]

THE DISCOURSE.

[Then may be read the following short discourse. The reader may enlarge upon any sentence, or introduce other matter.]

Text: "More grace."—James 4: 6.

The favor of the Lord is grace. The soul that has a sense of that favor is like a flower in the light; it is beautiful [beauty-full] and graceful [grace-full]. The flower does not bring the sun to itself, nor give brightness to the sun. It is the sun which sends its light to the flower and gives beauty to the flower. The flower grows in beauty with more and more light.

So the Lord lifts on us the light of His face. He gives grace and glory. It all springs from His heart of love. That He has given any is a guarantee that He will give more. The rule is, "Whosoever hath, to him shall be given." "He giveth more grace."

Yes, more than we ask for. If the sun had not given to the flower until the flower asked for light, the flower had had no beauty. He first loved us and gave us His grace. This makes us desire and solicit more. But we never ask enough, because we do not know all our own necessities nor His willingness. But He giveth, is giving, more grace.

We need His grace, its assistance and inspiration. We are to resist carnal-mindedness and worldly-mindedness. His grace is more powerful than the devil, than the flesh, than the world. We need it every hour. He knows our need. He gives accordingly. "My grace is sufficient for thee" is said to each child of God, no matter how much tried. Do more sorrows, more trials, more tribulations come? He is giving more grace while they are coming.

Always more. We grow and need more. He gives more and prepares us to receive still more. We can never exhaust this fountain. "Lord, I am asking more," says my soul. "Soul, I am giving more," saith my Lord.

[After this a hymn or several hymns may be sung, as the family may find agreeable and profitable after which all may unite in thanksgiving.]

[The Lord's Prayer should be used somewhere in each service, and the service may be closed with the "Gloria" or other Doxology.]

AFTERNOON TALK.

[A service may be held and the following discourse read:]

THE HOME CHURCH.

By Lyman Abbott, D.D.

Your home ought to be a church. The home was God's first Church, the father and mother were God's first priests, and the first altar was a family altar. The most sacred of all Church services is the Lord's Supper, and this replaces the Passover feast, which was a family feast. The early Christian Church was cradled in the household, and in private homes the disciples met for prayer and praise. The universal Church, including all the faithful, is a household of faith, a great family whose Father is in heaven; the Church of the First-born above, our heaven, is our home. So the first paradise and the last paradise are both homes, and the home between ought to be like them.

Our children ought to learn all their first lessons of father and mother; and lessons of faith, hope and charity, lessons of reverence and penitence, lessons of prayer and praise, ought to be their first lessons. You would be shocked to go into a town and find in it no Church, no Sunday-school, no religious services. I heard the other day of such a town, made up of men who had resolved that they would have no preacher and no Gospel there. One man who had tried it for a year bore bitter testimony of the result. "I came out here," said he, "to find a place where there was no God. I have found it, and it is a hell." And he set himself to work to organize a Sunday-school.

How many families there are which are in just the condition of that town. As a family they are without God. No voice of prayer or praise ever goes up from the home circle. No child ever learns to look through the father on earth to the Father in heaven; through the earthly home to the home in heaven. It is pitiful to think how many children there are in the world, and even in this land of ours, who grow up in ignorance, not knowing how to read or write. It is more pitiful to think how many children there are who grow up not knowing how to pray or praise. May God grant that the series of services of which this is the first may help the father and mother who read these lines to establish a church in their house, or, if one is already established there, to make it richer in faith, and hope, and love; to set up in their household a ladder which rests upon the ground, but whose topmost round pierces the heavens, up which every night and morning the prayers run nimbly to God, and down which, more nimbly, come angels bearing blessings from His hand.

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Crisis in the Contest Between the President and the Senate on the subject of the nominations was reached on Friday, when a communication was received by the Senate from the Attorney-General. Mr. Garland wrote in response to a request for papers concerning the dismissal of an official in Alabama, and the nomination of his successor. He stated that he was instructed by the President to refuse to comply with the Senate's request, as it was "not considered that the public interests would be promoted by compliance with the resolution requiring the transmission of the papers and documents to the Senate in executive session." Whether a deadlock will result from this decision of the President is not yet indicated. Senator Platt, of Connecticut, however, appears to think that a compromise might be effected by the nominations being considered in open session, and he proposed a change to that effect. Senator Logan had previously moved for the same object and was defeated. It is believed that the President would consider himself bound to furnish the papers for the open session, but it might be inconvenient for any Senators who have been intriguing for nominations. It will be a good thing if the Senate is forced to this step in its desire to accomplish its object of discrediting the President. Publicity in this matter is greatly to be desired for many reasons.

Senator Sherman's Scheme for the Solution of the vexed silver question was introduced in Congress on January 28th. It provides for the suspension of the coinage of silver dollars, and authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to buy silver bullion in bars to the extent of not less than two million ounces, nor more than four million ounces, per month, at the market price. He is to pay for it with certificates which are to be receivable for customs taxes and public dues, and may be reissued. Similar certificates may also be secured by the deposit of standard silver dollars or gold coin. This scheme, Mr. Sherman points out, stops the coinage of silver dollars, which is what European nations have been waiting and wishing for us to do, and it provides for the continued purchase of silver bullion, which is what the silver men desire, although the amount to be purchased is not so large as some of them would like. This bullion is purchased, too, at its market value as at present, so that the silver men would lose nothing by the bill. If silver should rise in price the Government would lose, of course, but as it is already a large holder it would gain more than it would lose by the rise. Mr. Sherman's primary object is, apparently, to stop the compulsory coinage in the hope that a double standard will be agreed upon in Europe, and he suggests a ratio of eighteen to one.

Half a Million Dollars Toward the Cost of the monument to General Grant which it is proposed to erect in New York are appropriated by a bill favorably reported by the House Committee on Military Affairs on January 27th. It authorizes the President to appoint an officer of engineers of the army and five commissioners, who, with the Executive Committee of the Grant Monument Association of New York, shall expend the money under the direction of the Secretary of War. It is provided, however, that no part of the money appropriated shall be expended or drawn from the Treasury until the sum of $250,000 shall have been subscribed and paid into the funds of the Grant Monument Association and is available for the purpose of erecting the monument.

The Subject of International Copyright Occupied the attention of a Senate committee last week, and many celebrated authors attended to give their advice. Two bills on the subject are now before Congress. That of Senator Hawley is on the reciprocity basis, giving foreign authors the same protection in this country as their countries respectively give to American authors. Senator Chace's bill is on a different principle; it simply removes all distinctions between American and foreign authors, giving the latter the same protection as the former. There seems now to be a possibility of some arrangement being made on the latter basis, with modifications in the interest of American printers and publishers. If a satisfactory bill is passed it will remove a reproach from us as a nation, and will also operate to the advantage of our own authors, who are now competing under difficulties with foreign authors, owing to publishers being able to offer the works of foreigners to the public at less risk than the works of Americans.

A State Board of Arbitration to Decide Disputes between capitalists and workmen will, it is hoped, be organized in New York during the current session of the Legislature. It is urgently needed, and in view of the movement of the Socialists in Chicago, to which we referred recently, the importance of immediate action is clear. Any such movement as that contemplated in Chicago would naturally be duplicated in New York. It is stated that in France the arbitration courts have adjudicated on 28,000 labor disputes, and succeeded in settling 26,800 of them to the mutual satisfaction of the parties concerned. The State Commissioner of Labor Statistics has furnished to the Legislature a series of suggestions which are recommended by his own experience to guide them in their work. If the legislators act wisely they will attend to this matter at once, and have a bill ready for the Governor's signature before they adjourn. Every strike and lockout are so much capital to the Socialists.

The Hostile Apaches Have Consented to surrender, if a report received last week at Washington is reliable. It is stated that the long chase after them, which has continued since last May, came to an end in the Mexican mountains on January 10th, when the United States troops under Captain Crawford surprised their camp. Geronimo, the head chief, and Natchez, another chief, then appeared to make terms. They said they were utterly discouraged, and were tired of being hunted from rock to rock as they had been. Lieutenant Maus would consent to nothing but an unconditional surrender. The chiefs then agreed to meet General Crook at a point on the line between Mexico and the United States. They sent to the American camp as hostages Chief Nana and another chief, Geronimo's wife and child, and seven other squaws. The hostiles are said to be on their way to the place of meeting with General Crook, and expect to reach there this week. The party numbers twenty-two bucks, and is supposed to comprise all the renegades. They have prepared a written statement of their troubles and grievances which led them to leave their reservation. Unhappily, Captain Crawford fell in the encounter on the very day when the long pursuit ended in success. A mortifying circumstance in connection with his death is that he appears to have been shot by Mexican soldiers by mistake. It is supposed that his having Indians with him led them to think that the party belonged to the hostile camp.

The Defeat and Resignation of the English Government which took place last week was not a surprise to the public. The intimation given in the Queen's speech that coercion would be proposed for Ireland, and an explicit announcement by Sir Michael Hicks-Beach on the part of the Cabinet that such a measure would be introduced in the House of Commons on January 28th, alienated the Parnellites, whose assistance was necessary to the Government in any party division. The first division of the kind took place on January 26th, and as the Parnellites voted with the Liberals, the Conservatives were defeated by seventy-nine votes. Thereupon Lord Salisbury and his colleagues resigned. The question upon which the decisive vote was taken had nothing to do with Ireland. It was indirectly a motion for a vote of censure on the Government introduced by a friend and political colleague of Mr. Chamberlain, the Radical leader. It expressed regret that no measures were announced in the Queen's speech for the relief of the sufferers by the depression in trade and agriculture, particularly in regard to affording facilities to farm laborers, etc., for obtaining allotments of small holdings on equitable terms as to rent and security of tenure. The division rendered clear the disunion existing in the Liberal party. Lord Hartington, Mr. Gladstone's principal lieutenant, voted with the Conservatives against Mr. Gladstone, as did several other influential members of the Whig section. They belong to the great landholding class, and naturally regard such a suggestion as that made in the resolution as a step toward Communism.

Mr. Gladstone Has Been Requested by the Queen to undertake the Government. It is authoritatively stated that she summoned him with extreme reluctance. Her agent, General Ponsonby, attempted to induce Lord Hartington to accept the office, and it was promised that if he would accept, the Conservatives would support him. He would thus have received sufficient assistance with the ninety votes he could command in his own party to carry his measures by a narrow majority. He declined the offer probably thinking that a Whig Premier depending on Tory support would occupy an anomalous position not conducive to future advancement. Lord Hartington must be supposed to understand his own position better than any one else, but to onlookers it appears that he is unwise. The Liberal party, to which he belongs, is rapidly falling under the control of the Radicals of the Chamberlain type, and when it becomes thoroughly Radical Lord Hartington will find himself more in sympathy with the Conservatives than with the Liberals, and sooner or later he will be absorbed by the Conservative party, with Lord Derby, Lord Leigh, and other great landowners. Mr. Gladstone is now busy selecting his Cabinet. He, like Lord Salisbury, will hold his place at the option of Mr. Parnell, who, by carrying his contingent into the Conservative lobby on a division, can at any time force Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues to resign. The situation is humiliating to English statesmen. Mr. Parnell, by plaguing the English Parliament with a series of crises, may make it as willing to surrender the government of Ireland to him and his party as Pharaoh and the Egyptians became to "let the people go."

The Hostility of the German Government toward the Poles has been emphasized and explained in an important speech delivered by Prince Bismarck on January 28th in the Prussian Landtag. The Chancellor accused the Poles of disloyalty, and of setting other nations against Prussia. He stated that to remedy this the Government had determined to buy out all the real estate owned by Polish nobles in Prussian Poland and place German colonists on the land hitherto occupied by the expelled people. In order to make the colonization inure permanently to the benefit of the empire the colonists will be prohibited from marrying Poles. "The cost of the undertaking," he said, "will be about three hundred millions of marks (about $75,000,000), but the State will lose no more than ten per cent of this—a loss made necessary by the exigencies of the case, buying out an alien class and reselling to Germans—while the gain to the empire will be unmeasurable." The Chancellor concluded by saying: "As for me, I am ready to save my country, although it cost me my head and honor!" The declaration was doubtless intended for dramatic effect; Prince Bismarck's head is in no danger, and his honor is not coveted by any one.

The Greek Fleet Succeeded in Leaving Its harbor before the arrival of the English blockading squadron arrived. It is believed, however, that the fleet will make no attack on Salonica or any other Turkish port, as the English ships would immediately open fire on the Greek vessels. The Greek Government still persists in its refusal to disarm, and is hoping that the advent of Mr. Gladstone to power will reverse the English policy. The people of Athens, through a committee, have telegraphed to Mr. Gladstone as follows: "We place in your hands the Hellenic cause, with the firm hope that it will find in you a generous champion." Mr. Gladstone, in response, telegraphed: "Considering the authority attaching to the action of the Powers, both on general grounds and by reason of their intervention in the formation of the Greek Kingdom, I earnestly hope Greece will pause before placing herself on this occasion in conflict with their deliberate and united recommendation."

The Serious Illness of Dr. W. E. Boardman, of Bethshan, London, formerly of Philadelphia, was announced in a cable dispatch received on Friday last. It stated that he had been stricken with paralysis, and that his recovery, humanly speaking, was hopeless.

A Jewish Rabbi was Baptized, and Received into Christian communion on January 24th by the Rev. Jacob Freshman, at the Hebrew Christian Church, St. Mark's Place, New York. His name is Samuel Griess. He officiated at the Rivington Street Synagogue, and has supplied other pulpits. Mr. Griess, who is a native of Posen, Prussia, was graduated at the Jewish Theological Seminaries of Breslau and Berlin, and came to this city about two years ago. Up to within three months he has acted as a reader in various synagogues in this city and Newark, N. J. He clearly recited his reasons for embracing the Christian religion, closing his statement by saying: "I leave all friends and superstitions behind me, not knowing what the future may have in store for me, but trusting wholly in God." Then he was baptized, and subsequently congratulated by a number of Christian ladies and gentlemen who were present.

The Young Lady from Baltimore, Md., who recently joined the Sisterhood of St. Mary, at Peckskill, N. Y., is still resident with "the sisters." A letter we recently received from her father calls for an outspoken condemnation of the sisterhood. The difficulty he experiences in recovering his daughter is, that she has arrived at an age when the law allows her to decide for herself. Bishop Potter, though admitting that the proceeding is wrong, confesses that he has no power to interfere. The singular fact about the whole affair is, that the sisterhood, though connected with the Protestant Episcopal Church, appears not to be under the control of the bishop. The sisterhood may have the law technically upon its side, but we cannot understand a Christian society receiving and sheltering a daughter in opposition to the wishes of the parents.

A Hoax on a Physician was Played in Detroit, Mich., a few days ago. The physician was dining at his usual restaurant, when a friend casually remarked that he had seen a case that might interest him. It was that of a man who had no feeling in his right arm. "Paralysis, of course," said the physician. "No," said his friend, "the man can move it, he could not do that if the arm was paralyzed." The physician admitted the fact, and said he should like to see the case. He was conducted to the house where the man lived, and asked him several questions as to when he noticed the change first, etc. The arm was certainly dead the man said, the physician might stick a knife in it, and he would not feel any pain. He was prepared to pay a fee of $5000 if it could be restored. The physician was deeply interested, and wished to examine the limb. Then the joke having gone far enough, the man bared an artificial arm, and the physician retreated amid general laughter. He knew that he was powerless there. Many wonderful cures are reported in these days, but for those who are maimed in body, like those who are maimed in soul by sin, there is no hope in human science. He who touched the ear of Malchus and healed it (Luke 22:51), can alone recover the spiritually maimed and give them a new heart (Ezek. 11:19, 20).

The Heroism of a Railroad Conductor Saved a life recently in Kansas. The Leavenworth Times states that on the night of January 21st, when the Missouri Pacific train was snowbound a mile and a half from Council Grove, Kan., one of the passengers named Tallman broke his leg. The conductor of the train, John A. Brown, a humane and heroic man, was much concerned about the sufferer, believing that to leave him there meant certain death to the poor fellow, while to carry him might mean death to both. He determined to incur the latter risk, and tenderly lifting the disabled man, he set out in the face of the biting wind and blinding snow that drifted along the road. It was a herculean effort, and those who saw him go staggering along through the snow, bearing his living burden, thought he would never reach Council Grove alive. Yet in spite of the danger and terrible cold, Brown struggled courageously on until panting and nearly fainting, he deposited his crippled companion in a place of warmth and safety. Such a deed is worthy of the highest honor. The man who performed it proved that he had the noblest spirit that can possess a human being—the spirit of self-sacrifice for the good of another. It was that spirit in its infiniteness that filled the heart of Christ, and should rule the lives of all His followers (Phil. 2:5-8).

A Dangerous Journey was Undertaken by two young men on January 19th. They wanted to get to Rockland Lake, N. Y., from the opposite side of the river, and as there was no boat, owing to the river being frozen, they decided to walk across the ice. They left the bank, and were proceeding carelessly, when the ice cracked under their feet. They were a little frightened and stopped for an instant, and then resumed their journey. In a few minutes one of them broke through, and went into the water up to his neck. He threw out his hands as he went down, and grasped the edges of the broken ice, and by this means he kept himself from being drawn under by the current. His companion did not dare to approach too near the edge of the broken ice, for fear it would give way under his feet. He quickly took off his ulster, tore it through the back, and fastened the lower ends together, making a sort of rope. He threw one end to the submerged man, who grasped it, and was hauled out on the safe part of the ice. He was completely exhausted, and almost frozen. The two then made their way back to their starting-point. They must have regretted that they did not return when the cracking of the ice gave them timely warning, but they showed their wisdom in returning after the narrow escape they had of losing their lives. In spiritual matters men show more temerity. Warnings innumerable are sent to the impenitent, yet they seldom heed them (Prov. 29:1).

A Novel Invention Designed to Insure Greater safety at sea has been patented. It is called the megaphone, and is intended to enable a person to hear or carry on a conversation with people at a distance. It is constructed of two huge cone-shaped tubes, eight feet long and three in diameter at the large end, which diminish to an apex in the form of rubber tubes small enough to place in the ear. Between these tubes are two smaller ones, constructed in the same manner, but not more than half the diameter. By placing the rubber tubes in the ear and speaking through the smaller cones, the person can hear and be heard at a long distance, and it thus aids mariners in listening for the sound of breakers, or carrying on conversation with persons on shore, or on other vessels at a distance. It renders therefore a double service, aiding the ear as well as the voice. As sailors are aware, the combination is very important. It is so also in the Christian life. The believer in his difficulties often forgets to call upon his Heavenly Father for direction; but still more frequently he fails to hear the answer to his prayer (Ps. 81:7-11.)

Seven Brothers Lost Their Reason Recently in Missouri. A dispatch from St. Louis, Mo., states that on January 24th, seven raving maniacs of one family passed through that city on their way to the asylum at Jacksonville, Ill. The commissioner in charge of them said they were all the sons of a wealthy farmer recently deceased who lived in Hickory County. The acquirement of money seemed to be their highest aim in life, and the whole family of seven sons and five daughters deprived themselves of necessities in order to gain it. About three years ago a stranger visited their home, and, after convincing them that they could in a short time largely increase their wealth, induced them to invest their all in what proved to be a mythical silver mine in Nevada. After months of anxiety they learned that they had been imposed upon, and all seven of the brothers, upon the receipt of the news, immediately became afflicted with a violent form of insanity, which is the cause of their present trip to Jacksonville. Their second calamity was worse than their first. When men go mad or commit suicide through the loss of property, it is a clear proof that they have disobeyed God by setting their heart on the things of this world (1 Tim. 6:17).

A Skeleton was Found in a Hollow Tree in Georgia on January 18th. Three men who were searching for strayed horses in the woods in Milton County found themselves at a considerable distance from home when the sun was setting. They therefore resolved to camp out, and began felling an old tree for fuel. After some labor the tree fell, splitting open as it struck the ground. It was hollow, and as it fell apart the men were horrified to see within it a human skeleton. It was lying with its head toward the top of the tree. An old pocket knife was found in the bottom of the hollow stump. On the inside of the tree, about the height of a man's shoulders from the ground, were a few indecipherable marks cut into the wood, resembling letters or figures. On one side of the tree a small, round hole had been cut entirely through, about the size of a silver dollar. Both blades to the knife were broken off. The theory is that the poor wretch climbed into the tree to escape some enemy, either Indians or wild beasts, and then slipped, fell, and was a captive in a strange and narrow prison from which only death could release him. The tree showed the frantic efforts he made to cut his way out to freedom and to life. The utter powerlessness of the man to deliver himself from his terrible living tomb renders him a type of the whole human race, which must have perished eternally but for divine interposition (Rom. 5:6-8).

SMOKING FLAX.

An Evening Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"The smoking flax shall he not quench."—ISAIAH 42:3.

Jesus Avoiding Controversy—The Meaning of the Flax—I. The State Represented—A Little Good in it—Of Little Use—Darkness Visible—An Unpleasant State—The Smoke of Doubt—"I will Try"—Satan's Apprehensions—II. Souls in the Smoking Flax State—The Newly Saved—The Desponding—Smothered Life—The Tempted—III. Christ's Treatment—Kindness and Sympathy—Annual Portrait-Taking.

I BELIEVE that the first sense of these words is not the one usually given to them, nor yet the one upon which I intend to preach to-night. We read in the twelfth of Matthew that our divine Lord was assailed by the scribes and Pharisees, but He did not enter at that time into controversy with them, neither did He make them the perpetual target of His observations. Considering what hypocrites they were, and what boundless mischief they were doing, He treated them very gently indeed. They were, compared to Him, but as bruised reeds, and as the smoking flax, and He could, if He had pleased, have broken them up altogether, or have altogether quenched them; but He did not come to be a mere controversialist. He was, in truth, the greatest of all reformers, but He was not so much a breaker-down as He was a builder-up. He came not so much to drive out error by reason, as to expel it by the natural and efficient process of putting truth into its place. So, to a large extent, He left these scribes and Pharisees, and other opponents, alone, and He went quietly on with His own work of healing the sick, and saving the sinful—to us. We get a little pugnacious sometimes, and seek religious controversy; but our Saviour did not strive, nor cry, nor cause His voice to be heard in the streets; a bruised reed He did not break, and smoking flax He did not quench.

Usually these words are understood to mean that Jesus Christ will deal very gently with timid believers, and this meaning is not to be rejected; for, in the first place, it is true; and, in the second place, it is true out of this text also, for if our Lord Jesus in His lifetime was gentle even to hypocrites, how much more will He be gentle to sincere but timorous spirits; if it be true that He will not quench the smoking flax even of a Pharisee, how much more true must it be that the smoking flax of a penitent shall not be quenched! So that, if the text does not say what is generally understood by it, it implies it, and the words so clearly run into the meaning that is commonly given to them.

THE STATE REPRESENTED.

I. In talking of it, at this time, I shall first inquire, what state this metaphor represents. A smoking flax represents a state in which there is a little good. The margin is "dimly burning flax." It is burning; but it is burning very dimly. There is a spark of good within the heart. You, my dear friend, have a little faith; it is not much bigger than a grain of mustard seed, but faith of that size has great power in it. I wish that your faith would grow to a tree, but I am very glad that you have any, even though it be minute as the mustard seed. Having those desires, you do pray. "Oh, sir," say you, "it is not worth calling prayer!" Well, we will not call it prayer, then, but it is prayer; for sometimes, when not even a word is spoken, the desire of the heart is a most acceptable pleading with God. "Oh, sir," you say, "but I do not always desire alike!" I am very sorry that it is so. I wish you always had a strong desire after Christ. Still, you do desire. There is a longing, a desiring, a panting, a hungering, a thirsting; therefore, there is some little good in you. "Do not praise me," you say. Oh, no, dear friend, I will not praise you! I know that you would not like it, for you have a modest estimate of yourself, and like the publican you cry, "God be merciful to me a sinner." That tune suits you, does it not? I can see somewhat of good in you since you do not think well of yourself. If you did, we might think ill of you; but inasmuch as you even repent over your repentance, and feel as if your tears want weeping over, I am glad of it. Lowliness of heart is a grace very much despised in these days, but very much valued by the King of heaven. "To this man," says He, "will I look, even to him that is poor and of a contrite spirit, and trembleth at My word."

There is some little good in you put there by the Spirit of God. "Ah," say you, "I like that word, sir; I am sure there was no good in me by nature." Friend, I am sure of it too, if you are at all like me. The grace of God has put in us our first desire, our first loathing of sin, our first wish to be forgiven, our first desire to return to our Father from whom we have wandered. The Spirit put it there, and you are like the smoking flax, because there is a little living fire in you.

OF LITTLE USE.

You are like smoking flax, again, because your good is too little to be of much use to anybody. What could we do with a smoking flax if we had it here to-night, and the gas was all out? You would, perhaps, see a glimmer, but you would say, "It is not light, but darkness visible." I like a soul in darkness to find that darkness visible. There is a good point about that. Alas, you are such a poor timid creature, you could not comfort a child of God; you cannot even comfort yourself! You could not strengthen the weak, for you want all the strengthening for your own self. Yet I will tell you one thing you can do. When you meet with another poor soul that is like you, you can sympathize, can you not? You see, when bright and shining lights come near those who are dim, they are apt rather to shame them than to comfort them; but you will not do that. So far you may even help the despondent; at least, you will do so one of these days.

AN UNPLEASANT STATE.

Smoking flax, then, has a little fire, but it is so little that it is of small service, and, what is worse, it is so little that it is rather unpleasant. No one delights in the smell of a candle that is dying out. Smoking flax does not yield a sweet savor; neither does a Christian when he is in a mournful condition. There is a little good in him, but there is a great deal of wrong about him, and that wrong has an ill savor. Sometimes these smoking-flax people believe a great many errors. They do not hold the true and solid doctrine of God's everlasting love; they favor notions that are not scriptural; and error is never sweet to Christ, nor to any of His own people.

Besides, they have a great smoke of doubts. They doubt this, and they question that, and they suspect the other thing. There is nothing more obnoxious to our divine Lord than distrust of Him. It is a gracious act on His part that He puts up with it. One said to Christ, "If Thou canst;" and that was a shocking thing to say to an almighty Lord; another said to Him, "If Thou wilt;" and that was a shameful thing to say to one so kind; and yet He bore with them both. Doubting hearts will cry, "If Thou wilt, and if Thou canst," and do anything sooner than believe. This is to make an ill savor in the presence of the Lord Jesus Christ; for, though we may reckon our doubts to be trifling, they are no trifle to Him, but exceedingly grievous and provoking to His heart.

A dear sister came in after service this morning, and told me that she was fifty years old on the same day as myself, so she came to shake hands with me; and she added, "I am like you in that; but I am the very reverse of you in other things." I replied, "Then you must be a good woman." "No," she said, "that is not what I mean." "But are you not a believer?" "Well," she said, "I—to be." I got hold of her hand, and I said, "You are not going to tell me that you will try and believe my Lord Jesus Christ, for that means unbelief of Him who must be true;" and I held her fast while I added, "When your mother was about, did you say to her, 'Mother, I will try and believe you'? No, you would believe her because she was true; and I must have you believe Jesus Christ." She said, "Sir, do pray for me." "No," I said, "I am not inclined to do that. What should I pray for you about? If you will not believe my Lord, what blessing can He give you? What has He ever done that you should say, 'I cannot believe Him'?" She again answered, "I will try." I was not content till I had reminded her of the word, "He that believeth in Him hath everlasting life," and I pressed her to a full faith in the risen Lord. The Holy Spirit enabled her to trust, and then she cried, "I have been looking to my feelings, sir, and this has been my mistake." I have no doubt that she had done so; and a great many others are doing the same; and their doubts are just that horrible smoke which comes from smoking flax. Oh, ye poor doubters, believe the Lord Jesus Christ! To say, "I cannot believe Him," is to say in other words that He is a liar, and we cannot allow you to say that.

A LITTLE LIFE.

Dear friend, if you are like the smoking flax, there is something good in you; but that is so sadly little that there is a great deal that is trying about you; yet the Lord will not quench you. You are full of all sorts of fears; you are afraid of a shadow; you are trembling at nothing at all. Why is this? You are troubled when you ought to be glad, and you make your whole family sad when there is no earthly reason for it. May the Lord deliver you! Those that are highest in faith have tried to comfort you, and you have pulled them down, instead of their being able to draw you up. Come, friend, I would be as gentle as ever I can; my text bids me be so. I have no extinguisher for your smoking flax, for my Lord has said, "The smoking flax shall He not quench."

I must add one more thing about this state, and it is this, though the good of it is so little that it is of very little use to other people, and sometimes is very obnoxious, yet there is enough good in you to be dangerous in Satan's esteem. He does not like to observe that there is yet a little fire in you, for he fears that it may become a flame. If any of you were to see a man standing at the back of one of our public buildings, lighting his pipe, I will be bound to say that you would be half afraid of an explosion, for he might be applying dynamite. There are times when the smallest smoke would fill the bravest men with fear. Even so

"Satan trembles when he sees

The weakest saint upon his knees."

If he hears you groaning about your sin, he is frightened at it. "Oh," says he, "they have begun to feel; they have begun to mourn; they have begun to desire; they have begun to pray; and soon they will leave me." Let a farmer perceive a little smoke coming out of one of his ricks, and I am sure that he will not say that there is nothing at all in a smoking flax, but he will hasten to prevent a conflagration. So the little grace that is in you, dear friend, Christ sees, and He approves of it, for He knows the possibilities of it—how little faith can grow into strong faith—how the grain of mustard seed can become a tree, and the birds of the air may yet lodge in the branches thereof; and Satan also knows what may come of it, and he is moved to quench it if he can. We therefore, would encourage you, and fan your spark to a flame.

There is the first question answered. What state does this represent?

II. Secondly. When are

SOULS IN THAT STATE?

Some are in that state when they are newly saved—when the flax has just been lighted. Those that are to be received into the church to-night I welcome very heartily, but they are very newly lit, and some, perhaps, would have said, "Let them wait a bit." Ay, but then our Lord does not quench the smoking flax because it is newly lighted, nor will I. No place in the world is so good for the lambs as the fold. No place is so good for babes as their own home. No place is so good for young Christians as the church of God. So

LET THEM COME.

Being newly converted, they are strange to many things. You have made a host of discoveries. You find more depravity in your heart than you thought was there; you find enemies where you expected to meet with friends. All this is apt to damp your courage; but do not be cast down; for, though it be but a little that you are lighted, yet the loving Jesus will not quench the smoking flax.

Sometimes a candle smokes, not because it is newly lit, but because it is almost extinguished. I know that I speak to some Christians who have been alight with the fire of grace for many years, and yet they feel as if they were near the dark hour of extinction. But you shall not go out. The Lord will not quench you Himself, nor will He permit the devil to quench you. He will keep you alight with grace. "Oh," but you say, "I am so depressed in spirit!" Yes, some of God's best servants have been of a sorrowful spirit. Perhaps you are not well, or you have had an illness that has told much upon your nervous system, and you are depressed; and therefore it is that you think that grace is leaving you, but it will not. Your spiritual life does not depend upon nature, else it might expire; it depends upon grace, and grace will never cease to shine till it lights you into glory. Therefore be not cast down. You may think that your light will go out in eternal darkness, but it never shall, for the Lord Jesus Christ will preserve the flame.

Sometimes the wick smokes when

WORLDLINESS HAS DAMPED IT.

If some of you never have any holy joy, I am not surprised, for you are so taken up with the world, and so fond of it. The life of God is in you, but it is smothered. You are like an autumn fire out in the garden when they are burning the weeds; there is a fire, but all you can see is smoke. Yes, you smother up your piety with the things of this world, and no wonder that it smokes; but what a mercy it is that the Lord does not allow even you to perish!

At times a wick burns low because a very strong wind has blown upon it. Many men and women are the subjects of very fierce temptations. The place in which they live is a trial to them, and their natural constitution furnishes them with a host of temptations; and so the flax scarcely burns, but smokes and smoulders. We do not wonder that it should be so.

There are many other reasons why we grow dim at times—reasons, but none of them sufficient to be an excuse. If we were what we ought to be, we should be burning and shining lights always, and there would be no times in which we should be like the smoking flax; but then we are not what we ought to be, we fall short of the true standard, and we become feeble believers.

CHRIST'S TREATMENT.

III. I desire to finish with a word of promise. What does Jesus do with those who are in this state? He says that He will not quench the smoking flax. What a world of mercy lies in that word! Everybody else would quench us but Christ. I am sure that some Christians get into such a state that the most loving Christian friends find it hard to bear with them; and fear that such a state of mind cannot be consistent with grace at all. Thus your friend would give you over as lost. But Jesus Christ says that He will not do so.

He will not quench you, first, by pronouncing legal judgment upon you. He will not say, "You have broken My laws, and I have done with you." If He did, our only answer could be, "Enter not into judgment with Thy servant, for in Thy sight shall no man living be justified." If the Lord were once to come to that, He would quench us all. Not only some few of the tremblers, but the strongest among us must go to the wall. The Lord Jesus Christ has not come to condemn, but to save.

He will not quench you, dear friend, by setting up a high experimental standard. Certain deep divines will say, "You must have felt so much of this, and so much of the other, or else you cannot be a child of God." Who told the good man so? Who made him to be a judge? The Lord Jesus Christ does not quench even the feeble, faint desire, or the trembling faith of His servants, though they do fall far short of that experience which ought to belong to a child of God.

He will not judge you, dear friend, by a lofty standard of knowledge. I have known persons who have thought, "If that convert is not better instructed in the doctrines, he is no child of God." The Lord has some of His children whose heads are in a very queer state; and if He first puts their hearts right He afterward puts their heads right. But for you and for me to say that a man is not a child of God, because he does not know all that the advanced saints know, is a very wicked thing. I am sure that your little child, who cannot read or write, is pressed to your bosom, dear mother, with just as much affection as that brave son of yours who has just been winning the first prize at school. You do not say, "I will not love the little one because he is not a man;" or, "I will not love my little daughter because she is not grown up to womanhood." Oh, no! The Lord loves the little ones. If you can say, "One thing I know, whereas I was blind, now I see," you are taught of God. If you know these two things—yourself a sinner, and Christ a Saviour—you are scholar enough to go to heaven.

PROTECTION.

Come along, you little ones—you trembling ones! Be not afraid! Jesus will not quench you by any of these means. I will tell you what He will do with you; and that is, instead of quenching you, He will protect you. He will blow upon you with the soft breath of His love till the little spark will rise into a flame. He will bring to you kind friends, who shall tell you their experience, and try to comfort you. I should not wonder, my dear brother, that one of these days I shall hear you pray a strong, brave prayer; I should not wonder if you before long come forward, and make an open profession; and if you have done so already, I feel pretty sure that you will honor it, and grow stronger, till one day we shall say, "Who is that bold witness for Christ? Who is that burning and shining light?" He is the man who was once likened to the smoking flax. I have had the portraits of taken on their birthdays, from the first birthday till they were twenty-one. The first year the little fellows are sitting, two of them in one perambulator. At twenty-one they are doing nothing of the sort; they are men full-grown. Yet I can trace them all along, from the time when they were babes, till they became little boys, and then youths, and then young men. I should not have been pleased to have seen them wheeled about in the perambulator for twenty-one years. In that case, I should have thought myself a most unfortunate father. And so I do not want to have any of you remaining in spiritual infancy; we long to see you come to the fulness of the stature of perfect men in Christ Jesus. Life is precious, but we look for growth; a spark is fire, but we expect flame; grace is priceless, but we long to see it daily increased by going on unto perfection. Despise not the day of small things, but yet advance to greater things than these. Be comforted, but not self-satisfied; rest, but do not loiter.

The table of the Lord is spread, and it is a feast not for men alone, but for babes in grace. Come hither you that love the Lord, and you that trust Him, however feeble your trust. However faint your courage, come and welcome! My Lord's table is not for giants only, but for infants also. The viands are not strong meat, but bread and wine, fit food for the faint and feeble. Examine yourselves, ye sincere tremblers; but do not let the examination end in your staying away; but rather mark how the text says, "let a man examine himself, and so let him eat;" not so let him refrain from eating. Ho, you that hope in His mercy, your Lord invites you to His own feast of love! You may come and welcome. If you have come to Christ Himself by faith, come to His table, and remember Him to-night. The Lord bless you, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

THE PEOPLE'S BIBLE:

Discourses upon Holy Scripture, by Joseph Parker, D.D. It is a grand undertaking upon which Dr. Parker has entered. He calls it his "life-work," the thing which expresses his "supreme purpose and highest hope." As we turn the leaves of this volume we can understand his words. It is not, he says, a new translation of the Bible that the people need—not a merely grammatical exercise or a discussion of various readings and ancient authorities. It is a higher translation, and this higher translation is "such a rendering of the divine Word as will meet all human need, elevate all human desire, and sanctify all human endeavor; such a rendering as will show that everything has been provided for in the Bible that human life can ever need or ever hope for." With this conception of his undertaking in his mind, Dr. Parker commences his work, and the attempt to give it to the world in its entirety he may well describe as his "life-work." What greater or more useful thing can any man do than to show the people what is really in God's Word for them, and teach them that in this book there is exactly what they need in this day for guidance through this world and for eternal life?

The prevalent impression of the non-Christian world of our day is that the Bible is antiquated and useless for men living in the nineteenth century. Dr. Parker says in his introduction: "My conviction deepens that the Bible is the most modern of books—that is to say, it is the history of the very time that is passing over us; it contains every man's biography; it is full of the passion and tragedy, the love and sacrifice, which we know to be the substantial history of the day." It is to get the people to understand this, to see how perfectly the Bible supplies every-day needs, that Dr. Parker has set himself in this work, and practically to send them to the Bible for light and encouragement and help and comfort and anything else that in the vicissitudes of life they require.

Of his qualifications for the task it is better that we let one speak who knows him personally, and whose opinion will have its due weight with our readers. Mr. C. H. Spurgeon says: "Dr. Parker has begun a stupendous work in this People's Bible; but its accomplishment lies within the possibilities of his fertile mind, should life and health be spared. He condenses wonderfully, and throws a splendor of diction over all that he pours forth. His track is his own, and the jewels which he lets fall in his progress are from his own caskets; this will give a permanent value to his works when the productions of copyists are forgotten."

His method is, like everything Dr. Parker does, entirely original. He does not propose to make the book a critical or exegetical commentary, in the usual sense of the term. It is a pastor's commentary upon such portions of the Holy Scripture as are of obvious and immediate importance to the growth of the soul in divine wisdom. "It aims to bring all readers under the moral sovereignty of the sacred Book, so as to arm them against temptation, enrich them with solid comfort, and fortify them with the wisdom of God." His first effort, therefore, is to discover, if he can, "the governing idea or principal purpose of each book, and to exemplify that by taking ten or twenty or more instances which most strikingly illustrate the sacred writer's intention." Thus, Genesis is "a book of beginnings, beginnings of creation, beginnings of humanity, beginnings of family life, beginnings of disobedience; a kind of daybreak book; a wondrous dawn; an hour of revelation and vision. To get hold of this idea is to get a thorough insight into the Book of Genesis." Having shown what this dominant idea of a book is, he selects a number of passages from it which illustrate most strikingly the intention of the inspired writer. Upon each of these he comments, and at intervals devotes a few pages to suggestive thoughts for preachers on the foregoing section. At the close of the study of each sacred book he presents a panoramic view of the whole ground which he has previously gone over in detail.

This volume deals with the Book of Genesis and is complete in itself, as Dr. Parker promises that each succeeding volume shall be. The whole work will occupy twenty-five volumes, which will be published at intervals during the next two years. This first volume is perhaps the most interesting and valuable of all, because it contains an introductory chapter of fourteen pages on Inspiration, a subject which is perplexing many people at present owing to recent startling pulpit utterances. It is needless to say that Dr. Parker is a firm believer in the inspiration of the Bible, and that he triumphantly vindicates the claim of the Bible to be received as the Word of God. Dr. Parker's style is clear, epigrammatic, terse and vigorous. His book is consequently extraordinarily suggestive, a perfect mine of treasure for preachers and Sunday-school teachers. THE YOUNG LEPER.

THE Indian Witness, of Calcutta, publishes the following incident related by Dr. Phillips, of Midnapore, which occurred in his own experience when travelling among the Santals. Many sick and diseased were gathered around his tent waiting for him to give them medicine. Being wearied himself from a long walk, he sought an opportunity for rest before attending to them. An old man and his wife, accompanied by their son, however, pushed with earnestness through the crowd, and requested his help. Seeing their earnestness he listened to their story. It was that this their son had something the matter with him. What his trouble was they wished to know. The young man stood before him erect; a tall, stoutly-built man, with clear black eyes that looked straight in the doctor's eyes, as though proclaiming their possessor's pride in his own strength.

The doctor examined him, and found several spots on his body where the flesh was insensible. The fearful disease of leprosy had made that young man its victim, and the doctor felt obliged to tell him so. Instantly what a change!

Sobbing in anguish he fell at the doctor's feet, imploring help; some medicine, some remedy, be it what it may, to deliver him from his awful fate. No longer erect, the brightness gone from his eyes, a wretched, horror-stricken man. The cause of this change was that, before, he did not know of his disease; now he knew it, and it threw him into a paroxysm of anguish. This is but one leaf from the spiritual history of men. When men do not realize that they are sinners, they live in carelessness and pride; but when, by God's grace, the true state of the heart is seen and realized, former pride is turned to humility, thoughtlessness is changed to deep anxiety, and in anguish the soul cries out, "God be merciful to me a sinner!"

DEATH IN THE MINE.

THE towns which are built in the neighborhood of coal-mines are unhappily but too familiar with scenes such as those depicted in our illustrations. While there is abundant reason for every man to say: "There is but a step between me and death," and every man is aware, though he often forgets it, that at any hour, by accident on rail-train, in the street or at home, he may be hurried into eternity, the miner by his occupation is especially liable to sudden death. Again and again, within the past few years, the country has been shocked by the news that a large number of men have gone down in health and strength into a mine, and in a few hours have been brought up mangled and blackened corpses.

Such scenes were witnessed two weeks ago at Newburg, W. Va., where, on January 21st, an explosion of fire-damp cost forty lives. A reporter says: "One house out of every three in the town is the scene of mourning, and as one passes along the street from the telegraph-office to the mouth of the shaft he can hear the sounds of wailing, and at every few steps sobbing and anxious women can be met eagerly inquiring for the latest news from the mine, and fearing the worst while they hope that some words of cheer and encouragement may be given them. None who saw it will ever forget that scene of the helpless crowd that hung around the pit's mouth. Men, women and children were gathered there, pale, trembling, weeping, staring at the shaft, almost dumb with consternation. As I turned from the mine I heard voices of lamentation, women wailing and piercing the air with shrieks of agony. 'Ah, that is a sad case,' said a gentleman with me, 'a sad case.' The cries you hear are from two young women, brides of scarcely a month. The strong arms they leaned upon, the men they loved, are lying down yonder."

A few at a time the remains have been brought up, but it is only by the fragments of clothing or the contents of pockets that they are recognized. It is impossible for even wives and mothers to know their husbands and sons by their familiar features, burned and torn and disfigured beyond recognition as if they had been shattered by dynamite. May God pity the widows and orphans, and lead them and the men who have to face the perils of the mine to trust in Jesus, through whom alone they may have comfort and safety for their souls.

THE CLERGYMAN'S IDEAL LIFE.

ONE bright, clear winter's morning two men were walking briskly over the frozen snow in a rural district. One of them, Dr. Edwards, was a clergyman on his way to visit a sick man at a farm-house on the other side of the hill they were climbing. The other was his guest, Walter Margrave, a young man in whom Dr. Edwards was deeply interested as the son of a valued friend not long dead. The young man was now very wealthy, and only just returned from a prolonged sojourn in Europe. He went out an honest, intelligent, energetic American youth, and had returned a European exquisite, effeminate in dress, languid and affected in manner, and infected in mind with the ideas of European aristocrats. The clergyman was deeply sorry to see the change in him, and had induced him to accompany him this morning mainly for the purpose of trying to inspire him with better aims in life.

Dr. Edwards was a good walker, and his companion, unused to pedestrian exercise, had to cry a halt before the top of the hill was reached. Seating himself on a felled tree, he said:

"Do you make such excursions as this often?"

"Yes; I often go much farther," said Dr. Edwards. "My people are scattered over a pretty wide country, and I make a point of visiting any one who is ill."

"Must be a great bore, I should think."

"Not at all; it is a pleasure. If a visit will cheer a sufferer I am glad to pay it. Besides, one may do good, you know."

"But it is all honorary," said Margrave. "I could understand your doing it if you were a physician and there was a fee waiting for you, but you would be just as well off in pocket if you stayed at home."

"Of course. There are other rewards, though, than those that go into the pocket."

"Well, I should not like the life. There must be very little pleasure in it!"

"What kind of life would you like, Mr. Margrave? Come, you have the world before you, and have a wider field for choice than most young men; what is your idea of a good life?"

"I should find it difficult to answer that question. I find everything bores me. I avoid all exertion that I can, but even the pleasures that seem pleasant at first become a labor later on. Life is a bore. I doubt if it is worth living."

"It is not, if your object is only to enjoy yourself. If you live for others it is well worth living."

"Ah!" said Margrave, "that is well for men of energy and enthusiasm, but I have neither."

"Yet there is enough sorrow and misery in the world to kindle it, and you, as a man of wealth, have the encouragement that you can relieve so much of the world's woe that you have another incentive."

"I am not a philanthropist, so the incentive fails with me."

"What are you, Mr. Margrave?"

"A mere idle, pleasure-loving man, I expect, would be a fair description of me."

"I am sorry to hear it, because you have responsibilities that an idle man cannot discharge."

"Of what nature? My time and my money are my own, are they not?"

"Certainly; and the fact that you can do as you choose with them renders you responsible. God will ask you some day whether you used both as you should."

"I do not see that any one has any claims upon me. If I pay for what I buy and reward people who work for me the world and I are quits."

"That is rather a low view to take of duty. Where would you and I have been to-day had all men acted on the same principle? We live in a free land, but the freedom was purchased for us by men who bled and died to buy it; even your money was accumulated through the labor and self-denial of your father, who worked and saved to win it for you. Don't you see that we are all profiting by the self-sacrifice of others, and their example ought to have its weight with us? I say nothing of the Saviour, who gave His life to labor and poverty, and at last died to save a world. Depend upon it, self-denial and self-sacrifice are duties, and their reward is sure."

"What would you have me do, then?"

"I would prefer leaving you to find your own line of action. The first thing is to get hold of the principle, or rather to let the principle get hold of you. When once that is done you will find your work. You need not go a stone's-throw from your own door to find men condemned to a life of poverty who might become happy and independent by the timely loan of a little capital. Others there are who are sick and will die if no hand is held out to provide a physician or to pay little sums due for rent or food—debts the consciousness of which gives the fatal force to disease and depresses the spirit so that recovery is hopeless. There are widows who are struggling who might be aided to start boarding-houses or some little business; girls working for a pittance on which they cannot support themselves, and hesitating whether they shall sell their virtue for the money they need so badly for food or perhaps for the support of an aged parent depending upon them. Oh, there are innumerable ways of usefulness open to a rich man who wants to serve his generation."

Dr. Edwards Explains Self-Sacrifice to the Exquisite.

Her cry aroused the unconscious man, and he opened his eyes. In a faint voice he begged that the doctor might not be summoned. "I am not seriously hurt," he said, "I shall be all right in a few minutes."

Mrs. Vane gave him water and held her smelling-salts under his nostrils. It surprised her, agitated as she was at that moment, to think how deeply interested she was in this stranger. True, he had interposed to save her from violence, and it was through his interposition that he had been hurt. That alone would have compelled her sympathy, but it did not fully account for it. It had a personal warmth with which gratitude had nothing to do. She could not analyze the feeling, but was conscious that she was watching the man's recovery with a solicitude she had never before experienced toward a perfect stranger. She was drawn to him by some subtle influence she could not understand, and now and again she was almost startled when he spoke quickly, under some sudden impulse, by a tone that stirred her memory like a tune now almost forgotten, but once very familiar. She looked earnestly at him, but could not recognize him or remember that she had ever seen him in any of the places she had visited. His full beard concealed much of his face, but across his forehead was a deep scar from some dangerous wound healed long ago, which was so conspicuous that, once seen, it alone would always identify the face, though years might elapse before it was seen a second time. No, she did not know him, and it must be her own imagination that made his voice seem familiar in her ears.

The man was right about his injury; it was not serious, and in a short time he rose to his feet and seated himself in the chair he had occupied before Stephen Vane was announced.

"I am afraid I have given you a bad scare, Mrs. Vane," he said. "I am ashamed to have caused your agitation. The man has the strength of an ox, and I am little accustomed to violence. In my profession we have to do with desperate criminals occasionally, but we usually take care to have some members of the regular force within call for the rougher part of the duty."

"Do not apologize," said Mrs. Vane. "I trust you are not hurt. Would you like to lie down for awhile? Merton will take you to his room."

"Oh, no! It is quite unnecessary. Besides, I must take immediate steps to capture the man. It should not be difficult to trace him now, but every hour that he is at liberty favors his escape. I presume that you wish me to proceed? I am entirely in your hands in this matter. If you wish it, I will abandon the pursuit entirely. The option is with you. That is an advantage you do not have in dealing with the regular police force. With them, you cannot legally retire from the case. It is taken out of your hands, and the State becomes the prosecutor. You become merely an informer assisting it in the detection of a crime. You are bound to render all the assistance in your power. With

"But that involves so much trouble and worry."

"Yes; it is not easy. There would be no glory in it if it were. But what a grand life it is! It is the life of a man. A life of self-gratification is the life of—well, I won't say what it is, but I hope you will not live it."

Margrave sighed. If he could have the blessing without the exertion he would, he felt, be glad to have it, even at the cost of money. "I will think of it," he said. "I never took that view of my duty before." He did think of it for some time afterward, but it was idle thought which led to nothing. He went the way of other rich men—of him who went away from the Master "sorrowful," having "great possessions." With all the charities and religious institutions indebted to the wealthy for great gifts, the time has not yet come when those to whom God has given wealth have learned their duty in using it.

A FATAL FRAUD.

AN ORIGINAL SERIAL STORY. BY LEW VANDERPOOLE.

A Crafty Check.

It was some minutes before the detective, Smith, recovered consciousness. Mrs. Vane bent over him anxiously, fearing that the injury he had received in protecting her was a fatal one. The deathly pallor of his face alarmed her, and she called loudly to Merton to go for a physician.

me, you are dealing with an employé of your own, and can dispense with my services at will. I mention this because I thought you showed some reluctance in giving your husband up to justice. I can understand that feeling; it is very natural."

"It was only momentary," said Alice, "and it has passed away since I realized how violent and base the man is. If he had shown contrition or the slightest remorse, I think I should not have voluntarily moved against him. I could never have lived under the same roof with him again, or regarded him as my husband, except in law; but I would not have tried to prevent his escape. But now that he has displayed so much effrontery, and seems capable of committing other crimes, it is my duty to aid in bringing him to justice."

"You are quite right, madam. I am sure it is your duty. It is not many ladies who would have so clear a perception of it. Is there anything more that you can tell me about him that would be likely to help me? Do you know any of his intimate friends, for instance? Is there any one who would be likely to shelter him and help him to escape?"

"No, I can tell you nothing of that kind. Since we have lived here he has appeared anxious to live a separate life from mine. I have known nothing of the places in which he spent his time when away from home. He has not given me his confidence, and I have not sought it. I have had, to tell you the truth, an instinctive dread of knowing much of his habits and haunts. I knew that the knowledge would be painful, for he has an incurable propensity to dark and evil ways. I had my dear father by my side, and it was to him rather than to my husband that I looked for help and guidance."

"Then you have told me everything?" said Smith, looking at her earnestly and intently.

"No, I have not," said Alice. "I do not think I could tell you everything now. It may become necessary at some time, but not now. Many years ago—nearly twenty—when I was recovering from a severe illness, and was weak in body and mind, he induced me to become his confederate in a fraud. That secret I have kept, though its disclosure would not cause me any inconvenience. I did not aid him actively; I was simply silent when I ought to have spoken. At that time it seemed the best thing to do, but it was wrong, and I have been punished heavily for it. I have never ceased to regret my conduct, and now I mourn it with bitter remorse. That is all I can tell you about it at this time. If you knew all it would not aid you in this matter."

"Well, madam, I am glad to know so much. Some day, perhaps, you will understand that the confidence you have given me is a very welcome one. I will do my utmost to serve you, and I cannot serve you better than by capturing the man who has caused you suffering, and is ready to cause you more if he is not caught. Naturally, his object, if he remains at large, will be to establish some new claim upon you. He will want to intimidate you in some way; to frighten you with some threat by which he can make terms with you, and purchase your silence and help in money matters. That is, if he is a smart rogue, and that is what I take him to be."

"No, he is not that. He is remarkably dull and stupid. He has plenty of animal courage, but he has little skill to make a plot. Even the fraud of which I spoke just now was not of his own devising. We were in Italy at that time, and it was one of his Italian friends who conceived the wicked scheme. He admitted that to me with his own lips."

"Oh! that is his line, is it? Then we may expect that he has secured some American successor to his Italian friend. Well, he can find one, if he has not done so already. Every land has its scheming criminals, and America is no exception to the rule. We have one encouragement, however. The smartest scheme always has its weak points. It is astonishing how often they are detected. I have seen plots laid with the most consummate skill, apparently perfect in the minutest detail, come to grief by one oversight so simple and obvious that a child would scarcely have failed to see it. It seems like fate."

"I would rather call it Providence," said Alice. "God is not on the side of the wrongdoers. It seemed so to me once, but I see better now. Fraud of all kinds and crime He abhors, and it is He that causes them to be imperfect."*

"Perhaps you are right, Madam. I don't know much about religion myself, but I have a great respect for religious people. They are always straight people to deal with. I am glad to find you are a Christian lady."

"Oh, how I wish I were!" Alice thought. "Godliness would have kept me from all this misery."

"I will go now, Madam," said Smith; "but I will see you bright and early in the morning. I hope I shall bring you good news, too."

Wearied and distressed, Alice went to her own room expecting to spend a wakeful, miserable night. She was just commencing to undress, when a light tap at her door startled her. She opened it, and there stood Myrtie, her beautiful long hair falling in a rich stream over her white night-robe.

"Mamma, would you like me to sleep in your room?" she said. "You are so distressed that I thought perhaps I could comfort you."

"That is very thoughtful of you, Myrtie. I am very grateful to you. I need all your love, my child, in my trouble, but I think I am better alone to-night. I shall not forget your kindness, my dear."

"Can I not help you in any way, Mamma? I am not a child now. Tell me all about this horrible trouble. I will be quite discreet. No one shall know anything you want kept secret."

"I cannot, my child, I cannot," and the distressed mother rested her face on her daughter's shoulder and wept. "You have already comforted me more than you can imagine by coming to me. I cannot confide in you to-night. I fully trust you, my dear, but it would agitate me too much to tell you the story now. You shall know all some day; you ought to know that it may be a warning to you."

"A warning, Mamma?"

"Yes, love. If I had loved God when I was your age, and been faithful to Him, I should not have been miserable now, and have caused misery to others. I tried to manage my own life, and I have ruined it. Whatever you do, Myrtie, do let God guide you, and try to do His will. Never be induced to marry a bad man simply because you think you love him. Sin surely brings misery. Never forget that, Myrtie. Now, good-night, dear. Go back to your room." Mrs. Vane watched the slight, lithe figure of the girl as she walked slowly down the corridor to her chamber in the other wing of the old mansion, and thought of herself at Myrtie's age. She was much like her in appearance, except that Myrtie was so thin and slight, though she was tall and graceful even beyond what Alice Grey had been.

The mother knelt and prayed for her before she retired to rest, pleading earnestly that God would give her child a new heart and lead her in the right way. For herself she seemed unable to frame any petition but that of the publican of old, "God be merciful to me, a sinner." Finally she retired, and, contrary to her expectation, slept long and heavily. Her physical nature, wearied out, asserted its sway, and her troubles and anxieties were forgotten in a blissful oblivion.

It was late the next morning when Mrs. Vane was awakened by a servant, who informed her that Myrtie was missing. She had gone to her room to awaken her, and had found it in disorder, the window open, and Myrtie absent. The girl thought that perhaps the young lady had gone out for a morning walk, but on looking around she saw that all her clothing was still in the room, except her large waterproof cloak and a shawl. The servant also said that Mr. Smith, the detective, was below waiting to see Mrs. Vane.

* "He disappointeth the devices of the crafty, so that their hands cannot perform their enterprise."—JON 5: 12.

Alice dressed hurriedly, and sending for Smith to join her in Myrtie's room, hastened thither herself.

"This tells the story," the detective said, as he picked up a handkerchief from the side of the disordered bed and smelled it. "This is chloroform. The young lady was drugged and carried away unconscious."

"Here is a letter addressed to you, Mother," said Merton, who had followed the detective into the room and saw the letter lying on the toilet-table.

His mother took it eagerly and broke the seal. The envelope contained a large sheet of paper which was closely written. It was from Stephen, and, as she read it, the expression of her face underwent constant changes, as if she was suffering the most intense torture.

As she finished reading, her right hand closed tightly over the letter, and she stood motionless and apparently breathless, as if frozen with terror.

After waiting until his head seemed bursting, Merton asked her what the matter was. His voice broke the spell.

"O God, have mercy upon me!" she exclaimed, and then fell to the floor.

They picked her up, and, placing her on Myrtie's bed, soon had her restored to consciousness.

The moment she opened her eyes she asked where the letter was.

"In my pocket," replied Smith. "Do you want it?"

"Not now. Keep it, please, for the present."

Merton asked what there was in the letter which had so affected her.

"I cannot tell you quite yet," she said, "but you shall know all soon. Oh Merton, Mr. Smith—neither of you can imagine what I am suffering! I wonder if this thing will ever end?"

And then, as if some fresh recollection of what the letter contained had startled her anew, she suddenly sprang from the bed and continued:

"That man—that wicked, desperate man—must at once be followed and hunted down, or he will add another to his already long list of crimes."

"Is the young lady in such great danger, then?" asked Smith. He was much agitated.

"He threatens all manner of violence against her, and declares that he will kill her outright the moment he discovers that he is being pursued."

"But, Mother," interposed Merton, "you are getting nervous and unnecessarily excited. You entirely forget one thing which should offer you much consolation in this trying moment. Myrtie is his own daughter, and—"

"She is not his daughter!" interrupted Alice, with a wild cry.

Smith turned as pale as death, and Merton passed his hand swiftly over his eyes, as though trying to assure himself that he was not asleep and dreaming it all.

"Not his daughter!" He repeated the words in a dazed sort of a way. "Isn't she my sister, then?"

"No!"

Merton sprang forward and caught her by the arm.

"Mother, are you mad, or—am I?"

"I shall be mad soon unless something happens, though I think that we are sane enough yet."

Smith had regained his self-possession by this time, and was walking slowly and thoughtfully up and down the room.

"Mother," said Merton, "you know that I have always loved you and revered you above all the world—yes, next to my God, and now by that love I implore you to tell me what your strange words mean. While they seem capable of but one construction, I cannot accept it. I respect you too much. Do explain; I do not wish to come to any rash conclusion which I may afterward have reason to regret."

For a moment their eyes met, and then, seeing how cruelly unjust was his suspicion, he sank at her feet with a moan, and catching her hands in his he kissed them. She raised him to his feet and unclasped his hands.

"Merton," she said, "those who bear the name of Vane have made me suffer much, but none more than you. I can easily forgive you, though, since your unkindness was not wilful, and my words, perhaps, justified you in thinking harshly of me. For the present, however, I can make no explanation to you, since it might defeat the ends of justice, and prevent my doing my duty, not only to Myrtie and to my dead father, but to you. Will you trust me blindly, then, and grant me the assistance which you alone can give, or is your faith too much shaken?"

"My faith in you is the same as of old," he hastily rejoined. "My suspicion was only momentary, and I will prove how bitterly I repent it by subjecting myself entirely to your will."

She smiled and kissed him.

HANDWRITING ON THE WALL.

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 14, Dan. 5: 1-28. Golden Text, ver. 27. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

God's Dealing With the Babylonian King—Smitting With Insanity—His Adoration and Pardon—Belshazzar's Character—The Redemption of the Body—The Sacrilege at the Feast—The King's Terror—Daniel Summoned—His Message—The Interpretation and Fulfilment.

God loves the world, but more especially He loves His children, and all who stand in any near relation to His children are more markedly dealt with by Him. A Christian parent will naturally pray for the head of a school where his own children are being educated more than for any other person who may hold the same responsible position, but who bears no such relation to his children.

God's people were in Babylon, and the grievous defection of so many of Judah's kings did not wear out God's longsuffering; He began to work on the kings of Babylon just as He had done on the Egyptian kings when His people were in Egypt. Nebuchadnezzar's insatiate pride had met with a blow when God had delivered His servants from the burning fiery furnace and diverted the attention of the assembled multitude from the golden image and from the king to the Almighty God. But the king needed a deeper lesson still, and while he was one day exulting in his greatness and his power, a voice from heaven stopped him, announcing that his very reason should be taken from him; and that hour the majestic King of Babylon was driven from men, and became as a beast of the field during seven years. After that, while still insane, he lifted up his eyes unto heaven and gave glory to God, and then at the same time his reason returned to him, he became really converted to God, and lived to testify for Him.

Belshazzar, who seems to have succeeded Nebuchadnezzar, was a licentious, self-pleasing prince, who seems to have dispensed with the valuable help of such a counsellor and minister as the prophet Daniel. While ambition and the love of power were the special sins of his grandfather, it would seem as though sensuality were the chief besetment of Belshazzar. There is something very piteous in a man's making himself a slave to depraved and sinful appetites, and so degrading the body which was created to be the dwelling-place of God. Yet, thank God, our body, as well as our soul, was redeemed by Jesus, and God's Word tells us "the Lord [is] for the body" (1 Cor. 6: 13). We have as much right to claim redemption from depraved appetites as redemption from the condemnation of sin. "The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus from the law of sin and death" (Rom. 8: 2). This is true for all who yield themselves fully up to God and claim Him for the body. But Belshazzar just plunged on deeper into dissipation, and did not seek to have at his court the man who had been made such an unspeakable blessing to Nebuchadnezzar. He is introduced to us in the very act of carousing at a feast given to a thousand of his lords. What an example for them! Instead of elevating them and leading them into a life above that which they were leading, he only led the way into shameful excesses, and went so far as to call for the golden vessels which were brought from the temple at Jerusalem, that he, his princes, his wives, and his concubines might drink wine in them, thus adding blasphemy to debauchery. "They drank wine, and praised the gods of gold, and of silver, and of brass, of iron, of wood, and of stone." It was a practical insult to the God of heaven, of whom Belshazzar must have heard concerning his grandfather's dream, the fiery furnace, and the madness and subsequent conversion of his grandfather. It was at the same time an insult to Daniel, who was living in retirement in Babylon, and meant as much as an open defiance to him and to any holy counsel he might give.

THE KING'S TERROR.

But those vessels had been consecrated to God, and sanctified to His service. "Thou shalt take the anointing oil, and anoint the tabernacle, and all that is therein, and shalt hallow it, and all the vessels thereof, and it shall be holy" (Ex. 40: 9). How would God regard this desecration? "In the same hour came forth fingers of a man's hand, and wrote over against the candlestick, upon the plaster of the wall of the king's palace, and the king saw the part of the hand that wrote." The greatest blasphemers are the greatest cowards; the king could go any length in insulting God so long as He did not appear upon the scene. But whose was that hand, writing in clear characters upon the wall? The Owner of those vessels which the king had desecrated. Belshazzar was the picture of terror, his countenance troubled, every joint loose, his knees shaking together in sight of his thousand lords, his wives and his concubines. And then, in his terror, he cried out to bring in all the wise men of Babylon, with a grand promise of honor and power to him who should be able to interpret the mysterious writing. It was in vain, the writing was divine; it took the Spirit of God to read it. The king's terror now rose so high that his lords were as much astonished at him as at the writing on the wall.

DANIEL SUMMONED.

There was one man in Babylon who could understand communications from the living God, one man who was always in His presence; and the queen (probably the mother or grandmother of Belshazzar) was acquainted with Daniel, and consequently was not among the revellers at the feast. Hearing of the mysterious writing, she came into the banquet-house and declared that Daniel, the former master of the wise men of Babylon, could explain the writing. She was, perhaps, one of a few over whom the prophet still had influence in the city. Daniel was brought, and the king made a long speech as to the reputation of Daniel, the failure of the wise men of Babylon, and the reward which would accrue to him if he could read the writing. Belshazzar acted on the assumption that Daniel possessed self-contained power and wisdom; he did not see God in the matter. And so it is with many who ask other Christians for prayer, counsel, or healing. They think there is in them a something which they can command, and they have not yet learned that "power belongeth unto God" (Ps. 62: 11).

Daniel was not to be bought with gifts. "Let thy gifts be to thyself, and give thy rewards to another; yet I will read the writing unto the king, and make known to him the interpretation. Daniel then declared what had been God's dealings with Nebuchadnezzar: "The Most High God gave Nebuchadnezzar thy father a kingdom, and majesty, and glory, and honor . . . but when his heart was lifted up, and his mind hardened in pride, he was deposed from his kingly throne, and they took his glory from him . . . till he knew that the Most High God ruled in the kingdom of men, and that He appointeth over it whomsoever He will." It was not the first time that Daniel had acted as chaplain to a king, and he was as faithful to this king as he had been to his grandfather. "And thou his son, O Belshazzar, hast not humbled thine heart, though thou knewest all this; but hast lifted up

THYSELF AGAINST THE LORD OF HEAVEN."

Here was the root of his sin; himself was set up against God; he would have what he wanted for himself at any cost to God. This is the sin of every irreligious sinner. There are some, like Saul of Tarsus and Cornelius of Cesarea, who try hard to serve God while still unsaved, and their will is on the Lord's side. But there are others who say, "With our tongue will we prevail; our lips are our own; who is Lord over us?" (Ps. 12: 4). They lift up themselves against the Lord of heaven. "And they have brought the vessels of His house before thee, and thou and thy lords, thy wives and thy concubines, have drunk wine in them; and thou hast praised the gods of silver, and gold, of brass, iron, wood, and stone, which see not, nor hear, nor know: and the God in whose hand thy breath is, and whose are all thy ways, hast thou not glorified." No doubt many of the half-drunken aristocracy of Babylon had heard Belshazzar congratulate himself that he was not under the thumb of a captive Jew, or something to that effect; but it was no accident when God chose that very captive to utter such a reproof, before such a company, and on such an occasion. When God wants to do a thing neither persons nor circumstances hinder Him; He sends down His hand from above; He works out of reach of men to hinder.

"Then was the part of the hand sent from him, and this writing was written . . . Mene; God hath numbered thy kingdom and finished it." Babylon was to be no more mistress of the world, Belshazzar was to reign no more. "Tekel; thou art weighed in the balances and found wanting," therefore rejected as counterfeit. Oh how many are there among my readers who, if tried in the balances would be found wanting? God has given us a kingdom in our own homes, or where we work, in the circle where our influence reaches. Are we coming up to His measure? Is our heart right with God? Do we know He has cleansed us from all sin, and is He keeping us moment by moment, so that we are not afraid to say, "Lord, Thou knowest"? Oh how many know they are wanting, and yet continue with an ever-condemning conscience! Oh how much better to come squarely out and have things set right with God! "Peres; thy kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes and Persians." Belshazzar persisted in rewarding Daniel, and proclaiming him third ruler of the kingdom, which that night was to fall into other hands—a poor honor, like the cheque of a bankrupt—and that same night the unhappy man fell, slain in his resistance to the conquering Medes, who took the kingdom. Such is the end of a man who lifts up himself above the God of heaven. "So teach us to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom" (Ps. 90: 12).

DEPENDENCE.

"Hold up my goings in Thy paths, that my footstep slip not."—Ps. xvii. 5.

Thou only knowest, Lord, how frail and weak
Is every step I take, each word I speak;
How all is failure—that I cannot stand,
Except Thou hold me by Thy gracious hand!

Yet since the longing of my heart for Thee
Is but the echo of Thy love to me,
And since it is the hungry Thou dost feed,
The weary-hearted Thou dost gently lead;

Since 'tis the thirsty Thou dost satisfy
With living water, and the weak supply
With strength, on Thee my utter need I rest,
Through deepest poverty most richly blest.

And if Thou only hold me close to Thee—
Yet closer, closer yet—then sweet will be
The pressure of Thy hand, and great the gain
Of every danger, and of every pain,

Which makes my soul Thy strength in weakness prove,
And lean more wholly on Thy precious love.
My Lord, I thank Thee that I cannot stand
One moment, safe without Thy loving hand!

THE MISSIONARY JUBILEE IN FIJI.

The Fiji Islands—The First Two Missionaries—The First Convert's Speech at the Jubilee—A Band of Young Fijian Preachers Bound for New Britain.

REV. ARTHUR J. WEBB, whose successful efforts for Christ are well known to those who take an interest in foreign missionary enterprise, and whose headquarters are at Levuka, a picture of which appears in the lower portion of our frontispiece, has published the following outline of the interesting proceedings which have recently taken place in Fiji to commemorate the introduction of Christianity into those lovely islands of the Pacific:

The celebration is now going on of the fiftieth year of the establishment of the Wesleyan Mission in Fiji; or, in other words, of the beginning and onward progress of Christianity in this fair group of islands, whose more than 150,000 people were benighted with the worst heathen darkness, and notorious for atrocities of the most fearful kind. October 12th was the fiftieth anniversary of the arrival of the two first missionaries, Revs. William Cross and David Cargill at Lakeba, each of these leaders of the vanguard of the Cross bringing an heroic wife with him to a land to which it was a fearful thing for a lady to come. A special reminder of the event was given by a sermon printed in Fijian at the Mission Press, and circulated throughout the country so as to be read in every pulpit on Sunday, October 11th. This gave the natives an admirable sketch of the history of the mission. A sermon somewhat similar was also delivered on that day in the English tongue, and published in the newspapers.

Special deputations from the neighboring Australasian colonies arrived to congratulate the native churches. Special services and monster gatherings of native Christians have been going on for some weeks past, and are still to be celebrated in various parts of the land. One of the most interesting of the deputations came from Tonga in the person of Ratu Joni Faubula, a Fijian chief, and a native minister, who was the first convert made in this country, and the first Fijian to preach the Gospel. He addressed large meetings of English and Fijians, and in the course of his telling addresses he said: "For my faith I was exiled. My father, Tue Nayan (a man of supreme rank in the Windward Islands), banished me to Tonga because of my religion, and there in Tonga, which was partly heathen then, I preached the Christ, became a native minister, and, after fifty years of service, have returned just to look at my native islands."

When Ratu Joni left Fiji coast there was not a score of Christians on it. Now that he comes back after his long absence he does not find a score of avowed heathen in the whole of the group. Let this fact speak for itself, without it being necessary for me to go into figures. One thing the old chief said "brought down the house" in a large meeting: "The early missionaries were so threatened, tormented, and annoyed, that once I said to Mr. Cargill, 'Why don't you leave this land, and go?' 'Nay!' replied the Scotchman; 'we can stand to have our throats cut, but we can't run away!'" Men and women of that heroic mould, filled moreover with the love of souls and devotion to the Master, Christ, aided by natives who caught their spirit, and followed them as they followed Him, wrought such a work in cannibal Fiji, by the blessing of God, as men will scarcely believe when they hear of it. And now, in a land filled with churches, where every village has a school, and all the children are taught to read and write; when man-eating and polygamy, torture and horrid forms of war, are things of the past, and the light of Christian teaching shines over the length and breadth of its hundreds of islands, there are sounding now the silver trumpets of jubilee.

As a proof of the reality of this work, over which the jubilee clarions are sounding, let me mention that last Saturday morning the mission vessel, Moeyan, sailed away from Levuka Harbor with a band of youthful Fijian preachers—some of them with wives—for the wild country of New Britain and adjacent islands, haunt of ague and abode of lawless savages. Here there is no inconsiderable mission work going on, which was commenced ten years ago. Only the edge of the work is touched as yet, and the laborers faint at their work through sheer physical weariness, and some lie down to rest forever.

"A marvellous thing," said a gentleman to me the other day, "that these erstwhile savages should go off themselves to preach to savages." As I stood on the deck giving them a parting address my eye rested on Animio Bale, their leader and minister. He was one of the first party that went to New Britain. Right before us stood the Government buildings in Nasora Bay, where that band of pioneers had been interrogated by Mr. Administrator Layard as to whether they knew the evils of the country to which their missionaries were taking them. And an appalling picture did that official gentleman draw of the disease and danger and general misery to which they were hastening. And Animio spoke up for the rest: "All these things have been told us by our missionaries already. We are willing to leave ourselves in God's hands. If we live, we live; and if we die, we die!" And that answer settled the question. Now, ten years after, Animio was looking at the same pile of buildings in which he had played his part so manfully then, and as I reminded him how God had dealt with him in accordance with that speech, and how much easier the path had really been to what it seemed, and that he, spared so long, was enabled to return to so glorious, if trying, a sphere, his eyes moistened, and doubtless his mind, as mine, was filled with many thoughts.

THE TWO MISSIONARIES.

THE Rev. John Hunt and the Rev. James Calvert, whose portraits appear on the first page, arrived in Fiji on December 22d, 1838, to labor under the auspices of the Wesleyan Missionary Society. It was an effort full of danger and at his best was one that must entail daily privation and continual hardship. The mission had been commenced only three years when they landed, and Mr. Cargill could give them no encouragement. He could give them, however, a heart welcome, and the benefit of his three years' experience. Probably no man in this world was more glad to see a Christian face, or to receive aid in his arduous work.

It was on a Saturday that they landed, and the next day, their first Sunday in Fiji, was spent in prayer, consecration, worship and consultation. It was decided that Mr. Hunt should go to Rewa, the opposite island of the group, to take the place of Mr. Cross, a missionary whose health had broken down, and who, as Mr. Cargill had just heard, was compelled to leave his post and go to Australia for recuperation. Mr. Hunt went to Rewa in January, 1839, and remained there until July when an urgent call came to him from another sphere. Mr. Lyth, who had been laboring in the Friendly Islands, went to Fiji to obtain assistance in a work to which it seemed God had called him. He was anxious to open a mission at a place where the Gospel had never yet been preached, of the darkness and depravity of which terrible stories had reached him. This was Somosomo, an important town on the shore of Taviuni. Mr. Hunt, though in delicate health, at the time, volunteered to share in the perilous work, and at once made preparations for removal. On July 22d, Messrs. Lyth and Hunt, with their wives, where they arrived on the 29th. They met with a very cool reception from the natives, but made their way to the house of King Tuithakan, "a fine old man, with a frank and kind face," and his son, the regent, Tuikilakila, who was nearly forty years of age, and of gigantic stature and frame, by whom they were well received.

EMBARKED FOR SOMOSOMO,

Very soon, however, the missionaries had ghastly proof that the bad reports they had heard about Somosomo were true. About the time of their arrival news came that Ra Mbithi, one of the king's sons, was lost at sea and it was ordered that all his wives should be strangled, that they might accompany him to the land of spirits. The news horrified the missionary party, and they waited upon the king to beg for the lives of the unhappy women. It was a forlorn hope, for who were they that they should expect the king to set aside the customs of the country at their request? Still, it was their duty to try, and they did succeed in obtaining a short respite, while the king investigated the truth of the report about his son's death. If he were really dead the king would hold out no hope of mercy, and he was incensed at what seemed the impertinence of the missionaries in asking it.

A HIDEOUS MASSACRE.

In a few days conclusive proof was received that the prince was dead, and the fatal edict was executed. The following extract from Mr. Hunt's journal shows at once the horrors of heathenism, and the perils by which the missionaries were surrounded: "On the morning of August 8th," writes Mr. Hunt, "we heard the cries of the poor females and their friends, and soon they were unmercifully strangled. We were obliged to be in the midst of it; and truly their cries and wailings were awful. Soon after they were murdered they were brought to be buried, about twenty yards from our house." This slaughter of sixteen women was followed by a kind of festival, which lasted for several days and nights, and at midnight the inmates of the mission-house were startled by the hoarse blast of conches, and the hideous yells and whoops of the dancers. Many men and women to show their loyalty and devotion, voluntarily suffered the amputation of a finger-joint in connection with this festival; and the whole concluded by the distribution, one afternoon, of one hundred baked pigs, one of which, with a grim ironical generosity, was sent to the missionaries.

This horror at the very commencement of their labors did not frighten away the missionaries, it rather impelled them to greater exertion by the need it showed of their teaching.

Very little is said in this chronicle, which Mr. Hunt kept, of their own trials and annoyances. Incidental allusions, however, show that they were numerous and severe. For some time the mission party were not allowed to put any fence round the house, or at the windows, which the heat compelled them to keep open. Thus, all the chance of privacy was lost, and the natives, led by curiosity or baser motives, stood at the open windows. Once when Mrs. Hunt was bending over her dying babe, she looked up to see dark, savage faces laughing and mocking at her anguish.

Among other sources of trouble was the capricious temper of the tyrant chief, the regent, Tuikilakila. One day this herculean savage, in a flaming passion, flung open the mission-house door, crying out: "I am very angry!" He then seized Mr. Hunt and Mr. Lyth, one in each hand, and dragged them toward the door, where he had left his club. But God took care of His servants. Their calm demeanor and quiet, respectful remonstrance seemed to impress the brutal savage, for, before reaching the door he released them, striking Mr. Lyth contemptuously in the face as he did so.

THE FRIENDSHIP OF THE GREAT MAN was sometimes as annoying as his rage was terrible. For example, when the mission stores were very low, he would come and eat the meal which had been obtained with great difficulty; or, when disposed to be very amicable, he would kneel down, and thrust his face into that of the missionary, and, with expressive grimaces and remarks, watch the stranger's way of eating, while his uncleanly person and habits rendered his royal presence unspeakably disgusting.

A CANNIBALISTIC FEAST.

The self-denying work in which the missionaries were engaged was not attended with much success, and at the beginning of 1840, things looked darker than ever at Somosomo. One day, eleven dead men were dragged just in front of the mission-house. They had been killed at Lakemba, a neighboring town, to avenge the murder of a Somosoman by some of the inhabitants. With ceremonious order, the corpse of a chief was set apart for the god, and the others divided among the several tribes. The chief's body was skilfully cut in pieces within a few yards of the mission-house, and the other bodies were taken to different quarters of the town, where they were speedily cooked and eaten. The people seemed to become doubly savage after their horrid feast, and some of the chiefs came and tried hard to get up a quarrel with the missionaries, who for some time were nearly without food, for the people feared to supply them, lest they should incur the wrath of the ferocious agent. The missionaries applied to him again and again, but they and their offerings were lighted. On one occasion the king said: "No, I will not let you have food; your God may give you a pig."

"One day," says Mr. Hunt, "during a storm, one of the chiefs told us they had been consulting about us, and the result of their deliberations was that we should go away, for they did not intend to embrace Christianity. We told them plainly that we should not go till we were driven from them. Thank God, for my own part, I feel my love to them increases with their ingratitude and enmity, and I am determined to spend and be spent in trying to do them good, until God and His Church shall remove me from them. This is the sentiment of us all."

In June, 1841 these devoted servants of Christ were made glad by the arrival of the Triton mission-ship, bringing friends and letters from home. As the ship was going on to Lakemba, and would pass Somosomo on her return, Mr. Hunt and Mr. Lyth went in her to visit their friends at Lakemba. As the Triton again came near Somosomo, on her return, the natives gathered numerous on the hill-side at the back of the mission-house, the inmates of which could hear them exulting because she had missed the safe anchorage and was making direct for the rocks, where her destruction seemed inevitable. The savages grew wild with excitement, as they watched her perilous course, and made sure of a rich prize. Their proposal to fasten up the ladies, who were anxiously expecting the return of their husbands from Lakemba, was distinctly heard by their intended victims, who thus were made aware of their terrible danger. A few seconds of dreadful suspense, and then rose as the vessel struck on the reef; and the crowd, with fierce cries and whirling clubs, rushed down to the shore, and embarked in canoes for their work of bloodshed and plunder. The king was from home, and there was no one to restrain the people. It was a terrible time for the ladies of the mission-house. Their Fijian servant smote her breast, as she cried out: "The ship is fast! The ship is fast!" One of the missionaries' wives went aside and knelt, and looked up to heaven, and prayed: "Almighty Jesus!

WE NEED THY HELP!"

And as she came out again, she met one of her companions, who was greatly agitated, and said: "Don't be alarmed. There will be nothing of the matter." They opened the door, and looked forth on the water, to see the Triton gently sliding off into deep water, before the canoes could reach her.

In August, 1842, Mr. and Mrs. Hunt went to Viwa, where Mr. Cross had been laboring for three years, and who was now transferred to Somosomo. Here they busied themselves in the work of the Gospel and in translating portions of the Scriptures. Four months later Mr. Cross, worn down by labor and suffering breathed his last, and Mr. Hunt was somewhat broken in health. Ill though he was, he determined on making a tour among the islands to find fresh openings for the introduction of the good news of salvation.

FRUIT.

The blessing of God, at last, was more manifest on His work at this time than previously, and during the earlier months of 1844 several real conversions took place, and a good many persons made outward profession of Christianity. Growing influence was gained by the administering of medicine, and Mr. Hunt had quite a little hospital at Viwa; and among those who accepted the Christian religion was the Queen of Viwa herself. And so the next three or four years passed away.

In June, 1848, Mr. Hunt was prostrated by fever. Mr. Lyth, who was still his devoted colleague, as he had been at Somosomo, was uneasy at finding that, with intervals of relief, the attacks returned again and again, without yielding to the usual remedies. Each attack weakened the strong man; but in July he became very much better, and, impatient to be at his loved work again, went for several successive days to give instruction to some children in his schools. Another and worse relapse followed, and it became clear that

THE MISSIONARY'S WORK WAS DONE.

His last and fatal attack came upon him with increased force on September 15th. At this time, his friend, Mr. Calvert, was with him at Viwa, and he derived much tender help and brotherly comfort from him. On being told that his end must be very near, Mr. Hunt replied: "I do not think the time is come yet; this seems too easy and pleasant for dying." Turning to his mourning wife, he said: "If this be dying, praise the Lord." Then he lay still, as if trying to feel that he was about to depart; and, after a time, said: "How strange! I cannot realize that I am dying; and yet you all look as if I were." About three in the afternoon, his right arm rose, as if convulsively, and, as he turned on his side, grasped his fellow missionary Calvert, who put his arms around him. For a few minutes there was heavy and broken breathing, and then a solemn hush disturbed by the sob of a widow, "Lord, comfort my poor heart!" and an earnest "Amen" from those who stood around. He was buried the next day, and among those who mourned for him was Thakombau, a once savage chief, whose proud spirit had been changed into gentleness by the power of God, under the preaching of the man by whose grave he stood, to Himself by the charity of the Gospel.

THE CHURCH IN THE HOUSE.

Suggestions of Dr. Deems for a Home Service.

Lessons: Gen. 11: 1-9; 1 John 3: 1-3; Matt. 24: 23-31. Hymns: "Glory to Thee who safe hast kept;" "Come ye that love the Lord."

Text: "Being reconciled.—Rom. 5: 10.

"Being reconciled?"

Then, there was a quarrel.

Between God and us there was enmity.

God hated us, or we hated God, or each party hated the other.

But God could not hate us. God is love. He can hate nothing but sin. He could have no reason to be our enemy and keep up a fight with us. If He did not want us He could have swept the race out of existence in a moment. But He wanted us because He loved us.

And this is shown by His keeping us in existence, and further by His effort to win our love.

He could not contemplate our destruction.

He could not endure our enmity.

But He could do, and He did do, all that is possible to infinite power, justice, and love, to reconcile us to Him.

It is we who are reconciled, not He. All the bad, all the hate, lay in us. And the love that lay in Him is shown in that He reconciled us. Mark, we do not reconcile ourselves. We have not wrought this great change, but He has done it. And He has accomplished it, not by overpowering us by constraint.

He hath reconciled us by winning our affections, not by overmastering our will.

What a wicked shame to be at enmity with the greatest and best Lover of our souls! How contrary it stands to all right reason and all proper feeling!

The humiliating fact in our history, a fact to keep us always humble, is this—that we needed to be reconciled to wisdom, justice, love.

How happy to be reconciled! No more war with Omnipotence! No more fighting against God's methods of extracting from us the sting of death! No more effort to enthrone ourselves as usurpers on the seat of God! We know that He is able to carry out His designs. We know that His designs are loving toward us. We are reconciled to move as He directs, and thus have freedom to employ all our powers for Him. Happy reconciliation.

AFTERNOON TALK.

[A service may be held and the following discourse read:]

GOD'S PRESENCE ANOTHER WEEK.

By Rev. Bishop Hurst.

When the Sabbath morning comes, one of our first thoughts should be: Who has brought us safely through another week? None but God. We did not know, a week ago, the future of a single hour. The veil we could not lift which hid one moment from our view. We are ignorant. We know not the plans which are best for our comfort, and for a higher Christian experience. We form schemes which prove cobwebs in weakness. But God cares for His children, and out of their ignorance He leads them, day after day, until another week is finished, and His own day comes with all its beautiful associations and hallowed memories. It is easy to grow into the habit of thinking that we provide for ourselves. Sometimes our heavenly Father teaches us, in sorrowful dispensations, that He does all things, and that only His doing is right. Yes, the week sometimes brings its heavy sorrows. In the darkness of night a severe blow has fallen. We little expected the falling shadow. We would have given the whole world if it had not come. We cannot say that it was wrong. Perhaps it is a tangled thread to us now, but the time may come when He will make it plain. Perhaps it will be one of the silken cords to draw us to the skies. With another Sabbath morning we should renew our covenant with God, asking Him to forgive our want of submissiveness, our rebellious spirit, and teach us to say: "Thy will be done." We do not need the great sanctuary in which to make confession of sin, and ask God's guidance for the future. We can do it in the solitude of the home, far away from the great Church and the peal of the bell. God hears the whisper of prayer anywhere. It is in solitude, as with Moses in the wilderness, as a Midianite shepherd, John in Patmos, Paul in prison in Cæsarea, and Luther in the Wartburg Castle, that God has prepared many of His servants for some of the most heroic work. So He can prepare us, in the most retired place to which His providence has led us, for better service and a stronger faith. His places of blessing are wherever we ask Him for His grace.

[An appropriate poem is added, which may be committed to memory by the young people.]

RECONCILED.

[When Phoebe Cary and Charles F. Deems were collecting "Hymns for All Christians," at their request Alice Cary prepared the following poem, being then in the adjoining room ill, and approaching the close of her lovely life.]

Till I learned to love Thy name,
Lord, Thy grace denying,
I was lost in sin and shame,
Dying, dying, dying!

Nothing could the world impart,
Darkness held no morrow;
In my soul and in my heart,
Sorrow, sorrow, sorrow!

When I learned to love Thy name
O! Thou meek and lowly,
Rapture kindled to a flame—
Holy, holy, holy!

Henceforth shall creation ring
With salvation's story,
Till I rise with Thee to sing,
Glory, glory, glory!

MARITAL DUTIES.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, Feb. 7, 1886.*

"And Isaac went out to meditate in the field at eventide: and he lifted up his eyes, and saw, and behold, the camels were coming."—GEN. 24: 63.

The Bridal Caravan—The Bridegroom's Meditation—The Responsibility a Husband Undertakes—Trusting an Inexperienced Captain—How to Treat a Wife—Think that she is Beautiful—A Foreclosed Mortgage—Lovers' Promises Binding—A Swindle Worse than a Land Speculator's—Continue Lover's Attentions—A Contract to be Fulfilled—Its Terms—Flirting Forbidden—The High-Priest of the Home—A Wife Procuring her Husband's Imprisonment.

A BRIDAL pageant on the back of dromedaries! The camel is called the ship of the desert. Its swinging motion in the distance is suggestive of a vessel rising and falling with the billows. Though awkward, how imposing these creatures as they move along, whether in ancient or modern times, sometimes carrying four hundred or four thousand travellers from Bagdad to Aleppo, or from Bassora to Damascus! In my text comes a caravan. We notice the noiseless step of the broad foot, the velocity of motion, the gay caparison of saddle, and girth, and awning, sheltering the riders from the sun, and the hilarity of the mounted passengers, and we cry out: "Who are they?" Well, Isaac has been praying for a wife, and it is time he had one, for he is forty years of age; and his servant, directed by the Lord, has made a selection of Rebekah; and, with her companions and maidens, she is on her way to her new home, carrying with her the blessing of all her friends.

THE NUPTIAL MEETING.

Isaac is in the fields, meditating upon his proposed passage from celibacy to monogamy. And he sees a speck against the sky, then groups of people, and after a while he finds that the grandest earthly blessing that ever comes to a man is approaching with this gay caravan.

In this fifth discourse on "The Marriage Ring," having spoken of the choice of a lifetime companion, I take it for granted, O man, that your marriage was divinely arranged, and that the camels have arrived from the right direction and at the right time, bringing the one that was intended for your consort—a Rebekah and not a Jezebel. I proceed to discourse as to how you ought to treat your wife, and my ambition is to tell you more plain truth than you ever heard in any three quarters of an hour in all your life.

THE RESPONSIBILITY UNDERTAKEN.

First of all, I charge you realize your responsibility in having taken her from the custody and care and homestead in which she was once sheltered. What courage you must have had, and what confidence in yourself, to say to her practically: "I will be to you more than your father and mother, more than all the friends you ever had or ever can have! Give up everything and take me. I feel competent to see you through life in safety. You are an immortal being, but I am competent to defend you and make you happy. However bright and comfortable a home you have now, and though in one of the rooms is the arm-chair in which you rocked, and in the garret is the cradle in which you were hushed and the trundle-bed in which you slept, and in the sitting-room are the father and mother who have got wrinkle-faced, and stoop-shouldered, and dim-eyesighted in taking care of you, yet you will do better to come with me." I am amazed that any of us ever had the sublimity of impudence to ask such a transfer from a home assured to a home conjectured and unbuilt.

A RISKY VOYAGE.

You would think me a very daring and hazardous adventurer if I should go down to one of the piers on the North River, and at a time when there was a great lack of ship captains, and I should, with no knowledge of navigation, propose to take a steamer across to Glasgow or Havre, and say: "All aboard! Haul in the planks and swing out," and, passing out into the sea, plunge through darkness and storm. If I succeeded in getting charge of a ship, it would be one that would never be heard of again. But that is the boldness of every man that proffers marriage. He says: "I will navigate you through the storms, the cyclones, the fogs of a lifetime. I will run clear of rocks and icebergs. I have no experience and I have no seaport, but all aboard for the voyage of a lifetime! I admit that there have been ten thousands shipwrecks on this very route, but don't hesitate! Tut! Tut! There now! Don't cry! Brides must not cry at the wedding."

THE WIFE'S TEMERITY.

In response to this the woman, by her action, practically says: "I have but one life to live, and I entrust it all to you. My arm is weak, but I will depend on the strength of yours. I don't know much of the world, but I rely on your wisdom. I put my body, my mind, my soul, my time, my eternity, in your keeping. I make no reserve. Even my name I resign and take yours, though mine is a name that suggests all that was honorable in my father, and all that was good in my mother, and all that was pleasant in my brothers and sisters. I start with you on a journey which shall not part except at the edge of your grave or mine. Ruth, the Moabitess, made no more thorough self-abnegation than I make, when I take her tremendous words, the pathos of which many centuries have not cooled: 'Entreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee; for whither thou goest, I will go, and where thou lodgest, I will lodge. Thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God. Where thou diest will I die, and there will I be buried. The Lord do so to me and more also, if aught but death part thee and me.' Side by side in life. Side by side in the burying-ground. Side by side in heaven. Before God and man, and with my immortal soul in the oath, I swear eternal fidelity."

ENTITLED TO ADMIRATION.

Now, my brother, how ought you to treat her? Unless you are an ingrate infinite you will treat her well. You will treat her better than any one in the universe except your God. Her name will have in it more music than in all that Chopin, or Bach, or Rheinberger composed. Her eyes, swollen with three weeks of night watching over a child with scarlet fever, will be to you beautiful as a May morning. After the last rose petal has dropped out of her cheek, after the last feather of the raven's wing has fallen from her hair, after across her forehead, and under her eyes, and across her face there are as many wrinkles as there are graves over which she has wept, you will be able truthfully to say, in the words of Solomon's song: "Behold, thou art fair, my love! Behold, thou art fair!" And perhaps she may respond appropriately in the words that no one but the matchless Robert Burns could ever have found pen or ink, or heart or brain to write:

"John Anderson, my jo, John,
We clamb the hill thegither;
And mony a canty day, John,
We've had wi' ane anither.
Now we maun totter down, John,
But hand in hand we'll go;
And sleep thegither at the foot,
John Anderson, my jo."

If any one assail her good name, you will have hard work to control your temper, and if you should strike him down the sin will not be unpardonable. By as complete a surrender as the universe ever saw—except that of the Son of God for your salvation and mine—she has a first mortgage on your body, mind, and soul, and the mortgage is foreclosed; and you do not more thoroughly own your two eyes or your two hands than she owns you. The longer the journey Rebekah makes and the greater the risks of her expedition on the back of the camels, the more thoroughly is Isaac bound to be kind, and indulgent, and worthy.

LOVERS' PROMISES BINDING.

Now, be honest and pay your debts. You promised to make her happy. Are you making her happy? You are an honest man in other things, and feel the importance of keeping a contract. If you have induced her into a conjugal partnership under certain pledges of kindness and valuable attention, and then have failed to fulfil your word, you deserve to have a suit brought against you for getting goods under false pretences, and then you ought to be mulcted in a large amount of damages. Review now all the fine, beautiful, complimentary, gracious, and glorious things you promised her before marriage, and reflect whether you have kept your faith. Do you say, "Oh, that was all sentimentalism, and romance, and a joke," and that "they all talk that way!" Well, let that plan be tried on yourself! Suppose I am interested in Western lands, and I fill your mind with roseate speculation, and I tell you that a city is already laid out on the farm that I propose to sell you, and that a new railroad will run close by, and have a depot for easy transportation of the crops, and that eight or ten capitalists are going to put up fine residences close by, and that the climate is delicious, and that the ground, high up, gives no room for malaria, and that every dollar planted will grow up into a bush bearing ten or twenty dollars, and my speech glows with enthusiasm until you rush off with me to an attorney to have the deed drawn, and the money paid down, and the bargain completed. You can hardly sleep nights because of the El Dorado, the Elysium, upon which you are soon to enter.

A WESTERN EDEN.

You give up your home at the East, you bid good-by to your old neighbors, and take the train, and after many days' journey you arrive at a quiet depot, from which you take a wagon thirty miles through the wilderness, and reach your new place. You see a man seated on a well, in a swamp, and shaking with the fifteenth attack of chills and fever, and ask him who he is. He says: "I am a real estate agent, having in charge the property around here." You ask him where the new depot is. He tells you that it has not yet been built, but no doubt will be in the company get their bill for the track through the next legislature. You ask him where the new city is laid out. He says, with chattering teeth: "If you will wait till this chill is off, will show it to you on the map I have in my pocket." You ask him where the capitalists are going to build their fine houses, and he says: "Somewhere along those lowlands out there by those woods, when the water has been drained off." That night you sleep in the hut of the real estate agent, and though you pray for every body else, you do not pray for me. Being more fortunate than many men who go out in such circumstances, you have money enough to get back, and you come to me, and out of breath in your indignation, you say: "You have swindled me out of everything. What do you mean in deceiving me about that Western property?" "Oh," I reply, "that was all right; that was sentimentalism, and romance, and a joke. That's the way they all talk!"

But more excusable would I be in such deception than you, O man, who by glow of word and personal magnetism induced a woman's soul into surroundings which you have taken no care to make attractive, so that she exchanged her father's house for the dismal swamp of married experience—treeless, flowerless, she

* Last Sunday was moving-day at the Brooklyn Tabernacle, the first Sunday in February being the commencement of the church year, when families take possession of the seats they secured at the annual pew-renting. Many changes were noticeable on Sunday in the location of families, though a large number had succeeded in retaining their old seats. Higher premiums were paid this year than ever before for a choice of seats. They made a total of about $500, which is just double what was paid in 1881, when the system was adopted. Dr. Tucker secured first choice by the payment of $560, which in addition to the pew-rent, will make his seat cost him $900 for the year. The second choice went to Mr. Everett, who paid $525 for it. This, with the pew-rent, produces $700. Mr. S. B. Duryea gave $300 for third choice, and fixed on a pew of $100 rent. From this amount the premiums ranged lower by degrees down to $5. The total amount of pews is $17,240. The income of the church for the current year will therefore be about $31,000 if the regular weekly collections produce $8000, as they generally do. Free seats are, as before, in the galleries, where only the four rows in front are rented.

terless, comfortless, and godless. I would not be half so much to blame in cheating you out of a farm as in cheating a woman out of the happiness of a lifetime.

LOVERS' ATTENTIONS.

My brother, do not get mad at what I say, but honestly compare the promises you made, and see whether you have kept them. Some of you spent every evening of the week with your betrothed before marriage, and since then you spent every evening away, except you have influenza or some sickness on account of which the doctor says you must not go out. You used to fill your conversation with interjections of adulation, and now you think it sounds silly to praise the one who ought to be more attractive to you as the years go by, and life grows in severity of struggle and becomes more sacred by the baptism of tears—tears over losses, tears over graves. Compare the way some of you used to come in the house in the evening, when you were attempting the capture of her affections, and the way some of you come into the house in the evening now.

DON'T BE PREOCCUPIED.

Then what politeness, what distillation of smiles, what graciousness, sweet as the peach orchard in blossom week! Now, some of you come in and put your hat on the rack and scowl, and say: "Lost money to-day!" and you sit down at the table and criticise the way the food is cooked. You shove back before the others are done eating, and snatch up the evening paper and read, oblivious of what has been going on in that home all day. The children are in awe before the domestic autocrat. Bubbling over with fun, yet they must be quiet; with healthful curiosity, yet they must ask no questions. The wife has had enough annoyances in the nursery, and parlor, and kitchen to fill her nerves with nettles and spikes. As you have provided the money for food and wardrobe, you feel you have done all required of you. Toward the good cheer, and the intelligent improvement, and the moral entertainment of that home, which at the longest can last but a few years, you are doing nothing. You seem to have no realization of the fact that soon these children will be grown up or in their sepulchres, and will be far removed from your influence, and that the wife will soon end her earthly mission, and that house will be occupied by others, and you yourself will be gone.

Gentlemen, fulfil your contracts. Christian marriage is an affectional bargain. In heathen lands a man wins his wife by achievements. In some countries wives are bought by the payment of so many dollars, as so many cattle or sheep. In one country the man gets on a horse and rides down where a group of women are standing, and seizes one of them by the hair, and lifts her, struggling and resisting, on his horse, and if her brothers and friends do not overtake her before she gets to the jungle, she is his lawful wife. In another land the masculine candidate for marriage is beaten by the club of the one whom he would make his bride. If he cries out under the pounding, he is rejected. If he receives the blows uncomplainingly, she is his by right. Endurance, and bravery, and skill decide the marriage in barbarous lands, but Christian marriage is a voluntary bargain, in which you promise protection, support, companionship, and love.

THE TERMS OF THE CONTRACT.

Business men have in their fire-proof safes a file of papers containing their contracts, and sometimes they take them out and read them over to see what the party of the first part and the party of the second part really bound themselves to do. Different ministers of religion have their own peculiar forms of marriage ceremony; but if you have forgotten what you promised at the altar of wedlock, you had better buy or borrow an Episcopal Church-Service, which contains the substance of all intelligent marriage ceremonies, when it says: "I take thee to be my wedded wife, to have and to hold from this day forward, for better or for worse, for richer or for poorer, in sickness and in health, to love and to cherish till death us do part, according to God's holy ordinance, and thereto I pledge thee my troth." Would it not be a good idea to have that printed in tract form and widely distributed?

NEVER FLIRT.

The fact is, that many men are more kind to everybody else's wives than to their own wives. They will let the wife carry a heavy coal scuttle upstairs, and will at one bound clear the width of a parlor to pick up some other lady's pocket-handkerchief. There is an evil which I have seen under the sun, and it is common among men—namely, husbands in flirtation. The attention they ought to put upon their own wives they bestow upon others. They smile on them coyly and askance, and with a manner that seems to say: "I wish I was free from that old drudge at home. What an improvement you would be on my present surroundings!" And bouquets are sent, and accidental meetings take place, and late at night the man comes to his prosaic home, whistling and hilarious, and wonders that the wife is jealous. There are thousands of men who, while not positively immoral, need radical correction of their habits in this direction. It is meanness immeasurable for a man by his behavior to seem to say to his wife: "You can't help yourself, and I will go where I please, and admire whom I please, and I defy your criticism."

Why did you not have that put in the bond, O domestic Shylock? Why did you not have it understood before you were pronounced husband and wife that she should have only a part of the dividend of your affections; that when, as time rolled on and the cares of life had erased some of the bright lines from her face, and given unwieldiness to her form, you would have the reserved right to pay obeisance to cheeks more rubicund, and figure lithier and more agile, and as you demanded the last pound of patience and endurance on her part, you could, with the emphasis of an Edwin Forrest or a Macready, have tapped the eccentric marriage document, and have said: "It's in the bond!" If this modern Rebekah had understood beforehand where she was alighting, she would have ordered the camel drivers to turn the caravan backward toward Padan-aram. Flirtation has its origin either in dishonesty or licentiousness. The married man who indulges in it is either a fraud or a rake. However high up in society such a one may be, and however sought after, I would not give a three-cent piece, though it had been three times clipped, for the virtue of the masculine flirt.

TOE UP.

The most worthy thing for the thousands of married men to do is to go home and apologize for past neglects, and brighten up their old love. Take up the family Bible and read the record of the marriage day. Open the drawer of relics in the box inside the drawer containing the trinkets of your dead child. Take up the pack of yellow-colored letters that were written before you became one. Rehearse the scenes of joy and sorrow in which you have mingled. Put all these things as fuel on the altar, and by a coal of sacred fire rekindle the extinguished light. It was a blast from hell that blew it out, and a gale from heaven will fan it into a blaze.

Ye who have broken marriage vows, speak out! take your wife into all your plans, your successes, your defeats, your ambitions. Tell her everything. Walk arm in arm with her into places of amusement, and on the piazza of summer watering-places, and up the rugged way of life, and down through dark ravine, and when one trembles on the way, let the other be reinforcement. In no case pass yourself off as a single man, practising gallantries. Do not, after you are fifty years of age, in ladies' society try to look young-mannish.

RESPECT HER PIETY.

Interfere not with your wife's religious nature. Put her not in that awful dilemma in which so many Christian wives are placed by their husbands, who ask them to go to places or do things which compel them to decide between loyalty to God and loyalty to the husband. Rather than ask her to compromise her Christian character, encourage her to be more and more a Christian, for there will be times in your life when you will want the help of all her Christian resources; and certainly, when you remember how much influence your mother had over you, you do not want the mother of your children to set a less gracious example. It pleases me greatly to hear the unconverted and worldly husband say about his wife, with no idea that it will get to her ears: "There is the most godly woman alive. Her goodness is a perpetual rebuke to my waywardness. Nothing on earth could ever induce her to do a wrong thing. I hope the children will take after her instead of after me. If there is any heaven at all, I am sure she will go there."

THE PRIEST OF THE HOUSEHOLD.

Ay, my brother, do you not think it would be a wise and a safe thing for you to join her on the road to heaven? You think you have a happy home now, but what a home you would have if you both were religious! What a new sacredness it would give to your marital relation, and what a new light it would throw on the forehead of your children! In sickness what a comfort! In reverses of fortune what a wealth! In death what a triumph! God meant you to be the high-priest of your household. Go home to-day and take the Bible on your lap, and gather all your family yet living around you, and those not living will hear of it in a flash, and as ministering spirits will hover—father and mother and children gone, and all your celestial kindred. Then kneel down, and if you can't think of a prayer to offer, I will give you a prayer—namely: "Lord God, I surrender to Thee myself and my beloved wife, and these dear children. For Christ's sake forgive all the past, and help us for all the future. We have lived together here, may we live together forever. Amen and amen!" Dear me, what a stir it would make among your best friends on earth and in heaven!

A HUSBAND IMPRISONED.

Joseph the Second, the emperor, was so kind and so philanthropic that he excited the unbounded love of most of his subjects. He abolished serfdom, established toleration, and lived in the happiness of his people. One day while on his way to Ostend to declare it a free port, and while at the head of a great procession, he saw a woman at the door of her cottage in dejection. The emperor dismounted, and asked the cause of her grief. She said that her husband had gone to Ostend to see the emperor, and had declined to take her with him; for as he was an alien, he could not understand her loyal enthusiasm, and that it was the one great desire of her life to see the ruler for whose kindness, and goodness, and greatness she had an unspeakable admiration; and her disappointment in not being able to go and see him was simply unbearable.

The Emperor Joseph took from his pocket a box decorated with diamonds surrounding a picture of himself, and presented it to her, and when the picture revealed to whom she was talking, she knelt in reverence and clapped her hands in gladness before him. The emperor took the name of her husband, and the probable place where he might be found at Ostend, and had him imprisoned for the three days of the emperor's visit, so that the husband returning home found that the wife had seen the emperor while he had not seen him.

In many families of this earth the wife, through the converting grace of God, has seen the "King in His beauty," and He has conferred upon her the pearl of great price, while the husband is an "alien from the covenant of promise, without God and without hope in the world," and imprisoned in worldliness and sin. Oh, that they might arm in arm go this day and see Him, who is not only greater and lovelier than any Joseph of earthly dominion, but "high over all, in earth, and air, and sky!" His touch is life. His voice is music. His smile is heaven.

HOW A CHRISTMAS-CARD SAVED A LIFE.

THE following interesting incident is related in the Indian Witness of Calcutta:

Merry Christmas time was drawing near, and I wanted some pretty illuminations to give away, so I went one morning to where I knew I should find a beautiful variety.

While I was looking over a multitude of mot-toes, and making my choice, I noticed a lady near me, apparently bent on the same errand. After a few minutes, as she seemed unable to find what she was seeking, I asked her if there were any among those I had chosen which she particularly liked.

She thanked me pleasantly, and said she had selected all she wished except one, and she felt sure of finding it among the unassorted cards, for it had been published, she thought, by the Tract Society only the year before.

"It is one with purple pansies—heart's-ease, you know—and the verse:

"'Casting all your care upon Him, for He careth for you,' I want it for a special use," she said; and then added impulsively, "Those words saved a life—a soul—last Christmas. You don't wonder they are precious!"

Then, in a few words, she gave the outline of the story of one who had, through terrible trials, lost faith in human love, truth and honor, and, worst of all, in his misery had made shipwreck of his faith in God.

It was Christmas Day. He started to leave the house with the full purpose of committing suicide. The children were just coming home from a Sunday-school Christmas-tree, eager and happy with their pretty presents. He stole out through a room from which they had passed, so that no one might see him leave the house. Lying on the floor, just where he must step to cross the threshold, was a card with purple pansies, and the words, "Casting all your care upon Him for He careth for you." Startled, thrilled to his soul, he could not pass by that message from heaven facing him, as if to drive him back from his wicked, cowardly purpose. Faith in God and his love came back, and with it came courage and strength to take up the heavy burden of a bruised and shattered life. God did care for him, and was a very present help in trouble.

The story touched me deeply, and has often recurred to me since, though I have never seen the lady again, and knowing nothing further of the circumstances. It always comes back with special force whenever I have to choose Scripture verses to give away. Since we have the promise, "My word shall not return unto Me void," may we not rightly ask God's peculiar blessing on these little messengers which go to so many homes we may never enter?

RESIGNING THE PLUG.

MAJOR HILTON, the evangelist, spoke recently in Indianapolis, Ind., from Rom. 6:16, to an audience of professing Christians, during which he dwelt at length upon what he called "the sinful pollution of the body (as the temple of the Holy Ghost), through tobacco," relating his own marvellous experience and final emancipation from servitude to "this enemy of purity and righteousness."

After the singing of a hymn, during which Mr. Hilton was pondering why the Spirit had led him to deliver such a message to such an assembly, a gentleman in the audience arose, and, asking permission to speak, stated that nearly four years before that night he was converted to God during services conducted by Mr. Hilton, in Cumberland, Md.

For over two years he had been an ordained Baptist preacher, but that during all that time he had been in bondage to an enervating, poisoning numbness of the flesh, paralyzing God-given faculties; and, as a moral and spiritual teacher setting a sinful example. New light had come to him that night, and he thought God had sent the evangelist, whom he had not seen for four years, that the Holy Spirit might complete a much-needed work, whereby he should have "fruit unto holiness"—and stepping up to Major Hilton, handed him a large plug of tobacco (Rom. 6:22).

AMERICA'S AID TO MR. McALL.

MENTION has frequently been made in these columns of the Gospel work being done in France through the agency of the Rev. R. W. McAll. American Christians have aided in this work by liberal gifts, and latterly, since the matter was organized and placed in charge of a committee of ladies, the help has been more effective. In 1884 the contributions from the United States amounted to $22,061.30. Several stations of the mission have been opened and supported by the subscriptions from American cities after which they are named. The Salle Boston, the Salle Washington, the Salle Baltimore, etc., are all prospering. The following is an extract from a letter received from McAll, and published by the McAll Association; it shows a grateful appreciation of American aid:

"Our excellent lady Bible-reader of the district, was asked to go up to the very highest house on the hill (Butte Montmartre), to see a poor workman of middle age, who was very ill. She went, and was followed by our devoted missionary, Monsieur Sagnol, who has long devoted a part of his time to visiting the people of that station. There they found the poor man. He had been for some time a regular attendant on the meetings, but had been lured away by sceptical companions, and had not entered our mission hall for four or five years.

"Our friends found him hopelessly ill, and in a state of inward trouble. There, as he tossed on his poor couch, the truths he had heard, but scarcely understood, in the meetings, returned to his thought; and he longed to be there again, and learn more. He seemed to be still in a dark state spiritually, though with a great affection for the memory of our mission-room. A good woman, his neighbor, one of the converts of our station, tried to help and enlighten him. By degrees they were enabled to lead him on to a clear view of his need as a sinner, and to a simple trust in Christ. His last days were irradiated by an immortal hope. He was a poor, lonely man, unmarried and solitary; but peace and joy took possession of his spirit.

"Almost at his last moment, after he had ceased to articulate, our Bible-reader brought to him a small bunch of spring flowers (primroses) from our little garden at Auteuil. When it was said, 'from Mr. McAll's garden,' a bright smile came over his features. Almost immediately afterward he was gone.

"Last Tuesday a pleasant social evening was passed in our Salle Cleveland, Batignolles. A severe headache precluded my attendance, but Mrs. McAll was there to represent me. Our good missionary, the Rev. S. R. Brown, who is one of the main workers of the station and head of the Fraternal Society, presided. The chief speaker was our valued friend, the Rev. Dr. Beard, who gave an account of Cleveland and Cleveland friends. The pretty room was closely filled, and all felt happy and encouraged.

"Several hearers of this station have lately joined the neighboring Protestant Church, that of Pastor Vernes.

"At the Salle Washington, a very instructive series of 'Conférences' has just been given by Pastor Convé, who regularly conducts the Friday-evening meeting there. The Salle has been crowded. I go there, from time to time, on Sunday evenings, and always see a good attendance. There can be little doubt that if, at the close of this year, we are enabled (aided by the generosity of our Washington friends) to remove into a larger and more commanding room, we may hope for an important extension of the work in this populous 'Quartier Latin.'

"I have seen one or two fine halls to let in this district—but hopelessly expensive. We must hope that, in the fall of the year, a suitable place may be obtainable.

"I intend to go, Sunday week, to the Gros Caillou Station (Rue de la Comète), one of those supported by Brooklyn. The people are so attentive and sympathetic in the little place, it is a luxury and a pleasure to be there. In that quarter, we are seeking a more central room; but it is difficult to find one."

DIVINATION.

A SIGN OF THE LAST DAYS.

By Rev. E. J. Hytche.

The Predicted Age of False Gospels—The Gospel of Positivism—Agnosticism—Darwinism—Divination a Prevalent Evil—What it is—An Ancient Curse—Denounced in Prophecy—Its Modern Form of Spiritualism—Its Doom.

ONE remarkable characteristic of these days, marking them out as those of which Christ and the prophets spoke which were to precede the final consummation, is the prevalence of false gospels, which are deceiving many, as Christ predicted they would (Matt. 24:11).

There is, for example, the Evangel of Positivism, whose creed is to walk solely by sight, leaving no room for the exercise of faith in the unseen, and whose religion is the "worship of humanity." Another gospel is that of Agnosticism, whose professors teach that if there be any God, or if the soul is immortal, it is impossible to know the fact. But the most popular of these false creeds—and which unhappily has infected too many pulpits and the religious press—is that of Darwinism, which teaches that man has descended, through a protoplasm of slime, from some member of the Simian tribe, and so is only

A SUPERIOR KIND OF APE.

No wonder then that, within a month of his death, Dr. Darwin expressed himself to a correspondent as uncertain whether man was an immortal being. As a result of this gradual ascent from a slime dredged up from the depths of the Atlantic to man as he is, the ultra-Darwinians teach that there will be no end to human progression upward, and that, as crime is only the relic of their animal progenitors, men will eventually become perfect.

But, of all the fatuous beliefs and practice of fallen man, there is scarcely one that can be compared for with that which may be regarded as the Gospel of Divination. Yet from time immemorial it has been preached, more especially in the East, where it originated, and even England—that land of Gospel light and liberty—is not free from such beliefs. Thus, superstition is elevated into a religion, and myriads who reject revelation bow mind and body to the practice of divination.

WHAT IT IS.

By divination is meant those attempts to discover the secrets of the invisible world, or of future events, either by consulting professional fortune-tellers, or by watching some physical sign, more especially the planets. The most prevalent forms of divination in England are shuffling cards, astrology, or palmistry. In the New Cut, Lambeth, there are many who profess by casting horoscopes to tell the future of those who consult them; and one adept, at least, maintained a brougham by the fees derived from his aristocratic customers.* In ancient Egypt we learn from Gen. 44:2-4, that a silver cup was the medium employed for the purpose of unveiling the secrets of the future. This cup was filled with water, into which precious jewels were immersed, and accordingly as the water bubbled or was in any way agitated, so was the sign interpreted. The relics of this superstition are seen even now, for too many silly women seek to tell their fortune by making auguries from the dregs of a tea cup.

Most thinking men laugh at such practices as illustrations of human fatuity, but Holy Writ not only stigmatizes them as folly, but denounces them as positively sinful. Prominent among the reasons assigned for the extermination of the Canaanites was their addiction to divination. Thus we read (Deut. 18: 14-19), "These nations which thou shalt possess hearkened unto observers of times and unto diviners; and because of these abominations the Lord thy God doth drive them out."

* [It is a humiliating fact that the pre-eminence of America over European lands is a pre-eminence in evil as well as in good, and this evil is no exception to the rule. In one of the great New York daily journals there were twenty-three astrologers and clairvoyants advertising their merits on one and the same day last week.—Ed.]

We cannot wonder, then, that in the latter days of Jewish history, when the chosen people yielded to the same evil practices, that as a penalty for this sin they were expelled from their God-given inheritance. Nor was this penalty inflicted without any prior remonstrance or warning. For Jeremiah declared that the should be (Jer. 14: 14-16) "consumed by the sword," because they prophesy unto you a false vision and divination, "and a thing of nought." Nor are we left in any doubt as to what these divinations were, for they were but forerunners of those modern astrologers of whom the British "Zadkiel" with his widely-circulated almanac is a type. Thus Isaiah, in his remonstrance with his infatuated kinsman, wrote (47: 12, 13), "Stand now with thine enchantments, and with the multitude of thy sorceries, wherein thou hast labored from thy youth. Let now the astrologers, the star-gazers, the monthly prognosticators, stand up and save thee from that which shall come upon thee."

MODERN SORCERY.

It is sad to learn both from sacred and profane history how the wise and the great in every age have been prone to accept the Gospel of Divination. Yet in all this they only confirmed while they illustrated the statement of the Holy Spirit (Rom. 1: 21, 22), "They became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened—professing themselves wise, they became fools."

In this age, too, which so boasts of its enlightenment and freedom from religious creeds, never was the sin of sorcery more rampant. Thus it is that men and women—some holding the first rank in science or philosophy—are not ashamed to sit round a table in a darkened room, and by its taps or gyrations attempt to hold intercourse with the unseen world. As most of these infatuated persons reject revelation, and depend for their religious belief solely upon what the paid "mediums" affirm, they make divination their gospel. Whether the phenomena be the mere tricks of skilled jugglers, as many observers think, or are real facts—the work of the devil—there can be no hesitation in affirming that they are but harbingers of that awful time when men Satanically endowed will "Show signs and wonders to seduce, if possible, the very elect" (Mark 13: 22, 23).

A TERRIBLE PENALTY.

Yet, awful as is this belief in sorcery, it would seem to be one of the penalties inflicted on those who, in spite of evidences most cogent, have either rejected the Bible altogether, or so diluted its doctrines and precepts as to adapt it to an age of luxury and self-will. For this combination of knowledge with divination—of proud intellect with grovelling superstition, is ascribable to judicial blindness. Hence we read (Isa. 66: 3, 4), "They have chosen their own ways, and their souls delight in their abominations, I also will choose their delusions." And so will the acceptance of the Gospel of Divination go on from bad to worse until it culminates in the apocalypse of Antichrist; and then when these deniers of the Bible-miracles see the wonders wrought by the ecclesiastical agent of the Lawless One, they will accept them at once as proofs of his Deity. For "God will send them strong delusion that they should believe a lie" (II Thess. 2: 11). For, however much they may scorn the miracles of Jesus as unworthy of intelligent men, they will not doubt the miracles of the Man of Sin.

From the concurrent predictions of Holy Writ it would appear that sorcery will be a prominent and doubtless in Spiritism we see the initial steps of this false gospel. Thus, in Mal. 3: 5 we read, "I will be a swift witness against the sorcerers." For as, in spite of God's terrible physical penalties, men will "not repent of their sorceries" (Rev. 9: 21). The Gospel of Divination will bring down His judgments upon apostate Christendom.

Nor will these terrible penalties end with this life—they will, in fact, only antedate the more fearful punishment of eternity. For among those who will not only be excluded from the New Jerusalem, but be cast into the "lake of fire" will be those "sorcerers" who rejected the offer of salvation in Christ for the Gospel of Divination (Rev. 22: 15).

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

"A Musselburgh Fisherwoman Was Toiling along a road with a heavy basket of fish upon her back. A gentleman met her, and accosted her thus: 'My good woman, had you ever a heavier burden than that to carry?' 'Yes, sir,' she replied; 'my sins were a great deal heavier.' 'And have you got quit of the load?' 'Yes, sir, I have. But I did not get clear of my sins in the way that Christian in the "Pilgrim's Progress" was released from his.' 'Oh, how was that?' said the gentleman; 'I thought he was right!' 'Well,' she continued, 'just when I saw that Christ the Holy One of God bore my sins, I just rested there. I never got to the Slough of Despond, nor to the Wicket-gate. Dear, seeking soul, like this fisherwoman, you can go right to Jesus; do not think that it is needful for you to go through the trials and difficulties that "Christian" went through before you can come to Christ.'

"A Philosopher's Advice to an Emperor.—"There was a Christian in prison at Rome. A philosopher near by had audience of the emperor concerning him. 'What are you going to do with him?' he asked. 'Come back in two days, and I will tell you,' was the reply. He went, and the emperor said: 'I will put him into exile.' 'That is no use,' the philosopher said, 'for the God whom he serves will be with him there.' 'I will confiscate his goods.' 'That is no use,' for he has treasure laid up where neither moth nor rust can corrupt, nor thieves break through nor steal.' 'Well,' said the emperor, angrily, 'I will put him to death.' 'Still that is of no use, for his God says: "Absent from the body, present with the Lord." 'Then what would you have me do with him?' the emperor asked. 'Cause him to sin,' was the philosopher's answer. There it is. Sin, and sin alone, can come between us and God, for He is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity."

"The Worst Man on the Ship.—"I Remember a little boy of seven years of age. This child had godly parents who taught him many lessons from God's Holy Word, sent him to Sunday-school, and gave him the best possible training. The boy grew into a young man and went to sea in an American ship, where he met with wicked companions, and joined them in all their ways. He forgot all his mother's teaching, and very soon became one of the worst men on the ship. One night, as he was alone in the fore-castle, something kept coming into his mind, and would not be kept back. 'Surely I have heard that before,' he said, and then he remembered that it was a verse of Scripture which his mother had taught him when a child. He went to his trunk for his Bible, which had not been used since he left home. With deep emotion he opened the Book, and searched for the verse until he found it, and read it carefully over and over again, and that text of Scripture was the means of that rough and wicked sailor's conversion. Years passed, and he was a minister in London, preaching the Gospel of Christ. This was John Newton, and during his ministry in London there was a young man of very bad reputation. On being asked by one of his congregation, 'Can this man be saved?' Newton replied, 'Anybody can be saved by the grace that saved John Newton.'

"A Prize-Fighter's Victory.—"On One Occasion when preaching in a town in the South, a man came into the meeting, whose hands and arms had been dyed to the elbows in his brother's blood in a ring fight. At the close of the meeting I spoke to him and urged him to seek shelter behind the blood that had been shed for him on Cavalry. But he went away to all appearances unchanged. On the following night one of the local workers came to me and said he had noticed the man had come back and was looking strangely excited, and at the close he was hurrying away when the worker went after him, and asked him where he was going; to this the man excitedly answered: 'Never mind, I am going.' I went after the man, and taking him into one of the side rooms, tried to calm him, and after I had succeeded, he told me what had disturbed him so much. He said: 'every time you mentioned the name of Jesus my sins seemed to be a very volcano in my soul, and I cannot bear it any longer. I was on my way to put an end to my life when you stopped me.' Thank God, the storm has now gone from that man's soul, and in its stead there reigns the King of Peace.'

"A Shoemaker Puzzled.—Mr. Somerville Related: "An old shoemaker, who was not in the habit of attending any place of worship, went to a Gospel meeting one Sunday night, and the preacher took for his text, 'Where wilt thou spend eternity?' and during the address he repeated the words, 'Forever, where?' At these words the old man began to feel rather uncomfortable, and finally rose and left the meeting. When he got home, thinking to divert his mind from these new thoughts which had been stirred within him, he took up a boot and began to hammer away. But the beat of the hammer seemed to say, 'Forever, where?' So he put aside his work, and all was still, save the ticking of the clock on the wall, and it seemed just to keep repeating the same words, 'Forever, where? Forever, where?' Impatient of this, he got up and stopped the clock, but then his conscience kept whispering, 'Forever, where?' Unable to endure it, he began to pace up and down his little room, but still his very footsteps seemed to keep time to the same words. What was he to do now? Just what he ought to have done at first. Instead of thrusting the question from him, he knelt down and besought the Lord to save him, and his prayer was answered. Jesus says: 'Him that cometh unto Me I will in no wise cast out.'

"Kept Awake all Night for Joy.—Mr. Love related the following incident: "Last week my nephew, who is a doctor, asked me to call on one of his patients who was dying, and was still unsaved. I went, and found the poor man at the last extremity, and nearing the gates of death. I spoke to him of Jesus, and of His love for him, and told him that he could still seek shelter under the blood, but he opened his eyes wearily, and looking at me, he said: 'No, no; I have been too careless; it would be mean to seek the Lord now.' 'My dear friend,' I said, 'that is the way of man, but it is not God's way, for He has said: "Come, now, and let us reason together, though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool." The burden seemed to roll off his mind, as I repeated that verse. I left him, thinking it wiser to leave him alone to meditate on the divine promise. I called the next day, and found him rejoicing in Christ. He told me that he could not shut his eyes to the long-suffering kindness of the Lord. He died that night, but he had Jesus to guide him safely to heaven, and as I stood by the coffin I thought, 'How strange it seems, and still it is true, that I will meet that man in glory when so many, even those who preached Christ without knowing Him, will be shut out.' Oh, friends, see that you have got a firm hold of the Saviour!"

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Proposal to Have the President's Nominations considered in open session was rejected last week by the Senate Committee on Rules. The Committee consists of five members, of whom four voted for rejection, and only one, Senator Frye, for a favorable report. The majority were Senators Sherman, Ingalls, Harris, and Blackburn. As the report must be discussed in open session, we may perhaps learn why these four Senators are anxious for secrecy, and what other Senators share their anxiety. If there are weighty reasons of public policy for secrecy in deliberating on the removals and appointments, they should be made known; otherwise the people will be apt to conjecture that the Senators dread disclosures compromising to themselves. If there is to be a quarrel between the President and the Senate, and either party desires the support of public opinion, apart from political affiliation, there is no way of securing it but by publishing the facts. At present nothing is positively known except that the President is between two fires. He has made six hundred and forty-five removals, and while he has lost popularity with his own party for not making more, the Senate is arraigning him for making so many. Until the charges against him are explicitly stated, and his defence heard, the public can be nothing more than interested spectators of the struggle. A secret trial will not satisfy the country, which is tired of the intrigues and bargains over the offices.

A Commission to Investigate the Liquor traffic is called for by a bill introduced by Senator Frye, and reported favorably on February 5th. It provides that the members of the commission shall be selected solely with reference to personal fitness and capacity for an honest, impartial, and thorough investigation. It stipulates that all of them shall not be advocates of prohibitory legislation or of total abstinence, and that they shall serve without salary. Their duty shall be to investigate the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to revenue and taxation, and its economic, criminal, moral, and scientific aspects in connection with pauperism, crime, social vice, the public health, and general welfare of the people; to inquire and take testimony as to the practical results of license and prohibitory legislation for the prevention of intemperance in the several States, and to report the result of their investigations to the President to be by him transmitted to Congress. It appropriates $10,000 for the expenses of the investigation.

The Admission of the Southern Part of Dakota as a State and the organization of the Northern part as a territory, under the name of Lincoln, was provided for in a bill which passed the Senate on Friday last. It is expected that it will fail in the House. Apart from the fact that the Democrats are opposed to the admission because of its adding two Republicans to the Senate, it is asserted that the sentiments of the people of the whole territory have not been adequately expressed. A change of feeling in the Northern section has been observed, and it is thought that if the question were submitted to them they would vote against division, and in favor of a State Government for the whole territory.

The Second Bereavement Which Has Be-fallen the Secretary of State claims for him the sympathy of the whole people. Mrs. Bayard's death, following so closely on the death of her eldest daughter, has rendered the Secretary's home doubly desolate. His affliction is all the greater because of the purity of his life and the ardor of his domestic affections. Such consolation as public expressions of sympathy can afford has been tendered to him by the press of both political parties, but it is poor consolation under so heavy an affliction. That God will comfort the bereaved statesman and support him in his trial is the prayer of Christian patriots.

The United States Supreme Court Rendered another decision last week adverse to the State of Virginia in the coupon cases. It was in principle identical with its decision last April. The question at issue was whether the holder of a State bond, when the interest upon it became due, might tear off the coupon or slip entitling him to receive that interest, and tender it as money in payment of taxes. The State legislature in 1884 passed an act forbidding officials to receive the coupons as money. Acting under this law, the officers refused the coupons in four cases; and as the citizens would not pay in anything else, proceedings were taken against them for non-payment, and they appealed to the Supreme Court. The Court decided that the officers were bound to accept the coupons when offered, and that the citizens need pay in nothing else. It remains now to be seen whether the Virginia Courts will bow to the authority of the United States Supreme Court, or attempt to enforce the laws of the State.

An Explanation of the Death of Captain Crawford appears to be needed from Mexico. The latest reports of the shooting furnished by Lieutenant Maus indicate that the attack on the United States troops by the Mexicans was not, as at first supposed, a mistake. Lieutenant Maus states positively that the Mexicans knew that they were firing on American regulars, and that before the last fatal volley was fired there had been a parley in which Captain Crawford, speaking in Spanish, had explained the status and object of the party, and had called the attention of the Mexicans to their uniforms in proof of the assertion. Lieutenant Maus appears to think that the Mexicans were a gang of brigands intent on capturing the American camp and effects. The notices of Captain Crawford show that he was a most estimable officer, whose loss will be severely felt.

Mr. Gladstone Has Succeeded in Forming an administration. His colleagues are more radical, and are younger men than any he has worked with before. The most important change is the appointment of Lord Rosebery as Secretary for Foreign Affairs, a position which Mr. Gladstone in former cabinets assigned to Earl Granville. The change is generally approved. Earl Granville, though urbane and polite, lacked the vigor and energy necessary in handling British extensive and complicated foreign interests. Mr. Chamberlain holds office as President of the Local Government Board, which will supply him with sufficient opportunities for introducing social reforms. The most critical appointment was that of Secretary for Ireland. It is given to Mr. John Morley, who is new to official life, but is a profound thinker and an able writer. He is believed to be favorable to Home Rule, and his appointment is more acceptable to the Irish than any of his predecessors in the office. The selection that provokes the most criticism and, in some quarters, positive ridicule is that of the Treasury. It is given to Sir W. Vernon-Harcourt, whose lack of financial talent renders him singularly unfit for his office of Chancellor of the Exchequer. Only four of the Whig aristocrats appear in the Cabinet. The absence of the Marquis of Hartington and the Earl of Derby is significant. It indicates that Radicalism will be in the ascendant in the new government.

The Prospect of Pacifying Ireland is not Encouraging as at present indicated. Mr. Justin McCarthy, the historian, who sits in Parliament as an avowed advocate of Home Rule, says: "My impression on the situation is still hopeful, but I find others begin to grow less hopeful. If Mr. Morley is not sent as a prelude to Home Rule the whole thing is a dead failure, so far as Ireland is concerned, but I fully believe he is so sent." Mr. Gladstone has issued an address in which he refers to the subject in vague terms, which are not deemed hopeful by the Parnellites. He says that there are three questions concerning Ireland which demand the attention of Parliament—the question of social order, the question of land reform, and the question of self-government. The desire for self-government, he says, must necessarily be subject to the law of imperial unity. The Government hope to find a safer and more effectual method than coercion to remedy the social troubles. The Daily News interprets the manifesto to mean that Mr. Gladstone intends to deal with the Irish questions in the order in which he has mentioned them. It thinks that the scheme will secure the unanimous support of the Liberals, while the Conservatives cannot, with decency, oppose, and will almost certainly support, measures for the establishment of social order and the reform of the land law. The Parnellites desire self-government to be dealt with first, and unless their wishes are consulted, they may join hands with the Conservatives on some party question not affecting Ireland, and drive Mr. Gladstone from office, as they did Lord Salisbury.

The Expulsion of the Poles from Germany is causing much excitement there and in Austria. Efforts are being made to induce the Austrian Government to enter a formal protest against Prince Bismarck's policy. The estates of the Polish nobles are already being offered for sale. Their Polish tenants having been expelled, the estates no longer yield a revenue, and the owners are prepared to sell at any price. One estate of two hundred thousand acres has thus been thrown upon the market. Bismarck states that he does not intend to take advantage of the expulsions to buy land in Posen cheap, but means to pay fairly for it, and his Landtag declarations have, in fact, served to keep up values by assuring a market.

Renewed Nihilist Activity is Reported in Russia. The police are kept in activity day and night by reports of new conspiracies. Their vigilance was rewarded recently by the capture of a dangerous Nihilist, Sergius Ivanhoff, who is believed to be the head or second in command of the revolutionary "will of the people." The party of agents who effected the arrest have been munificently rewarded. They are also said to have arrested another important conspirator. Mr. Hurlbert, telegraphing to the New York Sun, says that four Nihilists were lately executed in the Citadel of Warsaw. A Polish student of noble blood was the first one hanged. He died shouting: "Long live the Social Revolution!" Another of the condemned—a man named Bardowski—was taken with a fit on the scaffold, and was strung up while writhing in convulsions. The last of the quartet was a stalwart shoemaker named Ossowski, who suffered terribly, and was choked to death after a long struggle.

Mrs. M. Baxter Sailed from New York for England on Tuesday, February 2d, in the steamer Alaska, of the Guion Line. Her departure was hastened by the intelligence of the sudden illness of Rev. W. E. Boardman, which necessitated her immediate return to Bethshan. On Thursday last a cable message was received announcing Mr. Boardman's death. The news will occasion widespread regret in this country, of which he was a native, and in which he spent the prime of his life, laboring successfully for many years. At Potosi, Mo., he organized a church, and he resided for a considerable period in Philadelphia and New York. His portrait and a sketch of his life appeared in this journal on June 25th, 1885.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey Have Arranged for a series of meetings in Texas, to commence February 21st, and to continue during the first and second weeks in March. A dispatch from Galveston states that Mr. Brown, the Secretary of the International Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association, has visited that city to make the preliminary arrangements. He stated that the evangelists would proceed there immediately after the termination of the New Orleans services, which commenced February 9th and continue to February 19th. During his recent visit to Chicago, Mr. Moody appealed to the rich to furnish a building in which the city mission work can be organized, in which fit persons can be trained in evangelistic labors, and from which, as a centre, they shall go out on their missionary errands. Mr. McCormick has promised $100,000 of the $250,000 called for, and it is said that ten men have already promised $5000 each.

"Swapping Wives in Vermont" was mentioned by Dr. Talmage in his sermon on Clandestine Marriage as "not a rare transaction." A correspondent requests us, in justice to the Green Mountain State, to insert a statement qualifying Dr. Talmage's remark. He informs us that he is a Vermonter by birth, and has travelled throughout the State itinerating as a Methodist minister, and has mingled with all classes of people, yet he never knew of a case of the kind referred to. The practice cannot, therefore, he believes, be so common as readers of Dr. Talmage's sermon might infer from his remark. His own observation leads him to the conviction that "the moral tone of the State is unexceptionably high and strict, and the marital bond is sacred and its observance characterized by purity and fidelity." It is evident that Dr. Talmage must have been misled or have spoken of some period in its history when Vermont was not so moral as it is now.

The Twenty-Eighth Annual Convention of the Young Men's Christian Associations of New York State, will be held in Elmira, on February 18th, 19th, 20th and 21st, in the Park Congregational church. The opening address will be delivered by the Rev. Edwin F. See, of Albany. Reports concerning "the work of the past year" will be submitted by Chairman Edmund P. Platt and Secretary George H. Hall, of the State Committee. Each association in the State is expected to send delegates to this Convention. Twenty new associations have been organized since the last Convention. During the Convention addresses will be delivered by Professor Edwin Packard, of Brooklyn, W. A. Bowen, of Pennsylvania, and other friends.

A Blasphemer's Horrible Death is Reported from Millersburg, Pa. The New York World of February 8th publishes a despatch stating that on the previous Thursday a jovial crowd got up a burlesque of the Lord's Supper. The leader was a patent medicine peddler named Samuel Motter, well known in that vicinity. Motter assumed the character of officiating clergyman, and while the company knelt he went around administering beer and bread. Some noise startled the men while the burlesque was going on, and looking up they saw a frightful appearance—a hideous creature with horns, probably introduced by some practical joker to frighten them. It had that effect, for the men ran shrieking from the room, and reached their homes in a state of wild terror. Motter was missing for some time, and when he was found he was a raving maniac. Physicians were summoned, but could do nothing for him. He raved, howled, and prayed, declaring that he had seen the Evil One, and that he was lost. His torture was terrible, but nothing could be done to relieve him, and he died in the wildest agony. The death-bed scene is said to have been full of horrors that can hardly be described.

A Frozen Infant Restored to Life in an Undertaker's shop is the subject of a despatch from Boston, Mass., to the New York journals. It states that on the night of Sunday, January 31st, when the temperature was at zero, a policeman found a babe lying on the ground, and carried it to the police station. It was frozen stiff, and was sent at once to the city undertaker's in Howard Street. Business was pressing, and the poor little body was laid temporarily on a shelf not far from a large stove, where it lay for three hours awaiting the arrival of the medical examiner. When he reached the shop he took off the sheet from the corpse to look for some mark that might lead to the discovery of the mother. To his utter astonishment the baby quietly opened its eyes, as though just awakening from a nap. Proper treatment was at once applied, and the little one was soon restored to life and apparent vigor. Dr. Harris, the examiner, said that the warmth from the stove had gradually but effectively rekindled the almost extinguished spark of life. There are many people spiritually alive at this day who, cast out by the world, and pronounced hopeless cases by social reformers, owe their lives to the warmth of Christian sympathy extended to them in the spirit of the Master (Luke 10 : 30-37).

Two Lovers in Maine are Annoyed by the inadvertent publication of a letter in an Augusta newspaper. It appears that the lady wrote to her lover, who is a compositor in the office of the newspaper, but the name of the person for whom it was intended was illegible. It lay around until the business manager tore open the envelope, and turned it over to the editor, who did not read it, but supposing it to be intended for publication, gave it out for insertion in the Young Folks' Column as a communication, the first names of the writer and her lover both appearing. The young man, who had been awaiting some word from the lady, first learned of the course the letter had taken when he saw it in the paper. Both parties are much chagrined at the letter, with its endearing epithets and protestations of affection, being given to the public. Beyond the passing annoyance of the publicity no harm was done, as no reader would be likely to apply to himself the promises evidently intended for another. It might be read with interest, but not with the personal interest of the one whom it concerned. Unhappily that is how many people read the Bible, which does contain promises and invitations intended for personal application (Acts 2 : 38, 39).

An Embarrassed Farmer was the Cause of some amusement during the war. In the course of some reminiscences of that sad time which an ex-Confederate officer furnishes to a Southern journal, he mentions that he was one of three Southern officers appointed on a commission to meet three Northern officers after the battle of Prairie Grove to arrange an exchange of prisoners. While the officers were engaged in the business an aged farmer entered the room by mistake, supposing it was the provost's office. He caught sight of a blue uniform, and began declaring his loyalty to the North and expressing his hope that it would win. One of the officers, amused at the old man's candor, whispered him to be careful. The farmer put on his spectacles and saw the Southern officers. He quickly changed his tone, said that his heart was with the South, and that his only son was with the Confederate army in the field. As his glance passed around the room he recognized the Northern uniforms and became frightened and perplexed. At last he said : "Well, gentlemen, things here seem rather mixed. You jist go on and fight it out among yourselves ; I can live under any government." There was a general laugh, during which the old farmer retired. Many people are trying to make the best of both worlds by living double lives, passing as Christians among godly people and professing worldliness when with the worldly. For all such a terrible disappointment is waiting (Matt. 7 : 22).

The Victims of a Fire in a Poorhouse are described in a despatch from Jackson, Mich., where the burnt structure was situated. There were forty inmates of the building when the fire was discovered on January 24th. They all escaped save five, of whom three were insane, and of the other two one was deaf and the other blind. The fire broke out soon after midnight, and an alarm was given immediately on each floor. The inmates were all awakened, but those who lost their lives could not be made to understand their danger, and the insane patients resisted the attempts of the attendants to rescue them. There were only two attendants, and those two risked their lives in trying to get every one out of the building. It is a similar work in which God's servants are engaged in the world. The alarm is being sounded, but some are spiritually deaf, others are spiritually blind, and others do not realize their danger (Isa. 6 : 9, 10).

A Romantic Marriage Has Taken Place at Lowell, Mass. Twelve years ago a young student at Harvard, the son of wealthy parents, became engaged to a young lady in good society. Before the student had finished his university course his father was reduced to poverty. The young man did not leave college, but curtailed his expenses, and gave himself to hard study. He graduated with honor, and decided on entering the medical profession. The parents of the young lady, however, disapproved of their daughter marrying a poor man, and sternly forbade the match. The young lady would have married him if she had been permitted, and remained single for his sake. The young physician succeeded in his profession, made an excellent reputation and a considerable fortune. He returned to Lowell recently, and there learned for the first time of the fidelity of his affianced. He renewed his suit, and was accepted. A marriage has now rewarded the lady for her twelve years of waiting. Doubtless all the weariness of those years is now forgotten, or only remembered as a zest to her present happiness. So it will be with the Church when her long-expected Bridegroom appears ; the trials and temptations that have beset her during her pilgrimage will render her joy more intense (1 Peter 1 : 5-7).

How Dr. Tappan Paid his Hotel Bill is related by the Journal of Lewiston, Me. It states that when the good old clergyman was the agent of the American Home Missionary Society, he arrived one night at Mattawamkeag. He was urged to remain there to sleep, as the only hotel in the next town on his route was kept by a man so inimical to religion that he might not use him well. Dr. Tappan, however, decided to go forward. On his arrival the hotel man received him politely, and gave him a comfortable room. But what surprised the doctor most was that before retiring the landlord and all his family filed into his room, and he was requested to conduct family worship. They came in again in the morning, and again Dr. Tappan read and prayed. When he was leaving he went to the desk for his bill. "You don't owe me a cent," said the innkeeper. "The fact is, that tin peddlers, butchers, drovers, fishermen, and all classes of people come here to stop with me, and I make it a point to take my pay in their own line whenever I can. I've done the same by you. You've paid. Good morning, sir!" Many business men who would not mind adopting the reciprocity system in dealing with butchers and fishermen would object to extending it to clergymen ; yet uncounted thousands of people have acquired eternal riches through God's blessing on the teaching of a Christian minister (Prov. 8 : 11).

A LESSON AND A FORTUNE FOR CHRISTIAN MEN OF BUSINESS.

An Evening Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Let your conversation be without covetousness; and be content with such things as ye have: for he hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee."
—HEBREWS 13:5.

The Stickiness of Precious Metals—A Desirable Freedom—The Cure for Covetousness—Discontented Millionaires—An Undesirable Servant—I. A Word of the Lord—II. Its Many Fulfillments—III. To be Appropriated and Acted on—A Teacher's Watch Rejected—IV. Every Word Useful—Five Negatives—A Confession.

THE apostle warns us against a tendency very natural to our race—"Let your conversation be without covetousness." I am afraid that the precept is even more wanted now than in the days of the apostle. We are still more sharp and keen in competition, and men in trade are even more anxious to accumulate money than they were in apostolic times. It is not easy for a man to keep his heart clear of covetousness or his hands clean from moral bribes. There is about gold and silver. They have a great tendency to birdlime our souls, and hold them fast, so that they cannot rise superior to their influence. The Revised Version reads our text, "Be ye free from the love of money;" and it puts in the margin, "Let your turn of mind be free from the love of money." May we all enjoy that freedom, and may our turn of mind lead us to seek better things than the miser is able to hoard!

There is a laudable pursuit of gain, without which business would not be properly carried on; but there is a line, scarcely as broad as a razor's edge, between diligence in business and greediness for gain. We can so easily pass from the one into the other that we may hardly be aware of it ourselves. When a man is increasing his investments, when he is extending his agencies, when he is enlarging his warehouse, when he is employing a larger number of persons than formerly, or even when he is bemoaning the depression of his trade, and his heart is aching because he has to do only half as much business as before, covetousness may insinuate itself into his conversation. It is a snake which can enter at the smallest hole. It lurks in the grass where it is long, but it glides also where the pasture is bare. It may come in either in prosperity or in adversity; and it is needful to whisper in the ear of each believer, whether going up or down in the world: "Let your conversation—your daily conduct—be without covetousness."

Any brother here—and it is to the brethren mainly that the temptation comes, I think—any brother here may have present need of such a warning as this; and if he does not need it just now, he may lay it by till he does, for it will keep. Yet let me not restrict the text or the sermon to the male side of the house; the sisters may fall into a like temptation, in the saving, as their husbands in the getting. Ye godly matrons, ye industrious Marthas, "Let your conversation be without covetousness."

THE CURE.

The apostle here hints at what is the real cure for covetousness—namely, contentment. This is a rare drug in the market. The words of the apostle make up a golden sentence: "Be content with such things as ye have." It is supposed by most persons that they could be content if they were not exactly what they are, and where they are; but the precept exhorts them to be content with their present circumstances. If they had a little more they would be satisfied; but that is not the contentment to which we are exhorted; it is written, "Be content with such things as ye have."

If you have little possessions, yet still hear the voice of wisdom, which says, "Be content with such things as ye have." You now have a measure of trouble by reason of the straitness of your means; you might have more trouble with the breadth of your means, if you had all you would like to have. It may not be quite easy to travel when your skirts are too short, but it is much harder to keep them from dragging in the mire when they are very long. Though a single staff is such a convenience that a traveller without one may sigh for it, yet a dozen staves would be a load, which would make the burdened man prefer rather to have no staff at all than to have so many to carry.

A RESTIVE HORSE.

I believe that it is an advantage to have wealth when wealth is kept in its right place; but the difficulty is that the horse often runs away with the rider, and he who has wealth too often loses his liberty, and falls into sore bondage, by becoming the slave of his own possessions. "Be content with such things as ye have."

I asked a question some year ago of a person whom I believed to be one of the most covetous individuals in my acquaintance, and I received from him a singular reply. I said: "How was it that St. Francis de Sales, who was an eminent confessor, to whom persons went in the Romish church to confess their sins, found that persons confessed to him, in private, all sorts of horrible sins, such as adultery, drunkenness, and murder, but never had one person confessed the sin of covetousness?" I asked this friend whether he could tell me why it was, and he made me this answer, which certainly did take me rather aback. He said: "I suppose it is because the sin is so extremely rare." Blind soul! I told him that, on the other hand, I feared the sin was so very common that people did not know when they were covetous, and that the man who was most covetous of all was the last person to suspect himself of it. I feel persuaded that it is so.

A BAD SERVANT.

Covetousness goes about in disguise. In the "Holy War" we read that when Diabolus sent traitors to lurk about the town of Mansoul, he sent among the rest a young fellow named Covetousness; but when he entered into the town of Mansoul, he took the name of Mr. Prudent Thrifty, and he was engaged at once as a servant, I think it was in the house of Mr. Conscience, the Recorder. He seemed such a likely young man, this youth of the name of Prudent Thrifty. Now, mind you, friends, when you are taking a servant, that you do not engage one of the name of Prudent Thrifty; for I have information that he comes of the family of the Greedies, and that his true name is "Covetousness," though it may be long before you find it out. His near relations are the Screws, the Skinflints, and the Grabbals; but he will not own them, but always mentions his great-uncle, Squire Prudence, and his mother's brother, Professor Economy, of the University of Accumulation. You will have need to carry your eyes in your head if you mean to practise the precept: "Let your conversation be without covetousness, and be content with such things as ye have."

I. The first observation I am going to make upon this most weighty text is this: that is of great weight to a believer. Paul said: "Let your conversation be without covetousness;" and there was weight in that. He added: "Be content with such things as ye have;" and there was weight in that also, for there was inspiration at the back of each sentence. But when he went on to say, "for He hath said," and to bring in the personality of God as distinctly speaking to each one of us, saying, "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee," then he felt that he had brought the weightiest argument that he himself, as an inspired man, could think of. When Jehovah Himself speaks, there is no excuse for doubting, questioning, or answering again. When God Himself deals with our souls, we are like wax under the seal; at least, we desire to be so.

If you tremble at God's Word, if you stand in awe of it, if you can read the one hundredth and nineteenth Psalm through, and can join with David in intense delight in the Law of God, you have the traits of a true-born child of God, and the Book is yours, with all that it contains; but if not, you are one of the children of that evil one who questioned the Word of the Lord in the beginning, and continues to deny it to this day. If you pick and choose in the teachings of inspiration; if you believe this, and slight that, you make yourself a judge of that which is your Judge, and you have not the tokens of a child of God. See well to this; for there is more in this test than quibblers will allow.

See then the argument: "Let your conversation be without covetousness; and be content with such things as ye have: for He hath said." That "He hath said" is the hammer which drives the nail home, and clinches it, with every true child of God.

II. My second observation is this: the word of the Lord may have

A THOUSAND FULFILMENTS.

When a man makes a promise, and he keeps it, that promise is done with. You cannot expect a banker to pay a cheque a second time. The merchant who duly meets his bill once has met it once for all, and the document is henceforth of no value. But when God makes a promise He fulfils it, fulfils it, and fulfils it again and again and again, to the same man, and to hundreds of other men. The Lord's promise once given is never recalled. Now, I do not think this particular promise is recorded anywhere in the Old Testament in these exact words. There are great differences between the Hebrew and the Septuagint; and this particular Greek text, "He hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee," is not to be found with exact accuracy in either. I suspect that this is, in fact, a household word of the Lord our God, which, though you find the like of it in Scripture, need not to have been expressly recorded there, because essentially, and from the very nature of things, it must be true of Jehovah our God.

Dost thou, my brother, leave thy father's house as a young man? Art thou about to enter upon a very perilous course of life, that will be thick set with trials, like the life of Jacob with Laban? "Fear not, for God will not fail you, nor forsake you." On the other hand, are you as a child of God fighting with inward sin, because the Canaanite is still in the land? Is the inward spiritual battle very severe just now? Yet "He hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee." Or are you responsible for others? Are you called to watch for souls, and to lead others to the conflict? Be not cast down nor disquieted, as you will be very apt to be if you look to yourself, for this is an office involving sore travail. Find your strength in this word—"He hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee." Is it that God has put into your hand some great work to do for His name? Is your whole life to be as a temple, adorned with the riches of faith, and the glories of hope and love? Fear not, you shall finish your design. You shall make a temple for God to dwell in. Go boldly on in the matter to which God has called you. Go to the quarries, or to the gold mines, and do as God bids you, for "He hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee."

Thus have we had two observations; and I will now make a third with great brevity.

III. The word of the Lord is TO BE APPROPRIATED

by each child of God, and acted on. "He hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee." I like this singularity of the person. You see Paul had been saying in general, "Let your conversation be without covetousness; and be content with such things as ye have;" and then he changes from the plural, and writes, "for He hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee." When the Lord speaks in this instance, His promise is in the singular. He saith not "you" and "ye," but "thou" and "thee." He speaks to us with that—I do not know what to call it unless I use a French word—sweet intimacy, which is the language of endearment, the chosen speech of love. When one man speaks to another, and means him to know that his promise is assuredly and altogether for him, and that he is most lovingly his friend, he cannot do better than use the singular and personal pronoun—"I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee."

Take the "you" out of all God's promises, and put the "thee" into its place, for you are permitted to do so. We make fearful failures with God's promises through not appropriating them. I have heard of a Sunday-school teacher who performed an experiment which I do not think I shall ever try with Sunday-school children, for it might turn out exactly as it did in his case. He had been trying to illustrate what faith was, and as he could not get it into the minds of his children, he took his watch, and he said: "Now, I will give you this watch, John. Will you have it?" John felt thinking what the teacher could mean, and did not

SEIZE THE TREASURE.

He said to the next, "Henry, there is the watch. Will you have it?" The boy replied, "No, thank you, sir," with a very proper modesty. He went by several boys, till at last a youngster who was not so wise or thoughtful as the others, but rather more believing, said, "Thank you, sir," and put the watch into his pocket.

Then each of the other boys woke up to a startling fact: their companion had received a watch, and they had not. One of the boys inquired of the teacher, "Is he to keep it?" "Of course he is," said the teacher; "I put the watch before you, and said that I gave it to you, but none of you accepted it." "Oh," said the boy, "if I had known you meant it, I would have had it." And all the boys were in a dreadful state of mind to think that they had lost the watch. Each one cried, "I did not think you meant it, but I thought," each one said, "Please, teacher, I thought." Each one had his theory except the simple little boy, who believed what he was told, and got the watch. Now, I wish that I could always be such a simple child as literally to believe what the Lord says, and live by that belief. The apostle drives us to such practical faith when he says, "Let your conversation be without covetousness; and be content with such things as ye have: for He hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee."

You smiled just now. I do not think that there was any harm in your doing so; but I will tell you what we must not smile at, and that is, I believe that nine of out ten of that God has said to you, "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee." You think you do, but you do not. You also have got some most powerful reason why you dare not take the watch—I mean the promise. You are so wise that you feel that you cannot expect the Lord to interfere in any way for you. No, no, no; either you are not worthy of it (which is quite correct), or else you do not like to take things quite so literally, or there is some other reason why you cannot literally accept the divine assurance. There are, perhaps, one or two fools among us who have got a hold of God's Word, and actually believe it to be a matter of fact; but I do not think that many are so simple. Those who do so are generally poor, obscure persons, but I should greatly envy them if I were not one of their number. With all my heart I do believe that "He will never leave me, nor forsake me."

IV. A further observation is this: each word of God

HAS ITS OWN USEFULNESS.

This particular Word, that we have before us, is an illustration of this fact. This particular text is an extraordinarily useful one, for, first, if you notice, it covers all time—"I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee." Well, if God will never leave me, He will not leave me now. If He will never leave me, no time is excluded from the word "never." However dark or however bright, it says "never." Suppose I am going to live till I am ninety or a hundred—what then? You will call me a poor old soul; but He has said, "I will never leave thee." Suppose I should be very sick indeed, and my reason should begin to fail? Even then "He hath said, I will never leave thee."

Is not this a blessed cover for the whole of life, and all the exigencies of it? It matters not how long we live; we cannot outlive—"I will never leave thee." You that are familiar with the Greek text know that there are here. We cannot manage five negatives in English, but the Greeks find them not too large a handful. Here the negatives have a fivefold force. It is as though it said, "I will not, nor leave thee; I will never, no never, forsake thee." Perhaps a verse of one of our hymn hits it off as nearly as can be:

"The soul that on Jesus hath lean'd for repose,
I will not, I will not desert to his foes;
That soul, though all hell should endeavor to shake,
I'll never, no never, no never forsake."

Our text covers all space, as well as all time. Suppose we emigrate. Suppose we are compelled to go to a backwoods' settlement of America or Canada, or away to Australia or New Zealand, this promise will go with us all the way: "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee." Suppose we have to take to sea, and lead the risky life of a sailor; we will sail with this at the mast-head: "I will never leave thee." But suppose we should get into prison. Does not Jesus visit those who are prisoners for His name's sake? Hath He not said, "I will never leave thee?" Suppose we go up in the world, and fall under great responsibilities, this goes up with us, "I will never leave thee." Suppose, more likely, we go down in the world, this goes down with us, "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee."

And then it covers all circumstances. "I will never leave thee." I may get to be a very childish old body. "I will never leave thee." But my dear children may all be dead, and I may be quite a solitary person. "I will never leave thee." But every friend may turn tail, and desert me. "I will never leave thee." But I may be in such a state that nobody will own me. "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee."

"I will tell you this morsel of MY OWN FAULTS: sometimes I have said, 'I suffer so much. I become so ill. I shall be so long away from the Tabernacle. The congregation will be greatly injured. Perhaps I shall never be able to preach again.' I have struggled to this pulpit when I could hardly stand, and when the service was over, and I have been weary, the wicked whisper has come, 'Yes, I shall soon be useless. I shall have to keep my bed, or be wheeled about in a chair, and be a burden instead of a help.' This has seemed a dreadful prospect; but 'I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee,' has come in, and I have shaken off my fears, and have rejoiced in the Lord my God.

Some of you cannot task in this sunshiny promise. It is not yours. The words are "I will never leave thee." This implies that God must be with us; and if He be not with us, the promise is not ours. You cannot take home to yourself the promise, "I will never leave thee," if you have nothing to do with God. "I will not forsake thee;" does not this also take somewhat for granted? If the Lord has never been with you, if He has never forgiven you, if you have never sought His face, if you have never accepted His mercy in Christ Jesus, why, then, the promise is not yours, and you have cause for trembling rather than for rejoicing! God is against you. He fits His arrow to the string. He prepares His bolts against you. Tremble, and submit yourself to Him. Oh, that you would do so at once, and trust in Jesus, and live!

If the Lord be with you, and if you are with Him, the promise stands forever, "I will never leave thee." If you have trusted in Him—if you are trusting in Him—He has said, "I will never forsake thee." Go away and rejoice, O child of God! You must have troubles. But with all actual trouble, with all possible trouble, with all impossible trouble, if you bear this promise with you, "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee," you may sing hallelujahs both in life and in death, and with such music you may wing your way to the world of bliss.

Let us begin the music now by singing right heartily:

"Praise God from whom all blessings flow;
Praise Him, all creatures here below;
Praise Him above, ye heavenly host;
Praise Father, Son, and Holy Ghost."

NEW BOOKS.

EVERY CHRISTIAN'S EVERY-DAY BOOK, by Rev. T. H. L. Leary, is intended to be an aid to devotion. It devotes one page to every day in the year. At its head is a text that may serve as a motto for the day, and below are choice selections from the works of eminent divines elucidatory of the passage, or containing some well-pointed illustration drawn from daily life, or the works of God in creation, which presents the doctrine or the lesson in a clear and forcible light. A large proportion of the quotations are from writers of the far distant past—men who preached and taught in the early ages of the Church, whose works are not read in these days so much as they ought to be. Some of them are gems of rare beauty. An effort has been made by the compiler of the work to classify his teaching, which greatly adds to the value of his book. Thus, the month of January is devoted to the topics of "God and Man;" "Time and Eternity;" "Life and Death." In February, the subject for the month is "The Bible the Rule of Faith and Practice." March, "The Christian Duties," etc., etc. Great taste has been displayed in the selection of passages of Scripture and of quotations from the eminent divines. The book is a closet companion, but it is also suitable for reading at family prayer. Pp. 366; published by Frederick Warne & Co., New York.

AFTERNOON SONGS,

by Julia C. R. Dorr, is a volume of short poems, the character of which will be understood without definition by any readers who have become familiar with the work of this gifted Christian poetess. The poems are like others from her pen, singularly sweet of rhythm and pure in tone. The spirit in which they are written may be inferred from the following extract from the poem entitled "Not Mine":

"Yet, Master, if I may Make one pale flower
Bloom brighter, for Thy sake,
Through one short hour;
If I, in harvest fields
Where strong ones reap,
May bind one golden sheaf
For Love to keep;
May speak one quiet word
When all is still
Helping some fainting heart
To bear Thy will;
Or sing one high, clear song,
On which may soar
Some glad soul heavenward,
I ask no more!"

Mrs. Dorr tells one plaintive story very sweetly in the poem entitled "The Parson's Daughter." It is a story of self-sacrifice for Christ's sake learned and practised. We will not spoil the reader's pleasure by giving an extract from it, for it is beautiful as a picture, and nothing short of the whole could show its charm. "The Doves at Mendon" is another gem of rare excellence, and of a very musical rhythm. The poems are all short, which is a rare merit in these days. There are sixty-four of them in the little volume. They are easily learned, and will be a treasure to young people who are fond of poetry. Throughout they breathe a gentle Christian spirit, as of one who lives near to God, and is not unfamiliar with pain and trial. Pp. 184; price, $1.50. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

INSTANCES OF DIVINE HEALING.

(From Thy Healer.)

MR. WORDEN, of Ealing, writes: "Last year was one of the most memorable in my Christian life. Jesus taught me to trust Him as my Sanctifier, and led me to see Him as the Healer of my body as well. I stepped out entirely into Him. My dear wife was very near death's door. She had been ailing for years, and had been laid aside for months, and then the doctor said her constitution was broken, and she was not likely to get better. The arm of flesh had failed, and I cried unto God. One Sabbath evening, I thought of the promise that whatsoever two should ask in prayer, the Lord would do. I mentioned my wife's case to a friend, and he said: 'There is no doubt the Lord is able to do it.' 'Well,' I said, 'is your faith strong enough to come with me to the throne of grace with this matter?' for I felt we must have nothing unclean in the camp; no unbelief. After thinking over it, he said: 'It is.' I said: 'It is a compact. We shall be separated by many hundreds of miles during the week, but we agree to pray every night at ten o'clock.' That evening I went to my room. I felt I had no faith. The trouble was very great indeed; but I thought of Jacob—how he held on to God, and would not let Him go except He blessed him. So I cried to God, and, by and by, a settled peace came down upon me, the burden rolled away, and I was able to praise God. The next morning my wife recovered. The doctor has never laid his hand upon her since, and here she is. The Lord has also blessed us with regard to our children. They were down with measles, but we took the matter to Him, and the next morning they were better than they had been for some time. To Him is all the praise."

A lady, at present residing in Dublin, Ireland, writes: "I was anointed on April 25th, 1884, and the Lord healed me of a painful and wearying disease, which I had had from a child, and for which I had to take expensive medicine. From that day I have not touched any kind of medicine, and now find I can do many things I couldn't do before, and do without many things which I used to think most necessary. My little boy took the measles, and was very ill. I did not put him to bed, but anointed him, and gave him into the care of the Great Physician, who healed him in a few hours. The same child had, one morning, a bad sore on his leg. In the evening, it was gone. A woman with whom I prayed, was healed by the Lord of fits."

LEVUKA AND THE FIJIANS.

THE Fiji Islands are about 250 in number. They lie in the South Pacific, about 1100 miles north of New Zealand. Their gross area is 7740 square miles; but, taking in the water between them, they cover an area of 90,000 square miles. They are of volcanic origin, with lofty mountains, and are fertile and well wooded. The total population is 125,000, of whom 14,000 are whites. Prior to 1835, the islanders were sunk in heathenism, and were notorious for their ferocity and their love for human flesh as an article of diet. English missionaries went there in 1835, and labored with much success (see page 82). Finally, in 1874, the whole group fell into the possession of the English, whose fondness for acquiring possession of odd bits of territory—islands, if possible—in all parts of the world is notorious. The king was then placated with a pension of $20,000 a year.

Levuka is the largest town on the islands. Its harbor, as seen from the sea, is a sight of rare beauty. A wide level street runs around its edge, and picturesque cottages, each with a background of coconut trees, front on the street. The houses extend inland up the sides of the mountains, surrounded with banana, guava, mango, and other trees. Four fifths of the white population of Fiji reside at Levuka, and it is consequently the chief business centre of the group of islands.

The illustration on this page represents a school examination, which, like the religious services, is held frequently in the open air. It is peculiar in many aspects, and the most experienced Boston school-marm would find it a novelty not altogether agreeable. The native dress is the lava-lava, which consists of a cloth made from the bark of the paper mulberry-tree called "tapa." This is wound around the loins two or three times, the folds falling to the knee, and is fastened by a twist which the smallest girl or boy can make in the twinkling of an eye, and yet no white person can accomplish. With a school made up of adults and children of all ages so attired, the missionary passes along the line, his head protected from the sun by a fantastic umbrel'a, hearing recitations and asking questions.

A MOMENTOUS INTERVIEW IN A FIELD.

AMONG the reminiscences of a clergyman recently published is one that shows how much good may be done by a word spoken in season. He states that on the borders of his parish lived a farmer, whom he could not induce to attend his church. The man was an avowed atheist, and met all the clergyman's appeals with ridicule. He was familiar with Tom Paine's works, and such time as he gave to reading was always devoted to infidel literature. Time after time the clergyman had tried to convince him of his error, for there was good in the man. He was scrupulously honest, and was always ready to contribute to any charitable enterprise, providing that it was for the benefit of the bodies, not the souls, of the beneficiaries. He was guilty of no immorality, and exulted over the faults and failings of inconsistent professing Christians. He was always ready for a debate, and laughingly assured the clergyman that he enjoyed his visits, as they promoted mental activity.

These relations had existed for many years, when the clergyman was forced, by failing health, to take an extended holiday, and went to Europe, where he remained seven months. On his return he found awaiting him a letter from the infidel, begging him to call. He went, and to his astonishment found the man anxiously inquiring the way of salvation. He was ill with an incurable disease, and but a few weeks of life at the utmost remained for him. Inquiring what had led to the change, the infidel said that one Sunday morning, about six weeks before, he was taking a walk around his farm, as he usually did on Sunday mornings, when he noticed a field which needed hoeing. He thought he would do an hour or two of work at it, more with the object of scandalizing any who might see him than for the sake of the good he might do the field. While he was so engaged a young man entered the field, and crossed near to him. It was a warm day, and the pedestrian had taken off his coat and flung it over his shoulder. As he approached, the infidel recognized him as a young man who had recently opened a mission Sunday-school in the adjoining parish, to which he was then doubtless on his way. A short conversation ensued, in which the infidel, according to custom, ridiculed religion. The young man did not argue, but taking from among the tracts and papers he was carrying an illuminated Scripture text, handed it to the blasphemer, and advised him to hang it up in his house. It read: "He that, being often reprov- ed, hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy" (Prov. 29: 1).

The very next day he fell sick, and some weeks afterward his physician informed him that his case was hopeless. The text sounded in his ears like a prophecy fulfilled, and he was so alarmed that he resolved on sending for the clergyman, not to argue with him, but to learn. The clergyman needed no second invitation, and during the infidel's short span of life saw him frequently. From remorse the man passed to despair, and for a time it seemed as though it would be in that state that he would die. Ultimately, however, the light broke upon his soul, and he died a triumphant believer.

AMONG the islands of the South Pacific in which the missionaries have preached the Gospel and have been the means of introducing civilization are the Tonga or Friendly Islands, a numerous group once given up to barbarism and idolatry. They are now nominally Christian, and probably the real Christians there bear as large a proportion to the whole population as in the cities of America or England. Mr. Froude, the historian, who recently visited these groups of islands, informs us that so far have the people advanced in civilization that they have a kind of Congress or Parliament for legislative purposes. King George, whose portrait appears on this page, is, therefore, now in a position to sympathize with his royal brothers who have lost their despotic privileges.

It is a curious and significant fact that civilization does not seem to agree with royalty anywhere. If the royal personages of the world could be gathered together in one assemblage, and the monarchs of Germany and China, Austria and Persia, England and Madagascar, Belgium and Japan, Russia and Zululand, Sweden and Morocco—royalties every one—could meet in a friendly gathering, they might find it interesting to compare notes and consider this subject. The more intelligent the people become, the less use they seem to have for a king. Before civilization appears the king appoints all officials, and can order any obnoxious subject to instant execution; when civilization has done its work, the monarch vanishes altogether, as in France and the United States, or becomes a harmless, powerless figure-head, as in England. So King George has found civilization operate in his realm.

A Momentous Interview in a Field.

A FATAL FRAUD.

AN ORIGINAL SERIAL STORY. BY LEW VANDERPOOLE.

At a Santa Fé Hotel.

BOB CRANCE was the most skilful and successful gambler in New Mexico, and especially in Santa Fé. He was tall, dark and wiry. Except for his name, he would readily be taken for a Spaniard by the general observer.

Strangers were coming into town daily, and their advent and departure, save only in rare instances, excited little or no comment. One day, however, the stage brought two passengers who were very much out of the ordinary. One was a woman, so closely veiled that it was impossible to guess her age or color; and the other was a man. It was Stephen Vane.

Unbelievers in a particular and special Providence could not hold their belief if they had an extensive acquaintance with life. God has His instruments everywhere, and sometimes He uses some that seem to the human intelligence the most unlikely. He did so in this instance. Far away from all her friends, from all religious people, from every one likely to render her aid in her trouble, Myrtie Vane had called upon God for deliverance. There seemed no prospect of help, no one who could or would interfere on her behalf, but she prayed with strong crying and tears, and she was heard. This man Crance, rough in speech and manner, reckless and desperate on occasion, a gambler, and no one knew what besides, was the unconscious instrument appointed to do the work God required to be done. He knew nothing of his commission, had no thought of serving God in it, and even after resolving to undertake it chose his own irreligious way of doing it.

When Bob Crance (whose mornings began in the middle of the afternoon, owing to the midnight oil which he burned over his cards), got up that day to eat his breakfast, something attracted his attention from the room adjoining his. It had been vacant for a long time, and he was sure that it was vacant when he went to bed, for he was in there then looking for matches. He was equally confident that there was a woman in the room now, and that she was weeping. He knew instantly that the sorrowing one was none of the women about the hotel—her grief was too refined for that.

A moment later he stood before the door of the room, whose mysterious occupant so puzzled him. He could still hear the sound of weeping. It was not violent as if caused by anger or sudden sorrow, but subdued and full of pain, anguish and despair.

"I reckon she's been doin' that for some time," muttered Crance to himself.

He looked up and down the hall. There was no one in sight. He tried the door and found that it was fastened. A closer inspection showed that the key was on the outside, still sticking in the lock.

"Caged," he grunted. "An' by some mean vagabond, too, I'll bet."

Then unlocking the door he put the key in his pocket, and entered the room.

The weeping woman was lying on her bed with her back toward the door. She simply raised one of her small white hands, and without looking up, said:

"Don't—please, don't speak to me. You have broken my heart already."

"I reckon not, ma'am, seein' as how this is the fust time I come across ye."

The woman sprang to her feet. She was the most beautiful woman Crance had ever seen, even though her eyes were red with weeping. She regarded him at first with suspicion, and then something in his frank face seemed to inspire her with hope.

"How did you get in?" she asked. "Surely, you didn't get the key from him?"

"I found the key in the door, and I don't know who him is."

"He—he is my father," she said, dropping her eyes, "or, at least, I thought he was. They always told me so until a month ago, when he took me away from home."

A curious expression came over Crance's face. She looked like an honest girl—but circumstances and what she had just said laid her open to criticism to say the least about it.

"Well," he said, presently. "I reckon you'n yer man can fix the thing up between ye—it don't look as if it was any affair o' mine."

And with this he moved toward the door. He was half-way out into the hall before she could speak. Her tongue seemed frozen to the roof of her mouth.

"Oh, sir—please wait a moment. I have no hope if you go. Won't you help me, sir? Let me—let me tell you how I came here."

He returned, and closing the door behind him, stood against it.

"The women what come here kin tell pome tall yarns, ef they cut themselves loose once an' set in fer it. The fact is, the most on 'em don't come here fer their health. Hawsomer, I'm kinder took with you, so ye can jest start in from the fust an' gin me the hull story."

To the woman before him Crance seemed to speak in an unknown language. Something in the heartiness of his manner, however, even when he was the most ironical, was more intelligible than his words, and from this she gathered his full meaning.

She motioned him to be seated, but he shook his head, and planted himself squarely against the door with a half-comical smile.

"I reckon I'd better do picket duty," he said; "an' keep that critter from blowin' in an' makin' ye cry agin."

She was now fully assured of his protection, and the sense of relief, almost of independence, which it gave her sent a glow to her pale cheeks, and then a half-suppressed cry of admiration to Crance's lips.

"You are very kind, sir, and I am very grateful to you for it."

"Mebbe ye'd better git to the p'int afore yer fa—afore he comes."

"My name is Mystie Vane," she said, "and the man here with me is Stephen Vane. As I told you, I believed him to be my father. We lived in Virginia with my mother and grandfather and brother. My grandfather died there, and we believe he was murdered. This man was away at the time, but he returned the next day and saw my mother. A detective was there at the time, and there was a stormy scene. I do not know what occurred, but the man I thought was my father came rushing out of mamma's room like a maniac. I saw him go, and could not understand his wild manner. That night I went to bed as usual, but when I awaked I was in a place I had never seen before. I believe I was drugged and carried away in my sleep. A woman, a wretched, degraded creature was with me, and she ordered me to get up and put on these clothes, for I had no clothing of my own, except outside wraps that had been used to cover me when I was carried away in my night-clothes. I refused at first, but I could hear men talking in the next room, and that bad woman threatened to call them in if I did not dress. So I was frightened, and did as she told me.

Late at night my father took me to the railroad depot. He threatened me that he would kill me instantly if I gave any alarm, and his face showed that he would have done so for it was wild and desperate.

"We went at once to St. Louis, where we stayed for a few days, and then started in a round-about way for this place. About a month ago he told me that he was not my father, and that he was not married to my mother. A few days after that he asked me to marry him, and vowed that he would force me into a life of shame if I refused to become his wife. To-morrow he wants my final answer. I will die before I will marry him. If he would only kill me outright I wouldn't murmur, but he is reserving me for a worse fate, unless you will take me out of this place to-night."

The look that came upon her face as she was saying this—the unspeakable horror she felt at her supposed father's villainy—would have touched a harder heart than Bob Crance's.

"Poor gal!" he exclaimed, "poor, poor gal. Yes, I'll save yer—ye can jest bet on it—if I hev ter eat this 'ere Steve Vane to do it. I'll save yer from him, an' I'll do more'n that. I'll take yer back hum ter yer mother."

The weary, half-crazed girl uttered an exclamation of delight, and threw herself at his feet. Failing to catch either of his hands, she seized the skirt of his deerskin hunting shirt, and kissed that. He wrenched it from her.

"No, no, gal; it won't do. You, as is pure like the snow on the mountains, a-kissin' my old duds, an' me on'y a rough gambler, what ain't fit ter take yer away from even sich a miscreant as Steve Vane! No, no; I knows 'zactly how yer feels, but yer musn't sile yer lips on any-thing o' mine fer all that."

And then he lifted her to her feet, and smoothed her tumbled hair as tenderly as if she was his own daughter. Presently he realized what he was doing, and the blood rushed quickly into his face. Half-abashed at his gentleness, and fearful that it was indicative of weakness, he loosened her hands which were clasped about his arm, and led her to a chair.

"Ye say termorrer's yer last day o' grace, Miss Vane?"

"Yes."

"Wall, I'll git yer out o' here all safe some time ternight. Don't let on as any one's been here, an' kinder keep up yer cryin' ter keep yer—that varmint—on a string. I'll go now, but I'll come fur ye afore mo'in'. In course I'll have ter lock the door an' have the key on the outside, jest es I found it."

"You'll surely come for me by and by?"

"You bet!"

When he was gone she threw herself on the bed and wept again; but they were tears of joy which wet her pale cheeks this time.

The sun did not set early enough for Bob Crance that night. A dozen times he looked toward the west and wondered if the great yellow, purple, and carmine lights would ever vanish and stop mocking him.

He was seated at his gaming-table a full hour earlier than common—before the first lamp was lighted—impatient for some one to deal to.

At last, with its mirrors, profusion of cut glass and blazing lights, the long room was splendid with a glare and glitter which was painfully suggestive of the most reckless extravagance, combined with bad taste—not uncommon in the West.

Finally, men of every color and nationality began pouring in, and there was a smell of whiskey in the air, the sound of coarse voices, and much flashing of glasses, pistol-butts, and cards.

Still Bob Crance was not at ease. Every time a door opened he looked up quickly only to drop his eyes again, with a look of disappointment in them.

"Is he never coming?" he exclaimed, and then frowned when some one asked him what he was saying.

He was still frowning when one of the low hall-doors opened and Stephen Vane entered.

Crance's frown vanished instantly. He "took the measure," as the saying goes, of the newcomer, and seemed to be thoroughly satisfied.

Vane strolled around among the gambling-tables for half an hour before his attention was attracted by the superior skill of Crance. The two men were soon matched against each other, and then began some marvellous playing. Nothing like it was ever seen in Santa Fé before.

Gradually the loungers began grouping around the two antagonists, and in two hours business had stopped at every other table but Crance's.

The two men played on in apparent unconsciousness of the presence of their excited and almost breathless audience.

At first they seemed to be about evenly matched, and in the bosoms of some of Bob's victims, sprung up the hope that he had at last met his superior. But they were mistaken.

Suddenly Crance's lips curled scornfully, and then he drew them tightly across his teeth.

From that moment he seemed like another man. In five minutes it was plain to see that Vane had won his last game.

Crance was sweeping everything before him. Those who had known him for years then realized for the first time that, when he was in earnest, it was beyond the power of any antagonist to vanquish him.

Vane, when he discovered that he was simply playing a losing game, called several times for brandy.

After half a dozen drinks he lost his self-possession, and swore every time he lost a point.

Crance was still perfectly cool and collected. What made him keep on playing with Vane—the by-standers asked themselves. He had never acted in that way before. When a man had kept on losing stakes, and had lost his nerve, Bob Crance had always ended the game, and contented himself with teaching his opponent a lesson.

His face, too, was so changed. There was nothing in his cold eyes and set lips to remind even his dearest friend of the Bob Crance of old. About midnight, Stephen Vane was the only man in that room who did not know that his ultimate and utter ruin was what Bob Crance was playing for.

What did it mean? Why should the genial, generous-hearted Crance drive a man to the wall when he had always protested against that kind of gambling? Had these two men ever met before? Such were the questions that sprung to the lips of every man in the room but those of the two players; but no one said a word.

At length Vane grew very pale, and leaned forward on the table.

"He is dead!" exclaimed some one.

"No—not dead," answered Vane quickly, as he straightened himself up. "I am worse off than that. I am ruined. I have lost everything I had on earth!"

"Not everything," said Crance, with a strange glitter in his eyes.

"What do you mean?" demanded Vane, quickly.

"You seem to disremember the gal upstairs, pardner."

Vane started to his feet, and then sat down again.

"What has she to do with this or with you? What do you know of her?"

"Nothin' 'cept that she's a woman, an' that I'll put the pile up agin her on one game," answered Crance, as he pointed to the money, drafts, jewels, and other objects of value, which were the result of the evening's playing.

"Do—do you mean it?" asked Vane, eagerly.

"You bet!"

"The whole pile?"

"Certe."

"Done!" shouted Vane, and the strange game began.

All sympathy had been with Vane from the moment it was discovered that Crance was bent on his destruction, but Vane's shameless lack of honor and decency instantly lost him the friends he had gained. Willing to risk the woman he was protecting on a handful of money and baubles! It was too much for even the moral laxity of a Santa Fé gaming-room, and popular sympathy was again with Crance.

But sympathy was as powerless now that it was on the side of Crance, as it had been when it was against him. The first hand in the new game was disastrous for Bob. A groan of dismay went around the room.

The second deal worked better, and the gleam of exultation faded on Vane's face. The third and last hand was dealt slowly, and both men were pale. If there could be a more intense excitement than that of the two players, it was felt by the spectators. Such a game had never been played in their presence before. They had seen enormous sums staked, and had seen desperate, reckless men hazard a fortune on a single game, but they had never seen a game in which a human being was the prize. Even to them Vane's behavior was disgusting.

Of Crance's object they knew nothing. Of course they put the worst construction upon it, though it was something new in their experience of him. He had seemed to have no object in life when he was at Santa Fé but cards. He had never been suspected of admiration for the fair sex. Not a breath of scandal had ever been breathed about him. What could make him so anxious to possess this mysterious lady that he should stake against her the vast sum then lying on the gaming-table? Not that Crance was sordid. He had been known to give back to a defeated antagonist a large portion of his winnings, if he learned that the man was, in gambling parlance, "dead broke." He would on occasion be very generous in such a case, scornful to send a man out utterly ruined. But still he had an ordinary regard for his money, and must be desperately set on winning this woman before he had offered to risk so large a stake. What could his motive be? None there had the slightest suspicion that it was the pure and genuine desire to rescue her from misery and shame that prompted him. But the man was sincere, and he was trying to carry his object by the means with which he was most familiar. He was prepared to use violence rather than be defeated, but if he could succeed peaceably he preferred to do so.

Now, a few minutes would decide, and as the cards in the hands of the players dwindled the spectators seemed too much excited to breathe.

THE SECOND TEMPLE.

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 21, Ezra 1-4; 3: 8-13. Golden Text, 3: 11. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Encouragement to Pray for Rulers—The Infamy of the British Government—The Coming of Cyrus Predicted—His Heart Influenced—His Acknowledgment of God—His Charge and Proclamation—Heathen Contributions—The Gathering at Jerusalem—The Praise Meeting at the Laying of the Stone—The Enemies Thwarted—The Work Finished.

THE wondrous dealings of God with the Gentile kings who were brought in contact with His people is a strong incentive to such of us as really know Him to pray in faith for our rulers. Perhaps such an exhibition of the moral corruption of a professedly Christian land has never been so shamefully made as in the recent prosecution in England of Mr. Stead and his assistants for a caricature of crime, committed in the course of investigations directed to expose the actual and habitual commission of the most hideous, ghastly, and horrible crimes by persons whom the British Government, for purposes of their own, thus shield, and consequently encourage in the commission of them. Alas! the time is past when one could say, with conscious pride, "I am an Englishman or an Englishwoman," for is upon us before the world, and our place is in the dust. What then? Shall we take matters into our own hands, and declare that, come what may, we will obey such a Government no more? Or shall we carry our appeal to a mightier Power, and call our God to undertake the purification of our rulers at any cost, that no longer a premium may be set on sin? The latter course shall be mine.

Nearly two hundred years before his time God had prophesied of Cyrus, King of Persia, by name, "Thus saith the Lord to His anointed, to Cyrus, whose right hand I have holden, to subdue nations before him. . . . I have raised him up in righteousness, and I will direct all his ways: he shall build My city, and he shall let go My captives, not for price nor reward, saith the Lord of hosts" (Isa. 45: 1, 13). Now we see this word of God in its fulfilment. Not by Isaiah alone, but by Jeremiah also, had God foretold the end of the captivity: "And it shall come to pass, when seventy years are accomplished, that I will punish the King of Babylon" (Jer. 25: 12). "After seventy years be accomplished at Babylon I will visit you, and perform My good word to you, in causing you to return to this place. . . . And I will be found of you, saith the Lord: and I will turn away your captivity" (Jer. 29: 10, 14). "I will cause the captivity of Judah and the captivity of Israel to return, and I will build them, as at the first" (Jer. 33: 7; see also to ver. 14).

"Now in the first year of Cyrus king of Persia, that the word of the Lord by the mouth of Jeremiah might be fulfilled, the Lord stirred up the spirit of Cyrus." The prophet prayed in the Spirit, God heard his prayer, and worked on the heart of Cyrus. Oh, if we could learn to deal more directly with God, we should see Him dealing with the mighty ones of earth whom we have no power to touch! Cyrus "made a proclamation throughout all his kingdom, and put it also in writing, saying, Thus saith Cyrus king of Persia, The Lord God of heaven hath given me all the kingdoms of the earth." That which Nebuchadnezzar was so slow to learn and to acknowledge, that which Belshazzar learned when it was too late, Cyrus not only learned early in his reign, but testified to with the utmost publicity, so gloriously was God working in and by him. "And He hath charged me to build Him a house at Jerusalem, which is in Judah."

"HE HATH CHARGED ME."

Cyrus was not ashamed to own himself under authority to God. Could the English Government say: "God has charged us to prosecute the apostle of social purity, and to shield the titled fornicators of England?" Surely not. How wonderfully God was in this proclamation of Cyrus! Had he been like the former kings of Babylon and Persia, he would have built a house somewhere in his own metropolis, and not in the smallest, most destitute province of his empire! But God was at work, and He brought the mind of Cyrus into accordance with His. So the proclamation ran on: "Who is there among you of all His people? his God be with him, and let him go up to Jerusalem, which is in Judah, and build the house of the Lord God of Israel (He is the God) which is in Jerusalem." And this was not all. God willed that the temple should be rebuilt, and no time was lost in going round to beg for donations; no subscription-lists were made, no bazaars or other worldly inducements which might trick people into giving, partly for their own enjoyment and partly for a good object, money which they could not spare if it were squarely stated that it was for God. No; in this work God saw to the financial department, and put it into the king's heart to say: "Whosoever remaineth in any place where he sojourneth, let the men of his place help him with silver, and with gold, and with goods, and with beasts, beside the free will offering for the house of God which is at Jerusalem."

But would people be found to obey what seems so unreasonable a demand? Could it be that heathen people would willingly give of their substance to re-establish a religion which must be the downfall of their own? Yes; because

GOD'S HAND WAS IN IT.

The leading men of Judah and Benjamin and the priests and Levites came under the power of the Spirit of God in this call to rebuild His temple, "and all they that were about them" poured in upon them contributions to the work, so that from beginning to end there was no begging. Oh, if our dear Christian workers could but know the blessing of only dealing with God about money, and leaving Him to deal with man, half their difficulties in His service would vanish away, and half their unfair condemnation of others who do not help their special work as much as they think they ought! Unwilling gifts screwed out of people by constant appeals made to them are never so blest as the spontaneous gift which God has laid it on the heart to give. He is able to bring forth help, as in this case, from most unlikely quarters. The king's contribution in kind was the most precious of all, the vessels of the house of God, which he had rescued from the desecration of Belshazzar.

THE GATHERING AT JERUSALEM.

Nearly fifty thousand souls went up from Babylon, with not only their own personal freedom from slavery, not only with provisions for the way, but also money wherewith to build the temple of God, and all this was accomplished in a very short space of time. The returned captives had, very naturally, each gone to his own city. But on the seventh month, the first of the three great feasts of the Jews after their return, they gathered together as one man at Jerusalem. Before all things, in any work of God there must be unity among the workers; without this little can be done, and this comes about by each one referring all to God, and letting Him settle all differences. They next built an altar, and offered burnt offerings, a type of consecration. Unless we do yield ourselves fully up to the Lord as having no longer any right to ourselves, to our time, talents, money, reputation, past, present, or future, we are not in a position to build in the temple of the Lord. They next kept the feast of tabernacles. Just delivered from captivity, this was most significant. They had learned that God could uproot them from the surest dwelling-place, and they bore witness in the keeping of this feast that they were strangers and sojourners with Him. Thus they began to worship before they began to work; this is God's order.

Meanwhile, preparations were being made for the building: masons and carpenters were hired, men were sent to bring timber from Lebanon, which was to be brought by sea from Tyre to Joppa, and this occupied the remainder of that year. Then they began in good earnest, the high-priest being the architect. While the foundation was being laid was held. There were none of the flattering eulogies to man which make one's heart sad when one reads a description of the laying of foundation-stones of churches and religious institutions; on this occasion all the praise was directed where it really belongs—to God. "When the builders laid the foundation of the temple of the Lord, they set the priests in their apparel with trumpets, and the Levites the sons of Asaph with cymbals, to praise the Lord, after the ordinance of David king of Israel. And they sang together by course in praising and giving thanks unto the Lord; because He is good, for His mercy endureth forever. . . . And all the people shouted with a great shout, when they praised the Lord, because the foundation of the house of the Lord was laid." They were glad, but it was not unmingled joy. Some of the old men remembered the house of the Lord which had been destroyed because of their sins and the sins of their people; and though they too could rejoice, it was, like Paul, "sorrowful yet always rejoicing" (11 Cor. 6: 10).

It was not likely that the devil would let this work go on unhindered. He stirred up enemies, who first attempted to join common cause with them. But Zerubbabel and Jeshua would have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness. So they stirred up evil reports against God's people, and the work was hindered for years, until Haggai and Zechariah, the prophets, came and stirred up the people to see that it was God's mind that the house should be built; they were to look at Him, and not to heed men. So the work went on until the enemies of the Jews again interfered. But this time "the eye of their God was upon the elders of the Jews, that they could not cause them to cease, till the matter came unto Darius" (Ezra 5: 5). And while the work was steadily progressing, God, in whom they were trusting, worked for them in Persia, and made the very letter of their enemies a means of confirming by a present royal decree of Darius, the king, the former decree of Cyrus, so that they had royal authority and government protection, and also the charge: "Let it be done with speed" (Ezra 6: 12). "The work was soon finished, and the children of Israel kept the dedication with joy, because God had turned the heart of the king of Assyria unto them, to strengthen their hands in the work of the House of God, the God of Israel" (Ezra 6: 22). Why should not we band together in the prayer of faith to put our rulers into the hands of God, that their hearts may be turned to see with God, and act with God, on the drink question and on the cause of social purity, which things are ruining our country?

"DRAW NEAR TO ME, O LORD!"

Draw near to me, O Lord!
And let me lean my head upon Thy breast;
'Tis promised in Thy Word
That there the troubled soul shall find its rest.

And mine is tempest-tossed;
And, drifting o'er this stormy sea of life,
I fear it will be lost:
O shield me from its dangers—from its strife!

Keep me from every sin.
My wayward heart is prone to linger o'er,
That I may enter in
And share Thy rest with loved ones "gone before."

I yield to Thee, dear Lord,
My earthly hopes, my idols—every one;
I crave but one reward—
The grace to feel and say, "Thy will be done."

The Late Major-General WINFIELD SCOTT HANCOCK. Born Feb. 14, 1824; Died Feb. 9, 1886.

THE LATE GENERAL W. S. HANCOCK.
 His Sudden Death—A National Loss—Ancestry and Early Life—First Services—The Civil War—An Old Prayer Book—First Battle—At Gettysburg—Wounded—Subsequent Services—Presidential Nomination—Personal Characteristics.

SCARCELY had the nation recovered from the shock of McClellan's death when it was startled by the news that the great soldier-patriot whose portrait appears this week on the first page of this journal had passed away. Death has been very busy during the past twelve months, and it has taken choice prey. Within a year three of our greatest surviving generals have been vanquished by the last enemy. Grant, McClellan, and now Hancock have gone the way appointed for all living, and they leave the nation poorer by their departure.

The suddenness of the shock renders it the more startling. Scarcely any one outside the family circle knew at the beginning of last week that General Hancock was ill, and, down to the very last, the general public received no preparatory warning of the impending blow. On Tuesday afternoon, February 9th, the sad intelligence that he was dead was flashed from city to city, and everywhere it called forth expressions of sorrow. Southerners who had fought against him, and Republicans who had worked against him, alike spoke of him with respect, and all were sorry that he was dead. On January 28th he was in Washington on business, and appeared to be in his usual robust health, except that a boil on the back of his neck caused him discomfort. But an old friend, an army surgeon, lanced the boil, and he was relieved. There were, however, constitutional disorders not suspected at that time which were doing fatal work. He was suffering from diabetes, though he was not aware of the fact, and under the influence of that malignant disorder the boil became a carbuncle. He attended to his usual duties until Sunday, February 7th, when he admitted that he felt unwell, and did not rise from his bed. No serious alarm, however, was felt until the following day, when his physician noticed his prostration. About four o'clock on Tuesday morning he became unconscious, and ten hours later he died.

ANCESTRY AND EARLY LIFE.

The name of Hancock is associated with revolutionary days. The General's grandfather was a Revolutionary soldier, who was captured at sea by the British, and was imprisoned at Dartmoor. His mother's maiden name was Elizabeth Haworth. Her grandfather served in the Continental armies, and died soon after the close of the Revolution from exposure in the rigors of the service. Her father went into the Revolutionary ranks when only a lad of fifteen, and returned to the battle-field five times as a member of different regiments. At Taneytown, Md., his command was called upon to escort Burgoyne's prisoners, captured at Saratoga, to Valley Forge. For his services in the Revolution he received a pension during life. Benjamin Franklin Hancock, the General's father, served in the War of 1812, and afterward became a lawyer of distinction in Montgomery County, Pa., and there Winfield Scott Hancock was born on the 14th of February, 1824. He was therefore under sixty-two years old when he died. His twin brother was named Hilary, but General Winfield Scott's name was on everybody's tongue, and Benjamin Franklin Hancock, the General's patriotic father, was resolved to give one of his new-born sons the name of the sturdy old hero of Lundy's Lane.

His education up to his sixteenth year was at the Norristown Academy. In 1840, when he was sixteen years of age, he received a nomination from the Congressman of the district for West Point, and though his father intended him to be a lawyer, the nomination was accepted. He entered the training school on July 1st of that year, and passed his first examination creditably. Among the names of the cadets who were either classmates or contemporaries of Hancock's at the Academy are many who afterward became famous. Such are Generals U. S. Grant, George B. McClellan, Franklin, William F. Smith, J. F. Reynolds, Rosecrans, Lyon, and others of the Union army, and Stonewall Jackson, Longstreet, Pickett, and E. K. Smith of the Confederate service.

FIRST SERVICES.

Hancock graduated in 1844, being brevetted second lieutenant in the Sixth Infantry. At the time of his graduation General Scott, who had exhibited a warm interest in his namesake, asked him to what regiment he preferred being assigned, to which the young man replied, "The one which is stationed furthest West." The company to which he was assigned was stationed at Fort Towson, in the Indian country, near the Red River, whence he and his companions, in the course of their military duty, made frequent excursions into the neighboring country of Texas. In June, 1846, he received a full commission as second lieutenant. After performing some recruiting service in Kentucky and Missouri he was ordered to Mexico in 1847, and took part in several of the later battles of the war. He was honored with a brevet-second-lieutenancy for conspicuous gallantry at Cherubusco and Contreras, and was placed in command of a company composed of soldiers who had fought in the Seminole and other Indian wars. His company, which belonged to General Worth's division, was one of the last to leave the City of Mexico after the declaration of peace.

He went with his division to Jefferson Barracks, on the Mississippi River, a few miles south of St. Louis, and remained there till the autumn of 1848. He was removed to Iowa that year, but in 1850 he was again at St. Louis. It was while there that he was married to the daughter of Samuel Russell, a prosperous merchant of St. Louis. The marriage took place January 24th, 1850, and there are living in St. Louis a number of people who were well acquainted with the handsome young officer at that time. He was but a lieutenant in the army, and there was some opposition on the part of Miss Russell's parents to the marriage, which proved to be one of great happiness.

His life during the next few years was passed in continual movement. His first station was in Florida, thence he was ordered to Kansas, thence to Utah, and thence to Los Angeles, Cal. He was there in 1861 when the war broke out.

THE CIVIL WAR.

He promptly applied for active service, and General Scott, who had personal knowledge of his impetuous gallantry and his real soldierly ability while serving in the sharp and hot Mexican War, at once ordered him East, in accordance with his request. The order for his transfer came August 3d, 1861, and Captain Hancock started for the East, reaching New York in September. Without stopping for a moment, even to visit his parents at Norristown, although he had been absent from them for more than two years, he pushed straight on to Washington, and reported to the War Department. He was then nearly thirty-eight years old.

AN OLD PRAYER-BOOK.

A remarkable incident of his life may be mentioned here as a significant illustration of the esteem in which he was held by men who did not agree with him, and of the confidence which, all through his life, was reposed in his integrity and scrupulous honor by his opponents. When secession was on every man's lips Hancock was very pronounced in his declarations of loyalty, but many of his brother-officers in California determined to cast in their lot with the South. Among them was General Armistead, then a captain and brevet-major. Virginia, his native State, called upon him to support her cause, and, under the influence of this demand, he sided with the Confederates. On leaving Los Angeles he presented General Hancock with his major's uniform, saying that the latter "might some time need it." He also placed in his hands for safe keeping, and to be given to his family if he should fall in battle, certain valuable private papers. These General Hancock sent to General Armistead's sister at the close of the war. Armistead also presented to Hancock a little prayer-book, which General Hancock retained all his life afterward as a treasured possession. On a fly-leaf of the book is the following inscription: "Lewis A. Armistead. Trust in God and fear nothing." It so happened that Armistead fell within General Hancock's lines while leading his command in the celebrated Pickett charge, and before he died requested that his sword, spurs, and other personal effects be delivered to General Hancock, who, he said, would see that they were placed in the hands of his sister. The dying bequest of his old comrade-in-arms was faithfully executed. There is something very touching in the incident of the dying man desiring his valuables to be given to his successful opponent as a sacred trust.

FIRST BATTLE.

His first battle was at Warwick Court-House, where he led his command in person, and soon after performed a conspicuous and important part in the battle of Williamsburg. It was at this latter engagement that he made his impatient men wait till the Confederates were within one hundred yards, and then dashed forward on his horse, waving his hat, and shouted: "Forward! forward! forward!" He repulsed the enemy with great loss, and won the day. It was a signal victory, and Williamsburg was the birth-place of his military fame, which grew from that day on. McClellan telegraphed President Lincoln: "Hancock was superb to-day." So thought the brave men who followed him in that memorable countercharge. His favorite tactics, which he always adopted whenever he could, were to hold a position stubbornly without moving. Then to wait for a second or a third onslaught, until he observed signs of weariness in the enemy, when he would give the word for which his men had been anxiously waiting, and lead them forward to a countercharge.

At the close of the Peninsular campaign, by the advice of McClellan, he was made major-general of volunteers, and in the mean time he participated in the battles of South Mountain and Antietam. At Mayer's Heights, on December 13th, 1862, he also took a conspicuous part, and when he reached his tent at night he had a flesh wound, his clothes were riddled with bullets, and all his aides were dead or wounded.

AT GETTYSBURG.

He is best remembered as commander of the Second Corps, because it was as its General that he gained the day at Gettysburg, which decisive battle was begun July 1st, 1863. He had been in command of the Second Corps hardly a month, but General Meade, then in command of the Army of the Potomac, had learned to place a high value on his military qualities, and before the battle of Gettysburg sent General Hancock to examine the ground in front of the Federal forces and report on the advisability of making a stand against the invading forces of General Lee. Hancock came back and said fight, and fight they did. That battle will be memorable while the world lasts. Hancock held the left centre, and it was against him that Pickett's magnificent charge of eighteen thousand brave Virginians was directed. The story of that greatest battle of the war is well known. Hancock performed invaluable service on each of the three days. Just as he had repulsed the Confederates on the third day he was shot through the thigh, and had to be borne from the field, not, however, until he had dictated a despatch to General Meade, telling him the victory was complete.

Speaking recently in New York of that battle, the Rev. Dr. Paxton said: "I was a private soldier, and stood with my musket, trembling, a little fellow eighteen years old. My regiment was held to support five pieces of cannon. I was scared to death, and would have run. Along our line came General Hancock. Shells were bursting, men were groaning, the dead were lying here and there; I frightened as if at the mouth of hell. Suddenly in the midst of our collapse a man on a horse rode down the line. It was awful, but that man rode down the line, tall, magnificent, the incarnation of a hero, the grandest soldier. He rode on the horse, not a muscle quivering, and looking us in the face, said: 'Gentlemen—he called his soldiers gentlemen—we are left to keep them in check until the second line is formed. Hancock relies on the old First Brigade.' I became a hero by that man's influence. No Plutarch could have done that for me."

General Hancock's wound was serious. The musket ball which hit him passed through his saddle, bending a wrought-iron nail about it as it went, both ball and nail penetrating General Hancock's body. This wound was a source of serious trouble to General Hancock during his campaigns under Grant, and during the battles of the Wilderness compelled him at one time to retire temporarily from command. He was taken on a stretcher to the railroad, and the stretcher was suspended over the seats of the car, but the motion of the train caused him excruciating agony. He was carried to his father's house at Norristown, and carefully and tenderly nursed back to life. It was not until December, 1863, that he was sufficiently recovered to sit on his horse, but immediately that he could do so he reported for duty. This was the only bad injury General Hancock received during the war, though he took part in all the fiercest engagements of the sanguinary Virginia campaign. At Ream's Station he had a horse shot under him.

AFTER THE WAR.

In November, 1864, General Hancock was summoned to Washington to organize an army of fifty thousand veterans who had served their term of enlistment, but the surrender of General Lee rendered the step needless. For his services during the war Hancock was made a brigadier and afterward a major-general in the regular army, and assigned to the command of the Middle Department. A year later, in 1867, President Johnson appointed him to relieve General Sheridan as commander of the Fifth District, comprising Louisiana and Texas. This was the "reconstruction" period, and General Hancock's notions of his duty brought him into collision with Northern sentiment. He was expected to rule his district as a commander rules when martial law is proclaimed. When he issued his famous General Order, No. 40, a crisis was developed which brought North and South into antagonism. The North was amazed to learn from the order that General Hancock subordinated the military to the civil power, and did not propose to use the authority with which he was clothed except when required to do so by the civil authorities. His conduct won him the enthusiastic regard of the South and the Democracy everywhere, but it raised such hostility in the dominant spirits of the Government that General Hancock saw he could not hold his position without grave embarrassment to all concerned. He accordingly asked to be relieved. He was transferred to the Division of the Atlantic, with headquarters at New York, where he served until May 17th, 1869, when he was transferred to the Department of Dakota. On the death of General Meade, in 1872, he was again assigned to the Division of the Atlantic, and he has remained here ever since, his headquarters being in this city until 1878, when they were transferred to Governor's Island.

PRESIDENTIAL NOMINATION.

General Hancock's conduct in Louisiana rendered him an ideal candidate with all Democrats for the Presidency. Accordingly, in 1868, and again in 1872, he came near a nomination. Finally, in 1880, the Cincinnati Convention nominated him on the third ballot. The incidents of that fierce campaign are fresh in the recollection of all. In spite of the vigor with which it was prosecuted, the campaign speakers and the party organs refrained from flinging dirt at the Democratic candidate. Personally he was held in the highest esteem, and the arguments used against him were based on the assumption that he knew so little of politics that he would be a mere tool, if elected, in the hands of others. The closeness on the popular vote showed what a hold General Hancock had upon the hearts of his countrymen. Garfield was elected on the popular vote by but 9,464 plurality, receiving 4,454,416 votes to 4,444,952 for Hancock. On the Electoral vote Garfield received a majority of 59, having 214 votes to Hancock's 155.

His equanimity on the occasion was an evidence of his greatness. On that memorable night, when it seemed that the greatest office on earth was within his grasp, he was calm and unmoved by the suspense. He quietly attended to his duties, and then retired to rest at his usual hour. Early in the morning his wife awakened him, and told him of his defeat. "All is for the best," he said, and quietly turned over and went to sleep again. He was one of the first to congratulate President Garfield on his election, and his dignity and magnanimity raised him still higher in the esteem of his countrymen.

Since the election General Hancock had taken no part in politics, and was very rarely seen in public. He was always to be found attending to his military duties on Governor's Island quietly and unostentatiously. His last appearance in a public capacity was at the funeral of General Grant, in August, 1885, when he had charge of the obsequies, and headed the great pageant in its impressive march to Riverside Park. At the funeral of McClellan, in November last, he was also present with other officers to do honor to his old friend and commander. In appearance Hancock was tall and well formed. He was six feet two inches high, and to the last was upright and dignified in deportment. An intimate friend, describing him some months ago, said: "His eyes are blue, and have a benignant and mild expression when in repose, but inspiring when in danger. His manner is dignified and knightly, and he is courtesy itself. He is always magnetic, and draws men to him by his kindness and gentle interest in their affairs. His sympathies are easily aroused, and he becomes intensely concerned for the sorrows and misfortunes of others, striving in every way to relieve them, as though their troubles were his own." Of his moral character there is no better testimony than that extorted from the New York Tribune, a paper which was his fierce and sometimes unscrupulous opponent; but even that journal says: "His life was honorable, useful, and patriotic. A braver soldier, a more honest and manly man, a more courteous gentleman, a truer friend, never lived than Winfield Scott Hancock. He did his duty steadfastly and well, and his memory will live with those of the patriots, his predecessors, who have 'deserved well of the Republic.'"

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

One More Man upon the Wreck.—At a recent meeting Mr. Smith said: "The late Dr. Guthrie used to tell an incident of a vessel that came upon a wreck. They went on board, and found the emaciated form of a young man lying among a bundle of canvas. He was at the last extremity, and they thought he was all that was left of this sinking wreck. They saw that the poor skeleton was making an effort to speak: they listened, and heard him say: 'There is another man.' It was all he could say, but it was enough; he had done what he could to save his fellow-creature. And that is all God expects of you and of me. Oh, friends, let us work for eternity; let us work for God, for the night cometh when no man can work!"

A Dying Engine Driver's Request.—"I Read of a terrible wreck of an American train. A bridge gave way over which it was passing, and down went the train into a deep ravine below. Numbers of men began to take out the passengers with great difficulty, and they came upon the engine driver lying among the débris mor- tally wounded; he had but a few moments to live. He did not speak of his wife, who would be so soon a widow, nor of his family, who would in a short space of time be fatherless, nor of himself, who was so near eternity. Only one short sentence could the dying man utter, and it was for the good of his fellow-creatures. With faltering breath he said, 'Hoist the danger flag for the next train.' Dear Christians, I beg of you for the love of God, and for the love of your fellow-creatures, hoist the danger flag of sin; there may be many poor sinners rushing heedlessly to their doom because you neglect to hoist the danger flag."

Too Late After All!—Mr. Smith said: "A young woman was taken ill in Glasgow. A friend of mine called upon her, and spoke to her of the necessity of accepting salvation through Jesus without delay. 'Yes; I would like to be saved,' she murmured, wearily, 'but wait a little; I am so weak.' Again a little later my friend spoke lovingly to her, but with the same result. 'Yes, oh yes; but wait a little; I am so very weak.' Her friends, seeing that rapid consumption was doing its deadly work, began to be seriously alarmed. They wished to see the life to be spent with Jesus in heaven begin on earth. And when the shades of death began to cross her face, with intense earnestness they again asked her the state of her soul. This time came the sad reply, 'I wish I had been saved, but it is too late now.' Thus her unforgiven spirit in its unchanged state passed into eternity. Dear friends, do not put off believing in Christ any longer, for how faithfully God warns us that 'now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation.'"

Four Condemned Murderers Reprieved.—"A number of years ago four persons were charged with murder. The mother of two of the prisoners, young men, went all the way to Balmoral to plead with the Queen for a pardon for her sons. She travelled on the mail coach, which carried a reprieve for her sons, although she knew it not. One of the condemned group, a young woman, was sitting in prison with the cloud of death hanging over her young life. Two men entered her cell, with a pardon from the Queen. 'We carry very important news to you,' they said; and producing a large document, one of them began to read it. I suppose there was a great deal of it that the poor girl did not understand, but there was one sentence she did understand: 'Herewith her gracious Majesty sends a free pardon to Alice Rhodes.' It was enough; the Queen's seal was stamped upon the pardon. The girl lifted up her chain-bound hands, and clasping them, exclaimed, 'Thank God, I am free.' And, dear friends, when the blood-red seal of heaven's pardon is stamped upon a sinner, he is free indeed."

An Infidel's Fear of Judgment.—An Evangelist related: "When I was living in the North I learned of an infidel who was dying. He called his sister to his bedside, and said, 'I have just one dying request to make of you; will you do it?' 'If it is in my power I will do it,' she said. 'But that will not do,' replied the dying man. 'Promise me that you will fulfil my last request.' 'Dear brother,' said his sister, 'you know that I love you, and would do anything for you! and if it is within the limits of my power, I will grant your last request.' With some difficulty the dying infidel raised himself on his elbow, while a shudder ran through his frame, and he said, 'I want you to have me buried away out in that lonely point,' naming the spot. 'Dear brother, why be buried away in that lonely and desolate point, where nothing but the fierce wind and the storms of winter can come near you? Why not be buried with the rest of the family in our own quiet spot in the cemetery ground?' With a groan he raised himself a little higher in the bed, and sadly replied, 'I want to be forgotten by God in the Judgment Day.' But, dear friends, God cannot forget. He will gather all the guilty and the guiltless before Him. God cannot forget. We must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ."

COSTUME AND MORALS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, Feb. 14, 1886.

"Moreover the Lord said, Because the daughters of Zion are haughty, and walk with stretched-forth necks and wanton eyes, walking and mincing as they go, and making a tinkling with their feet: in that day the Lord will take away the bravery of their tinkling ornaments about their feet, and their cauls, and their round tires like the moon, the chains, and the bracelets, and the mufflers, the bonnets, and the ornaments of the legs, and the headbands, and the tablets, and the earrings, the rings, and nose-jewels, the changeable suits of apparel, and the mantles, and the wimples, and the crisping pins, the glasses, and the fine linen, and the hoods, and the veils."—ISA. 3 : 16, 18-23.*

THIS is a Jerusalem fashion plate. It puts us two thousand six hundred years back, and sets us down in an ancient city. The procession of men and women is moving up and down the gay streets. It is the height of the fashionable season. The sensible men and women move with so much modesty that they do not attract our attention. But here come the haughty daughters of Jerusalem! They lean forward; they lean very much forward—so far forward as to be unnatural—teetering, wobbling, wriggling, flirting, or, as my text describes it, they "walk with stretched-forth necks, walking and mincing as they go."

See! That is a princess. Look! That is a Damascus sword-maker. Look! That is a Syrian merchant. The jingling of the chains, and the lashing of the headbands, and the exhibitions of universal swagger attract the attention of the Prophet Isaiah, and he brings his camera to bear upon the scene, and takes a picture for all the ages. But where is that scene? Vanished. Where are those gay streets? Vermen-covered population pass through them. Where are the hands, and the necks, and the foreheads, and the shoulders, and the feet that sported all that magnificence? Ashes! Ashes!

That we should all be clad is proved by the opening of

THE FIRST WARDROBE

1. Paradise, with its apparel of dark green. That we should all as far as our means allow us be beautifully and gracefully apparelled is proved by the fact that God never made a wave but He gilded it with golden sunbeams, or a tree but He garlanded it with blossoms, or a sky but He studded it with stars, or allowed even the smoke of a furnace to ascend but He columned, and turreted, and doled, and scrolled it into outlines of indescribable gracefulness. When I see the apple-orchards of the spring and the pageantry of the autumnal forests, I come to the conclusion that if nature ever does join the Church, while she may be a Quaker in the silence of her worship, she never will be a Quaker in the style of her dress. Why the notches of a fern leaf or the stamen of a water lily? Why, when the day departs, does it let the folding doors of heaven stay open so long, when it might go in so quickly? One summer morning I saw an army of a million spears, each one adorned with a diamond of the first water—I mean the grass with the dew on it.

When the prodigal came home his father not only put a coat on his back, but jewelry on his hand. Christ wore a beard, Paul, the bachelor apostle, not afflicted with any sentimentality, admired the arrangement of a woman's hair, when he said in his epistle: "If a woman have long hair, it is a glory unto her." There will be fashion in heaven as on earth, but it will be a different kind of fashion. It will decide the color of the dress; and the population of that country, by a beautiful law, will wear white.

THE GODDESS OF FASHION.

I say these things as a background to my sermon, to show you that I have no prim, precise, prudish, or cast-iron theories on the subject of human apparel; but the goddess of fashion has set up her throne in this country, and at the sound of the timbrels we are all expected to fall down and worship. Her altars smoke with the sacrifice of the bodies and souls of ten thousand victims.

When I come to count the victims of fashion I find as many masculine as feminine. Men make an easy tirade against woman, as though she were the chief worshipper at this idolatrous shrine, and no doubt some men in the more conspicuous part of the pew have already cast glances at the more retired part of the pew, their look a prophecy of a generous distribution. My sermon shall be as appropriate for one end of the pew as for the other.

MASCULINE FOLLIES.

Men are as much the idolaters of fashion as women, but they sacrifice on a different part of the altar. With men the fashion goes to cigars, and club-rooms and yachting parties, and wine suppers. In the United States the men chew up and smoke one hundred millions of dollars' worth of tobacco every year. That is their fashion. In London not long ago a man died who started in life with $750,000; but he ate it all up in gluttonies, sending his agents to all parts of the earth for some rare delicacy for the palate, sometimes one plate of food costing him three or four hundred dollars. He ate up his whole fortune, and had only one guinea left. With that he bought a woodcock, and had it dressed in the very best style, ate it, gave two hours for digestion, then walked out on Westminster Bridge and threw himself into the Thames and died, doing on a large scale what you and I have often seen done on a small scale.

But men do not abstain from millinery and elaboration of skirt through any superiority of simplicity. It is only because such appendages would be a blockade to business. What would sashes and trains three and a half yards long do in a stock market? And yet men are the disciples of custom just as much as women. Some of them wear boots so tight that they can hardly walk in the paths of righteousness, and there are men who buy expensive suits of clothes and never pay for them, and who go through the streets in great stripes of color, like animated checkerboards. I say these things because I want to show you that I am impartial in my discourse, and that both sexes, in the language of the surrogate's office, "share and share alike."

INDELICATE APPAREL.

As God may help me I am going to set forth the evil effects of improper dress or an excessive discipleship of costume. It is a simple truth that you all know, although the pulpit has not yet uttered it, that much of the womanly costume of our time is the cause of the temporal and eternal damnation of a multitude of men. There is a shamelessness among many in what is called high life that calls for vehement protest. The strife with many seems to be how near they can come to the verge of indecency without falling over. The tide of masculine profligacy will never turn back until there is a decided reformation in womanly costume. I am in full sympathy with the officer of the law who, at a levee in Philadelphia last winter, went up to a so-called lady, and because of her sparse and incompetent apparel, ordered her either to leave the house or habilitate herself immediately. It is high time that our good and sensible women make vehement protest against fashionable indecency, and if the women of the household do not realize the deplorable extremes of much of the female costume, that husbands implead their wives on this subject, and that fathers prohibit their daughters. The evil is terrific and overshadowing.

STAGE COSTUMES.

I suppose that the American stage is responsible for much of this. I do not go to theatres, so I must take the evidence of the actors and managers of theatres, such as Mr. John Gilbert, Mr. A. M. Palmer, and Mr. Daniel E. Bandmann. They have recently told us that the crime of undress is blasting the theatre, which by many is considered a school of morals, and indeed superior to the Church, and a forerunner of the millennium. Mr. Palmer says: "The bulk of the performances on the stage are degrading and pernicious. The managers strive to come just as near the line as possible without flagrantly breaking the law. There never have been costumes worn on a stage of this city, either in a theatre, hall, or 'dive,' so improper as those that clothe some of the chorus in recent comic opera productions." He says in regard to the female performers: "It is not a question whether they can sing but just how little they will consent to wear." Mr. Bandmann, who has been twenty-nine years on the stage, and before almost all nationalities, says: "I unhesitatingly state that the taste of the present theatre-going people of America, as a body, is of a coarse and vulgar nature. The Hindoo would turn with disgust at such exhibitions, which are sought after and applauded on the stage of this country. Our shop windows are full of and the walls covered with show cards and posters which should be a disgrace to an enlightened country and an insult to the eye of a cultured community." Mr. Gilbert says: "Such exhibition is a disastrous one to the morals of the community. Are these proper pictures to put out for the public to look at, to say nothing of the propriety of females appearing in public dressed like that? It is shameful!"

I must take the testimony of the friends of the theatre and the confirmation which I see on the board fences and in the show windows containing the pictures of the way actresses dress. I suppose that those representations of play-house costume are true, for if they are not true, then those highly moral and religious theatres are swindling the public by inducing the people to the theatre by promises of spectacular nudity which they do not fulfil. Now, all this familiarizes the public with such improprieties of costume and depresses the public conscience as to what is allowable and right.

DRAWING-ROOM RIVALRY.

The parlor and drawing-room are now running a race with the theatre and opera bouffe. They are now nearly neck and neck in the race, the latter a little ahead; but the parlor and drawing-room are gaining on the others, and the probability is they will soon be even and pass the stand so nearly at the same time that one half of Pandemonium will clap its hands because opera bouffe has beaten, and the other half because the drawing-room has beaten. Let printing-press, and platform, and pulpit hurl red-hot anathema at the boldness of much of womanly attire. I charge Christian women, neither by style of dress nor adjustment of apparel, to become administrative of evil. Show me the fashion plates of any age between this and the time of Louis XVI., of France, and Henry VIII., of England, and I will tell you the type of morals or immorals of that age or that year. No exception to it. Modest apparel means a righteous people. Immodest apparel always means a contaminated and depraved society.

EXTRAVAGANCE.

It is not only such boldness that is to be reprehended, but extravagance of costume. This latter is the cause of fraud unlimitable and ghastly. Do you know that Arnold of the Revolution proposed to sell his country in order to get money to support his home wardrobe? I declare here before God and this people that the effort to keep up expensive establishments in this country is sending more business men to

* The list of feminine treasures given by the Revised Version is more intelligible. It is: "Their anklets, and the networks, and the crescents; the pendants, and the bracelets, and the mufflers; the head-tires, and the ankle-chains, and the sashes, and the perfume boxes, and the amulets; the rings, and the nose-jewels; the festival-ropes, and the mantles, and the shawls, and the satchels; the hand-mirrors, and the fine linen, and the turbans, and the veils."

temporal perdition than all other causes combined. It was this that sent prominent business men to the watering of stocks, and life insurance presidents to perjured statements about their assets, and some of them to the penitentiary, and has completely upset our American finances.

But why should I go to these famous defaultings, to show what men will do in order to keep up great home style and expensive wardrobe, when you and I know scores of men who are put to their wit's end and are lashed from January to December in the attempt? Our Washington politicians may theorize until the expiration of their terms of office as to the best way of improving our monetary condition in this country. It will be of no use, and things will be no better until we learn to put on our heads and backs and feet and hands no more than we can pay for.

AN INCENTIVE TO DISHONESTY.

There are clerks in stores and banks on limited salaries who in the vain attempt to keep the wardrobe of their family as showy as other folk's wardrobes are dying of muffs, and diamonds, and camel's-hair shawls, and high hats, and they have nothing left except what they give to cigars and wine suppers, and they die before their time, and they will expect us ministers to preach about them as though they were the victims of early piety; and after a high-class funeral, with silver handles at the side of their coffin of extraordinary brightness, it will be found out that the undertaker is cheated out of his legitimate expenses! Do not send to me to preach the funeral sermon of a man who dies like that. I would blurt out the whole truth, and tell that he was strangled to death by his wife's ribbons! The country is dressed to death.

You are not surprised to find that the putting up of one public building in New York cost millions of dollars more than it ought to have cost, when you find that the man who gave out the contracts paid more than five thousand dollars for his daughter's wedding dress. Cashmeres of a thousand dollars each are not rare on Broadway. It is estimated that there are eight thousand women in these two cities who have expended on their personal array two thousand dollars a year.

What are the men to do in order to keep up such home wardrobes? Steal—that is the only respectable thing they can do! During the last fifteen years there have been innumerable fine business men shipwrecked on the wardrobe. The temptation comes in this way: a man thinks more of his family than all the world outside, and if they spend the evening in describing to him the superior wardrobe of the family across the street that they cannot bear the sight of, the man is thrown on his gallantry and his pride of family, and without translating his feelings into plain language, he goes into extortion and issuing of false stock and skilful penmanship in writing somebody else's name at the foot of a promissory note; and they all go down together—the husband to the prison, the wife to the sewing-machine, the children to be taken care of by those who were called poor relations. Oh, for some new Shakespeare to arise and write

THE TRAGEDY OF CLOTHES!

Act the first of the tragedy: A plain but beautiful home. Enter the newly-married pair. Enter simplicity of manner and behavior. Enter as much happiness as is ever found in one home.

Act the second: Discontent with the humble home. Enter envy. Enter jealousy. Enter desire of display.

Act the third: Enlargement of expenses. Enter all the queenly dressmakers. Enter the French milliners.

Act the fourth: The tip-top of society. Enter princes and princesses of New York life. Enter magnificent plate and equipage. Enter everything splendid.

Act the fifth and last, winding up the scene: Enter the assignee. Enter the sheriff. Enter the creditors. Enter humiliation. Enter the wrath of God. Enter the contempt of society. Enter death. Now, let the silk curtain drop on the stage. The farce is ended, and the lights are out.

Will you forgive me if I say in tersest shape possible, that some of the men in this country have to forge, and to perjure, and to swindle to pay for their wives' dresses? I will say it whether you forgive me or not.

CURTAINS BENEVOLENCE.

Again, extravagant costume is the foe of all Christian alms-giving. Men and women put so much in personal display that they often have nothing for God and the cause of suffering humanity—a Christian man cracking his Palais Royal gloves across the back by shutting up his hand to hide the one cent he puts into the poor box! a Christian woman at the story of the Hottentots crying copious tears into a twenty-five dollar handkerchief, and then giving a two-cent piece to the collection, thrusting it down under the bills, so people will not know but it was a ten-dollar gold piece. One hundred dollars for incense to fashion—two cents for God! God gives us ninety cents out of every dollar. The other ten cents, by command of His Bible, belong to Him. Is not God liberal according to this tithing system laid down in the Old Testament—is not God liberal in giving us ninety cents out of a dollar when He takes but ten? We do not like that. We want to have ninety-nine cents for ourselves and one for God.

Now, I would a great deal rather steal ten cents from you than God. I think one reason why a great many people do not get along in worldly accumulation faster is because they do not observe this Divine rule. God says: "Well, if that man is not satisfied with ninety cents out of a dollar, then I will take the whole dollar, and I will give it to the man or woman who is honest with me." The greatest obstacle to charity in the Christian church to-day is the fact that men expend so much on their table and women so much on their dress they have got nothing left for the work of God and the world's betterment.

DISTRACTS ATTENTION.

Again, extravagant costume is distraction to public worship. You know very well there are a good many people who go to church just as they go to the races, to see who will come out first. Men and women with souls to be saved passing the hour in wondering where that man got his cravat, or what store that woman patronizes. In many of our churches the preliminary exercises are taken up with the discussion of wardrobes. It is pitiable. Is it not wonderful that the Lord does not strike the meeting-houses with lightning? What distraction of public worship! Dying men and women, whose bodies are soon to be turned into dust, yet before three worlds strutting like peacocks. People sitting down in a pew or taking up a hymn book, all absorbed at the same time in personal array, to sing:

"Rise, my soul, and stretch thy wings,
Thy better portion trace;
Rise from transitory things
Toward heaven, thy native place!"

I adopt the Episcopalian prayer, and say: "Good Lord, deliver us!"

MENTAL IMPOVERISHMENT.

Extravagant costume belittles the intellect. Our minds are enlarged or they dwindle just in proportion to the importance of the subject on which we constantly dwell. Can you imagine anything more dwarfing to the human intellect than the study of dress? I see men on the street who, judging from their elaboration, I think must have taken two hours to arrange their apparel. After a few years of that kind of absorption, which one of McAllister's magnifying glasses will be powerful enough to make the man's character visible? What will be left of a woman's intellect after giving years and years to the discussion of such questions? They all land in idiocy. I have seen men at the summer watering-places through fashion the mere wreck of what they once were. Sallow of cheek. Meagre of limb. Hollow at the chest. Showing no animation save in rushing across a room to pick up a lady's fan. Simpering along the corridors the same compliments they simpered twenty years ago.

BARS HEAVEN.

Yet, my friends, I have given you only the milder phase of this evil. It shuts a great multitude out of heaven. The first peal of thunder that shook Sinai declared: "Thou shalt have no other gods before me," and you will have to choose between the goddess of fashion and the Christian God. There are a great many seats in heaven, and they are all easy seats, but not one seat for the devotee of costume. Heaven is for meek and quiet spirits. Heaven is for those who think more of their souls than of their bodies.

Give up this idolatry of fashion or give up heaven. What would you do standing beside the Countess of Huntingdon, whose joy it was to build chapels for the poor; or with that Christian woman of Boston, who fed fifteen hundred children of the street, at Fanueil Hall, one New Year's Day, giving out as a sort of doxology at the end of the meeting a pair of shoes to each one of them; or those Dorcas of modern society who have consecrated their needles to the Lord, and who will get eternal reward for every stitch they take?

PERPETUAL ENVY.

Oh, men and women, give up the idolatry of costume! The rivalries and the competitions of such a life are a stupendous wretchedness. You will always find some one with brighter array, and with more palatial residence, and with lavender kid gloves that make a tighter fit. And if you buy this thing and wear it you will wish you had bought something else and worn it. And the frets of such a life will bring the crow's feet to your temples before they are due, and when you come to die you will have a miserable time.

I have seen men and women of excessive costume die, and I never saw one of them die well. The trappings off, there they lay on the tumbled pillow, and there were just two things that bothered them—a wasted life and a coming eternity. I could not pacify them, for their body, mind, and soul had been exhausted in the worship of costume, and they could not appreciate the Gospel. When I knelt by their bedside they were mumbling out their regrets, and saying: "O God! O God!" Their garments hung up in the wardrobe never again to be seen by them. Without any exception, so far as my memory serves me, they died without hope, and went into eternity unprepared. The two most ghastly death-beds on earth are the one where a man dies of delirium tremens, and the other where a woman dies after having sacrificed all her faculties of body, mind, and soul in the worship of costume.

JUDGMENT TO COME.

My friends, we must appear in judgment to answer for what we have worn on our bodies as well as for what repentances we have exercised with our souls. On that day I see coming in Beau Brummell of the last century without his cloak; Aaron Burr, without the letters that to old age he showed in pride, to prove his early wicked gallantries; and Absalom without his hair; and Marchioness Pompadour without her titles; and Mrs. Arnold, the belle of Wall Street, when that was the centre of fashion, without her fripperies of vesture.

And in great haggardness they shall go away into eternal expatriation, while among the queens of heavenly society will be found Vashti, who wore the modest veil before the palatial bacchanalians; and Hannah, who annually made a little coat for Samuel at the temple; and Grandmother Lois, the ancestress of Timothy, who imitated her virtue; and Mary, who gave Jesus Christ to the world; and many of you the wives, and mothers, and sisters, and daughters of the present Christian church who, through great tribulation, are entering into the kingdom of God. Christ announced who would make up the royal family of heaven when He said: "Whosoever doeth the will of God, the same is my brother, my sister, my mother."

A FALSE CHRIST IN PERSIA.

SOME interesting facts relative to the rise and progress of a new sect in Persia, were related recently by Colonel C. E. Stewart of the British Army, who has spent many years in Persia. During his residence there he became so thoroughly conversant with Persian affairs, and so accurate and fluent in his use of the language that an English traveller who met him in Persia failed to detect his nationality.

The "new religion" of which Colonel Stewart spoke, has for its prophet one Ali Mahomed, a native of Shiraz, who, in 1842, declared that he had been raised up by God to supersede Christianity and Islam and all the old religions of the world by a new faith. Its particular tenets were not stated, but as far as I could gather it seemed to be a kind of reformed Islam—a faith more in accordance with the feelings and aspirations of the people than the cold form of Mohammedanism. Ali took the name of El Bab (the door), and claimed that he was the only way or door by which a knowledge of God could be obtained. His followers, of whom he soon obtained a large number, are called Babis. Subsequently he claimed that he had a new revelation, and declared that he was not merely the door but that he was himself sent forth from God, and he then assumed the name of the Most High.

After El Bab's preaching, the movement spread like wildfire, and in the course of six years had gathered no less than one hundred and fifty thousand followers in Persia. El Bab had chosen eighteen disciples, and these were regarded as a kind of pyramid, with himself as the apex. Nineteen was a mystical number with the Babis, who supposed it to represent the unity of God. During the interregnum in 1849, before the present Shah was established on the throne, the Babis revolted, but against the wish of El Bab, who was a man of peace, and it was nine months before the insurrection was suppressed. The leaders were killed, but they promised their followers to return to the earth in fourteen days. Needless to say they did not, and in a second insurrection the leaders thought it well to extend their own time of return to forty days.

The Government of Persia, alarmed at the spread of Babism, decided to put El Bab to death. He was accorded a mock trial, and the sentence was pronounced. The lecturer explained that it is a common thing in Persia for a condemned prisoner to have his throat cut with a pocket knife while in the court; but, to prevent El Bab's followers making capital out of a secret death, a public execution was decided on. His two disciples, who were condemned with him, were offered pardon on renouncing him. One did so, and spat in El Bab's face and secured his own release, but the other remained firm. "I'll die with my prophet, but I'll never deny him," was his reply to the repeated entreaties of his wife and child. The story of as told by Colonel Stewart, was most extraordinary. He and his follower were suspended from the citadel wall, and the soldiers fired upon them. When the smoke had cleared away the disciple was found dead, but El Bab had gone! The explanation was that the bullets had snapped the rope by which he was suspended, and he dropped into the ditch and escaped for a time, but he was soon captured and hacked to pieces by a Persian captain. The persecution was, in 1852, renewed in Teheran on an attempt being made on the Shah's life by three Babis. Forty of the new sect were put to death, among them Gourret-ul-Ayn (the delight of the eyes), so called on account of her great beauty. These people were offered free pardon if they would only say No to the question, Are you a Babi? but they all remained firm to their faith and were put to death with the most horrible tortures.

A successor to El Bab soon appeared on the scene, and he claimed the title El Baha, which signifies the light. This prophet, who is the present leader of the movement, had very extensive ideas of his mission, and set himself to work to reach the great monarchs of the world. Among others he wrote to Queen Victoria, whom he commended for the abolition of slavery, and for resigning her Government into the hands of her Parliament, which, he said, were wise steps. He was, however, concerned about her spiritual condition, and earnestly exhorted her to turn to the Lord.

The followers of El Bab and his successor, El Baha, are very numerous in Persia, and they are making many converts. That they are sincere is evident from the fact that they are always ready to die for their faith, which cannot always be said for Christians. The appearance of these teachers is another fulfilment of prophecy (Matt. 24:24).

THE CANADIAN INDIANS.

[THE following communication from an eminent Christian laborer in Canada discusses a question which, in the light of recent events, is interesting to Christians on both sides of the border. Legislation may do much toward solving the Indian problem, and the recommendations recently submitted to our own Congress promise, if acted upon, to ameliorate their condition in important respects; but Christian men will feel, as does the writer of this article, that while thankfully accepting legislative aid, our main reliance must be on the elevating, transforming influence of Christianity.]

The disturbances which took place last spring in the North-west under the leadership of Louis Riel have drawn the attention of Canadians more than usually to the Indian question. What is to be done with the Indians? Here, throughout this great country, are scattered bands of Indians of various tribes, living, for the most part, on their own reserved lands; their habits, occupations, language all very different to those of their white neighbors; they are forced to be our neighbors, we are forced to be theirs. Feeling it our duty to do something for their spiritual welfare, we have established here and there missions among them, missionaries have been sent to them and day schools established, and quite a number of these people have been reclaimed from heathenism and their children instructed in the elements of Christian education.

But time has gone on, years have rolled by, and now because these poor Indians have not made the same progress as might have been expected of a colony of white settlers with the same advantages offered to them, the cry has in many quarters been raised that Indian missions are a failure, that money spent on improving and civilizing the Indians is wasted; yes, some in this country even go so far as to say that the Indian nature is of so low and debased a type that it is incapable of improvement. It is poor encouragement to a missionary who has spent the best years of his life laboring on behalf of these poor forest children, bearing with them in their inconsistencies, forgiving them their personal annoyances, aiding them when it might be said they did not deserve aiding, treating them kindly and tenderly as a father might treat his children, and be told that his efforts have been wasted, and to be asked where are the fruits of all his labors.

We believe that time sufficient has not been allowed for the vast change that is required to be made in the thoughts and principles and habits of these people before they can become assimilated to the ways of white people. We think it ought to be taken into account that the Indians as a people for generations past have lived in an utterly wild, untutored state, and that the seeds of this wild life must necessarily take a long period to eradicate; it ought not to be expected that even the whole lifetime of one worker, however faithful he may be, should count for very much in the evangelization of a race whose evil tendencies have all the time been gaining strength for centuries. We believe that a solemn responsibility rests on the shoulders not only of people living in Canada, but of Christian people generally, and the land owners particularly, who are now deriving wealth from these vast lands which were formerly the hunting grounds of the Indians. England is every year sending out her emigrants in thousands to make for themselves homes in our great North-west, and we think that England should care more for and take more interest in the welfare of her forest children who are driven away from their homes by the incoming settlers.

We would put in a plea for those who have been bearing the burden and heat of the day, for those who have sacrificed many of the pleasures and advantages of life in order to throw themselves into this work of caring for and training these poor despised Indians. If men and women are to be found (and, indeed, it is but few there are) who will earnestly with their whole heart and soul, for the sake of the Saviour who died for us all, undertake the work of reclaiming and teaching these poor neglected people, who will go into this field that has so little that is inviting or encouraging, who will bear with the peculiarity of temperament which is often so trying in the Indian character, who will put up with experiences which are, to say the least, unpleasant, often even revolting, who will undergo trials and discouragements, and still go bravely on—surely their hands ought to be upheld, surely their appeals for assistance in their arduous work ought to be responded to. Most earnestly do we pray God that people's hearts may be stirred within them to do as the good Samaritan did, and help our work among the Indians in the same kind-hearted and whole-souled way that He did the poor man by the wayside, not for what will be gained, but as a simple duty which every Christian owes to his neighbor.

THE CHURCH IN THE HOUSE.

Suggestions by Dr. Deems for a Home Service.

Lessons: Gen. 15; 1 Cor. 9:24-27; Matt. 20:1-15. Hymns: "I love Thy kingdom, Lord;" "Wake and lift up thyself, my heart."

THE DISCOURSE.

Text: "I will heal their backsliding, I will love them freely" (Hosea 14:4).

Backsliders always feel that it is more difficult to come back to God than it was to make the first approach.

Then they were aliens; now they are children. Then they had offended against law; now they had offended against love.

Having been adopted into the family of God and received forgiveness and many a love-token, they feel that they cannot have the face to look up to the Lord.

Plead with them. Repeat all the promises made to sinners. Show them that being sinners need not keep them from the Lord because His name is Jesus, Saviour, and His great business is sinner-saving.

"True," they reply, "very true; and you may repeat those great and precious promises to other sinners, to liars, thieves, adulterers, and murderers; and on those promises I did go to Him, and found them true; but after all that mercy I sinned against Him, and ran away from Him. I could go once. I cannot go again." And you would have no answer; and they could never return if the Lord had not most mercifully recorded special direct promises for such cases: "Return, thou backsliding Israel, saith the Lord; and I will not cause Mine anger to fall upon you" (Jer. 3:12). "Turn, O backsliding children! saith the Lord; for I am married unto you" (Jer. 3:14).

And this text in Hosea.

Backsliding is a disease of weakness. He will cure it, so that we will backslide no more.

Now, if He had said this much only, what a comfort!

But He promises to "love" us, love us "freely."

He will not cast up to us our want of fidelity. He will not treat us with a restrained graciousness.

"I will love them freely."

Let church-members take a lesson of the Lord for their treatment of weak brethren.

Read Galatians 6: 1-5.

"Brethren, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual, restore such a one in the spirit of meekness; considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted. Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ. For if a man think himself to be something when he is nothing, he deceiveth himself. But let every man prove his own work, and then shall he have rejoicing in himself alone, and not in another. For every man shall bear his own burden. Let him that is taught in the Word communicate unto him that teacheth in all good things."

AFTERNOON TALK.

THE GOD OF HOPE.

By B. M. Palmer, D.D., New Orleans, La.

Let us read Rom. 15: 13: "Now the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, that ye may abound in hope through the power of the Holy Ghost."

This verse is both a benediction and a prayer. Observe the title by which God is addressed—"the God of hope." In earnest prayer we naturally seek, in the attributes of God, or in the principles of His moral government, or in the relations which He sustains to His people, or in the promises which He has made, something upon which to found the expectation of an answer. This, as the ground of our appeal, is immediately pushed to the front of the prayer in the invocation itself. Thus in the Scriptures we find Jehovah addressed severally as "the God of patience," as the "God of all consolation," as "the God of peace;" in every case the title contains the substance of the prayer, as well as the warrant upon which it is based.

In pushing our way through the language of the text, we strike another remarkable fact—that all the exercises of the Christian are in the sphere of faith; "the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace, in believing." Only in believing does he possess either joy or peace. Just as the air is the necessary condition of physical life and activity, so faith in Christ is the fundamental condition of our spiritual life.

But, however pleasant or profitable to dwell upon either or both of these, they will be passed over that we may notice the order of the graces which are here enumerated: "The God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing." Observe the apparent anti-climax of the arrangement, which our logic would exactly reverse. To us hope would seem to spring from faith, as the first streak of light when the morning is opening its eye upon the world. Then hope would broaden into peace, as the faint dawn deepening into the clear daylight of the soul. And peace, in its turn, would mount into joy as the noontide splendor of our Christian experience. On the contrary, the Apostle springs to the topmost grace of the believer; descending from joy to peace, through peace to hope, and through hope to faith, the bottom and ground of the whole series.

This anti-climax recognizes one constant fact in our experience—the recurrence, in the advanced stages of religious life, to the elementary principles of grace. "We may have reached the summit of the highest joy; but we must ever come down through the entire descent, and renew the faith and repentance which were exercised at the beginning."

This recurrence to elementary principles marks our progress in all departments of knowledge. In the higher mathematics, the demonstration turns upon axioms which were accepted upon the first statement; in philosophy, however numerous the links in the chain, the reasoning depends throughout upon those primary beliefs which God has imbedded in the constitution of the mind, the key-stones which bind the arch, and the buttresses which support the entire bridge. Equally so in the moral and spiritual sphere, all our conclusions as to right and wrong turn upon two or three fundamental principles recognized by the conscience; and the holiest Christian must test his experience by renewal of the faith which he exercised at the first. Hence it is that old age generally becomes so simple. The most reliant nature returns to the simple heart of its early days. In this law of pious experience, then, we have a practical test of our advance in holiness; the more we take up and renew the beginnings of the Christian life, the more surely are we advancing from grace to grace.

[The following appropriate lines may be committed to memory, and recited by the young people.]

"Even as a nurse, whose child's imperfect pace Can hardly lead his foot from place to place, Leaves her fond kissing, sets him down to go, Nor does uphold him for a step or two; But when she finds that he begins to fall, She holds him up, and kisses him withal; So God from man sometimes withdraws His hand Awhile, to teach his infant faith to stand; But when He sees his feeble strength begin To fail, He gently takes him up again."

FRANCIS QUARLES.

THE APOSTASY.

By Rev. Andrew Bonar, D.D.

The Seven Years' Covenant—Antichrist will be Worshipped—The Last Half of the Week—The Unequalled Tribulation—The Raising of the Two Witnesses—The First Napoleon an Illustration—Indications of Antichrist's Programme.

As the times of the Gentiles draw to a close, Scripture indicates the return of the Jews to Palestine as a nation, although in unbelief, and it is then that Antichrist, called the Prince that shall come, will make a seven years' covenant with them according to Daniel 9: 27.

Although it is only with the Jews that this Antichrist will "confirm the covenant for one week," yet ultimately the whole ten kings of the Roman earth will join together in giving their kingdom to him "until the words of God shall be fulfilled" (Rev. 17: 12, 13, 17). Finally, Antichrist will "plant the tabernacles of his palace between the seas" (the Dead Sea and the Mediterranean) "in the glorious holy mountain" (a name given alone to Mount Zion at Jerusalem), "and there shall come to his end, and none shall help him" (see Dan. 11: 44, 45).

CONSUMMATE DEPRAVITY.

His coming is declared to be with all "deceivableness of unrighteousness." He will adapt himself, just as the first Napoleon did, to the prevailing system of the godless times he appears in, and especially to the prejudices of the Jewish people, who, replaced by His help in their own land, once more as a nation, with their great wealth, will rise into importance there. In this "deceivableness" also, it is that the covenant is made with them for the whole remaining week. All the world will (Rev. 13: 3-8) wonder after him, and not only wonder after, but worship him, and the Dragon too, "who gives him his power and great authority." How fearful to think even of such an apostasy as this; well may it be called "The Apostasy," connected as it is with this prince that shall then have come, and shown himself to be that "Man of sin," for in the midst of the week (although his covenant, such as it was, had been made for the whole), he throws off the mask and shows himself "that he is God," with a false prophet, working miracles before him in the power of Satan himself—the mock Trinity of Hell, the Dragon, Beast, and False Prophet, then shown in opposition to the Trinity of Heaven.

The last half of the seven years, when the covenant has been broken, are the times of

of which so much is said in Scripture. God has mercifully shortened those days, and told His people in every different mode of expressing it what the limit is—viz., "the midst of the week," or hebdomad of seven years, that is, three years and a half; the "1260 days;" the "42 months;" the "time, times, and half a time;" all expressing exactly the same duration, and all, if taken with the context, pointing distinctly to the same dreadful period. During it God will raise up Two Witnesses, doubtless individual men from what is said of them, whom He will miraculously protect during the three and a half years of their testimony.

THE NAPOLEONIC TYPE.

In France, before the Revolution of 1793, a well-known "falling away" or "apostasy" occurred, following upon the doctrines taught by Voltaire, when a national decree was passed that death was a perpetual sleep. The scenes of the Reign of Terror which followed showed what man will dare to do if left to himself, and called forth Napoleon Bonaparte, who showed the features of the Antichrist, flattering at first the system he found prevailing, while using it all the while to establish himself in power. . . . So the Antichrist will not at his first appearance shock the prejudices of those whose faith he at last overthrows, for he is to come in "by flatteries" (Dan. 11: 21).

In France Napoleon Bonaparte was a Roman Catholic, and in Egypt a worshipper of Mahomet, till finding himself, as by and by Antichrist will do, fairly established in power, he dropped the deception under which he had entered, proclaiming himself the monarch and only source of authority. "La France! c'est moi" (France! it is me) was the laconic way in which he announced it. What the successor to his name and authority may be raised up to accomplish is yet to be seen, but already the tendency is clearly toward a still more extensive development of the clay-iron principle of government which is to prevail in both feet of the Image, before the ten toes of it are developed.

Such an instance as this should cause us to ponder well, when we read of a still future and more fearful "falling away," which is to distinguish it from others. In the original it is styled emphatically "the apostasy" (11 Thess. 2: 3), with the revealing after or out of it of "that man of sin, the son of perdition, who will oppose and exalt himself above all that is called God or that is worshipped: so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God."

We are told, in Daniel 7: 24, that out of this kingdom (the Roman Empire) are ten kings that shall arise, and another (the Little Horn) shall rise after them. The ten kingdoms must therefore appear before Antichrist, inasmuch as he rises after them. . . . The remarkable division of the Roman earth into ten kingdoms has not yet taken place, and the Antichrist, who arises after them, is of necessity future also. The limits of the Roman earth are sufficiently known to all; and no division of it, which does not include the whole, can be said to have fulfilled its division into the ten toes or kingdoms predicted at the time of the end. The iron legs of Daniel's prophetic image (Dan. 2: 31-45) mean the Eastern and Western divisions of the Roman Empire, and the Eastern embraces the portion most important in Bible history—namely, the Holy Land, Syria, Egypt, Turkey, and Greece.

In Daniel 7 Antichrist is foreshown rising out of the ten kingdoms into which the Roman Empire will then have been divided, while in Daniel 8 he is shown as rising out of the four horns or kingdoms into which the Grecian Empire was divided under Alexander the Great's generals (namely, Greece, Turkey, Syria, and Egypt). In this there is no discrepancy, for the Roman Empire received its most valuable additions from the territories which it wrested from those successors of Alexander; all, therefore, will be accomplished should Antichrist rise out of the Grecian portion of the Roman earth in the latter time of their kingdom (Dan. 8: 23).

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Vigorous Onslaught on the President was made by Senator Sherman on February 8th on the subject of the papers which Mr. Cleveland declined sending to the Senate. Mr. Sherman took the ground that the Senate had the right to demand any information on file in any of the departments, without reference to the use which it proposed to make of such information. That may or may not be fair ground to take, but if the Senate desires to enlist the public on its side in the quarrel it should open its doors. So long as it insists on making executive sessions secret, the public cannot decide intelligently whether the fault is with the President or the Senate. An explanation from Senator Blackburn of his vote on the question has been published, which, in justice to him, should be made known. He said last week to a Herald correspondent: "I say now that from conviction and from experience I am opposed most emphatically to the continuance of secret sessions, with one exception, and that only when the open discussion of foreign treaties would be unfair to the country with which negotiations were pending. With that exception I am in favor of no distinction whatever between legislative and executive business, and untrammelled I would so vote. But since my party colleagues have seen proper to make it a party issue, in deference to their instructions I voted in committee against the resolution proposed by Senator Platt."

The Pan-Electric Scandal, Which has been a prominent subject of public discussion during the past few weeks, is one about which there is considerable misunderstanding. It refers to a suit being brought by the United States Government to test the validity of the Bell Telephone Patent. The propriety of the action is a matter of dispute, but the feature in which public interest centres is that the legal adviser of the Government, Attorney-General Garland, a Railroad Commissioner, and an Indian Commissioner are largely interested in a rival patent—the Pan Electric—the stockholders of which would benefit by the Bell patent being declared invalid. Mr. Garland has not promoted the suit, and was away from Washington when it was initiated; but the fact of his being an interested party has given rise to severe criticism, which has gained point from another fact recently disclosed—that he obtained his shares at a mere nominal price while he was in the Senate. We do not join in the hue and cry raised against the Attorney-General, but we cannot refrain from expressing regret that, under the peculiar circumstances in which the Administration came into power, he did not avoid the scandal by either selling his stock or resigning his office. As it is, though the suspicion may be groundless, the public suspect that the power of the Administration and the public money are being used to promote private interests.

The Difficulties in the Way of Obtaining a navy for the United States were indicated by the evidence offered last week to the Naval Committee of the House. A number of witnesses entitled to be considered experts were examined, and the differences of opinion between them were remarkable. There was no difference, however, as to the present state of the navy. It did not get a good word from any one. Secretary Whitney asked for an appropriation to complete the monitors and to build steel cruisers. He recommended the building of them by private contract, but advised that at least one government yard might be put into a condition to build a ship. Not one was in that condition now. It is remarkable that not only here but in Europe the capacity of the Navy Department to spend money without appreciable results surpasses that of any department, public or private.

A Serious Riot in the Coke Regions Took place on February 8th. Three hundred strikers attacked the works near Bradford, while only a few men were at work. They gave the foreman a severe beating, fired several shots among the workmen, and set the place on fire. The employes of the company succeeded in saving the main body of the works, but the strikers guarded the burning wing, and prevented any attempt being made to extinguish the flames. They visited several other works, and did considerable damage. The strikers appear determined to force out all the men.

A Conflict between the Militia and the anti-Chinese mob occurred at Seattle, W. T., last week. It commenced on Monday, when the troops undertook the protection of the Chinamen. In the belief that the soldiers would not use their arms against citizens, an attack was made upon them; but a volley was promptly fired, and four rioters fell. On Tuesday, as rioting was continued, the governor placed the city under martial law, and applied to the President for assistance. The President in response issued a proclamation, and sent on United States troops, who took possession of the city, and prevented further rioting. An anti-Chinese Congress was held at Portland, Oregon, on February 13th to decide on future proceedings. It was resolved to move for the impeachment of the Governor of Washington Territory, and to request General B. F. Butler to conduct the case. The excitement in Portland is but little less than that at Seattle, and the most intense antipathy to the Chinese prevails.

A Socialistic Riot in London Caused General alarm on February 8th. A mass-meeting of "starving mechanics" was called on that day in Trafalgar Square. Fully ten thousand responded. A sprinkling of socialists gave tone to what might otherwise have been a harmless demonstration. One of these, a defeated socialist candidate for Parliament, named Burns, addressed the crowd from the foot of the Nelson Column, and ultimately clambered up to the pedestal, apparently desiring by that unlawful act to precipitate a conflict between the police and the mob. He succeeded, and after a struggle he was removed from the pedestal. There was another attack on the police, and Burns mounted the pedestal again, and set a red flag flying. Incendiary speeches were delivered by Burns and others, declaring that the starving mechanics would have bread, and if peaceable means failed they would take it from the bakers' shops. The police, having been re-enforced, made another charge on the mob, and drove it from the foot of the column. It then passed into the side streets, where members of Parliament live, and where the aristocratic clubs are situated. Windows were broken, several houses pillaged, and hotels raided for food and drink. The crowd went to Hyde Park, and held a meeting, after which only small sections of the rioters did any damage. About two thirds of the crowd were genuine workmen and one third socialists. As the two sections were not in accord, there were frequent collisions and some fighting between them. There is terrible distress among workmen in London, an unprecedented number being out of employment and threatened with starvation. The Queen has written a public letter expressing her sympathy with people whose property suffered in the riot. The workmen are indignant that she should have said nothing about their distress.

Mr. Gladstone has Appointed a Working-man to an important office in his administration. The step is unprecedented, and indicates the progress being made in England of democratic principles. The new official is Henry Broadhurst, who was formerly a journeyman stonemason, but was elected by the workmen of Birmingham to represent them in Parliament. Mr. Gladstone has now chosen him to be Under-Secretary of the Home Department. Mr. Broadhurst is a self-educated man of remarkable ability and a clear-sighted, determined advocate of industrial interests. He did excellent service last year on the commission appointed to investigate the housing of the poor.

An Ominous Mutiny in the Irish Parliamen-tary party was developed last week. At the recent election Mr. O'Connor was elected by two constituencies, Liverpool and Galway, and he had to decide which of the two he would represent. He chose Liverpool, because any good Home-Ruler could be elected in Galway, while if another election were held in Liverpool an Irishman might not get in. Two candidates appeared for the seat he vacated in Galway—Lynch and O'Shea. Two Parnellite leaders, Healy and Biggar, promptly endorsed Lynch, and began to stump for him. Mr. Parnell, however, preferred O'Shea, and exercised his authority over his two lieutenants. They withdrew their endorsement with rather a bad grace, and O'Shea was elected. Much discontent is expressed at Mr. Parnell's arbitrary methods, but for the time the open mutiny is quelled.

Greece Maintains a Hostile Attitude toward Turkey, though the prospects of peace have improved during the week. The Greek Government is aware that its hopes of success in a conflict would be small. Having aroused the people and fostered discontent in Macedonia, it is now, however, difficult to retreat with honor. There is danger of revolution and a dynastic overthrow if the Greeks imagine that their government has been humiliated. From that standpoint the dynasty would suffer less danger from a defeat by Turkey than from revolution. A way out of the difficulty is suggested in a proposal to the English Government to induce Turkey to voluntarily surrender to Greece some small portion of the coveted territory.

Confirmation of the Shocking Disclosures of aristocratic vice made by the Pall Mall Gazette was obtained in London in a trial heard last week. The police arrested the keeper of a house into which two children, aged respectively twelve and thirteen years, were inveigled to gratify the lust of two elderly men. The arrests could not have been made a year ago. It was authorized by the law passed in consequence of Mr. Stead's revelations. The keeper of the house is a woman grown wealthy in the pursuit of her hideous profession. She was held for trial, and bail was refused. The evidence was most revolting. The Gazette asserts that if the prosecution is followed up the public will learn the names and facts disclosed to the secret commission appointed to inquire into the Gazette's charges. It is therefore safe to conclude that it will not be followed up.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying Colored ministers in the South with the CHRISTIAN HERALD have been received since our last acknowledgment to the amount of $5.50. They are from Brooklyn, N. Y., $3.50; from San Francisco, Cal., $2. Upward of twenty applications have recently been received from friends, who urge the claims of colored ministers who are in need of such a journal as this. They are without a religious journal, and are almost destitute of theological books, and the stipends they receive barely supply them with food and clothing. We have filed the names, and the friends who have applied on their behalf may rely on the names being put on the list as fast as the fund permits us to do so.

The Death of Horatio Seymour at Utica, N. Y., on Friday last, occasioned general regret throughout the Union. Mr. Seymour had come to be regarded as a sage whose utterances on public questions were of inestimable value not only to his party, but to the whole nation. He was nearly seventy-six years old, having been born May 31st, 1810. In 1841 he was elected to the Assembly of New York State, and in 1845 was made Speaker. In 1852 he was elected Governor of the State by a plurality of 22,596. In 1862 he was re-elected. During this term the draft riots occurred, and ex-Governor Seymour displayed considerable personal courage and administrative capacity in the course he took in assisting to suppress them. In 1868, much against his will, he received the Democratic nomination for the Presidency. He was defeated by General Grant. Since that time he has remained in retirement; and though he has often been spoken of in conventions as a candidate, his known determination never again to run for office prevented his nomination.

Messrs. Mateer and Parker, Mr. Spurgeon's evangelists, have finished a successful fifteen-days mission at Minneapolis, Minn. Though the thermometer marked twenty degrees below zero during their visit, the meetings were not affected by the low temperature. Commencing with an attendance of six hundred, they ran up to eleven hundred, and the interest increased from day to day. The work was much blessed, numerous professions of faith were made nightly, and the churches of the city are experiencing a vigorous revival. The evangelists are now in the midst of a cheering work at Sterling, Ill.

Mr. and Mrs. George C. Needham are Laboring in Virginia with many tokens of the Divine blessing. The Jeffersonian, of Charlottesville, describes the meetings as the most remarkable ever held in that vicinity, and says that the movement is spreading. It continues: "The interest in these meetings has not only not abated, but seems to be wonderfully on the increase. Such a steady outpouring of people in such numbers and for such a length of time has never been witnessed in Charlottesville, so far as our knowledge serves us, on any similar occasion. The Baptist Church at every service has been full to overflowing." Mrs. Needham holds services for women only, besides assisting her husband in the general work. On Sunday the churches of the city held united services conducted by Mr. and Mrs. Needham. The attendance was so large that overflow meetings had to be arranged. Mr. Thomas Needham, the third brother of the evangelist, is expected to follow up the work with another series of services. He is now holding meetings at Roanoke, Va.

The Hermit of Pike County, Pa., whose death was mentioned in these columns on January 28th, appears to have been misrepresented in the dispatch from which our information was obtained. A correspondent in Bristol, Conn., from which town "the hermit" came, writes us that Austin Sheldon has respectable connections in that place, and that during his voluntary seclusion they knew of his whereabouts. The cause of his strange life was a fraud practised upon him by land speculators. He was induced to invest his money in lands in Pennsylvania; and, sending his young wife to stay with her family, he went to examine his purchase. He found that he had been deceived, the land being uncleared and distant from any settlement. He built a small hut for a temporary residence, and returned to fetch his wife. She, however, was averse to living in such a place as he admitted it to be, and he returned alone, disheartened and sad. Afterward he had no desire for society, and lived his life of seclusion as described. His refusal to answer questions is explained by the fact that he was stone deaf. In his later years he was not morose, but exceedingly kind, especially to children, who were fond of visiting him.

A Runaway Freight Train Did Serious Mischief in St. Louis, Mo., on February 8th. The train, which consisted of sixty-two cars, was climbing the hill from the river when one of the couplings in the forward part of the train broke, and immediately the rear portion of the train started back down the grade. Each foot of its backward course increased the speed, and almost immediately several of the cars began swaying from side to side, and soon several jumped the track, but still kept on in their downward course, crashing into the houses which line the streets. The others continued their mad course, some off the track and some on, until they were toppled over into the river. Several houses were utterly wrecked, and almost every house by the track sustained damage. The débris of the wrecked cars and houses strewed the track, and it was several hours before traffic could be resumed. No assistance was needed to carry the cars down the grade. It needed a powerful engine to draw them up, but their own momentum was sufficient for the journey to disaster. It is so with human nature. God can raise it to a higher level, but left to itself it gravitates steadily downward (John 6 : 44).

A Remarkable Atmospheric Phenomenon was observed at Montreal on February 7th. Shortly before midnight a light was seen on the western horizon. It had the appearance of a luminous mist or the reflection of an immense conflagration. It was watched with much curiosity, and after a few minutes the observers saw a tongue of fire shoot out of the mist and stretch across the sky to the zenith. It curved slightly in its path, and resembled a drawn sword. About one o'clock, when the weather cleared up, it faded away. Some of the old soldiers say a similar phenomenon was witnessed just before the Crimean war and again before the Franco-Prussian war. The local scientists are quite at a loss to account for it, and think that it had no connection with the solar system. They venture the opinion that it was caused by the presence of snow in the air. It is probable that some scientific explanation will be given of the phenomenon, but it is well to remember that even after we have learned what natural law produced the wonder, we only know what agency God employed in its production. Scientists will perhaps be able to explain the natural convulsions which will soon herald the close of this dispensation, but the watchful Christian will recognize in them the hand of God, and discern their purport (Matt. 24 : 29, 33).

A Learned Pauper's Death in a Poorhouse is reported from Pennsylvania. Among the deaths registered in the Erie County almshouse recently is that of Dr. P. W. Moshlech, in his seventy-ninth year. Dr. Moshlech was formerly Professor of Greek and Hebrew in Bethany College, West Virginia, but the war excitement closed that college, and he went to Ohio and afterward to Pennsylvania, where he practised medicine. He was not successful, being too much absorbed in scientific study to give proper attention to his patients. He was a profoundly learned man, the master of ten languages, and the intimate friend and correspondent of Darwin, Victor Hugo, Alexander Dumas, and other eminent men. He made a voyage to the Sandwich Islands, and while there compiled the valuable Hawaiian Dictionary. During his career he made no provision for old age, and when he was no longer able to earn the little he needed for his support he was forced to become an inmate of the almshouse, where he died a few days ago.

It was a sad ending to so distinguished a life. Men with not a tithe of Dr. Moshlech's learning and ability are more prudent, and prepare for the decline of life. Unhappily, the evil often goes farther. Men eminent for learning and mental capacity frequently neglect to prepare for eternity, while children and fools make their peace with God (Luke 10 : 21).

A Secret that Cannot be Divulged Without severe penalties is in the possession of two men in New Jersey. They were before the Court of Chancery at Trenton last week on the application of a leather-dealer. He stated that he had made valuable discoveries in the manufacture of cordovan leather and for coloring kangaroo, alligator, and snake skins. The two men had been in his employ and had discovered his secret. They had agreed to transfer their services to a rival in the business, to whom the knowledge of the secret would be valuable. He desired that an injunction be issued restraining them from divulging the secret. The Chancellor, having heard the case, issued an injunction as requested. It may therefore be inferred that the rival leather-dealer will be debarred from using another man's discoveries for his own benefit. Though a secret that might advance his fortune in this world is to be withheld from him, he and all other men may be thankful that the way to eternal riches and happiness is not kept secret, but openly proclaimed and offered freely to all (Rev. 22 : 17).

A Testator's Injunctions were Set Aside by the Court of Chancery of New Jersey last week. A man recently deceased in making his will specified that if any of his children should file a caveat against its probate the filer should pay the expenses incurred thereby out of his own pocket. A caveat was filed by his son, and the litigation was taken to the Court of Chancery. The vice-chancellor decided that the law is that the costs arising from the filing of a caveat must come out of the estate, and the Orphans' Court has power to so direct. Makers of wills cannot also make laws. That is a dictum which should not be forgotten by other people beside makers of wills. Dogmatic utterances are often heard from pulpit and platform and in private conversation which have no authority. Speakers have been heard to assert that the Lord wishes this or that, as if they were delegated to speak in His name. Like Peter, who would have excluded the Gentiles from the Christian Church (Acts 10 : 28), and James and John, who wanted to call fire down on the Samaritans (Luke 9 : 54), they generally reveal their unfitness to speak in God's name by the spirit of exclusiveness and intolerance they display. It is well for humanity that God reserves the right to make the laws of His kingdom (Mark 9 : 38-40).

The Irregularities of a Lady's Watch have had a curious explanation in Georgia. It appears that a lady residing in Columbus recently being about to visit the generating station of the electric light company, was told to leave her watch at home lest it be magnetized by the strong electric current. She did so, but complained afterward that her watch would not keep good time. She sent it to a jeweller, but he reported that it was not magnetized, and kept good time. Still, whenever she carried it her time was too slow, although when she left it in her room it ran correctly. A gentleman who knew of the circumstance suggested to the young lady that she wear another pair of corsets when next she carried the watch. She did so, and had no further trouble with the watch. The steel springs in her corset had been magnetized. The lady had brought away more than she was aware of of the potent influence in which she had been. It is so with the moral character. The injurious effects of a visit to an evil place may be perpetuated by the influence of the place finding something responsive to itself in the visitor. Unhappily, the response comes not from an article of dress, that may be discarded, but from the "remains of sin" in the soul. Christians in the world are not sin-proof, as Christ was (John 14 : 30).

THE DYING THIEF IN A NEW LIGHT.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"But the other answering rebuked him, saying, Dost not thou fear God, seeing thou art in the same condemnation? And we indeed justly; for we receive the due reward of our deeds: but this man hath done nothing amiss. And he said unto Jesus, Lord, remember me when thou comest into Thy kingdom."—LUKE 23: 40-42.

Perverted Scripture—The Speciality of the Thief's Conversion—I. As to Means—While he was on the Cross—Without a Sermon—The Gospels of the Crucifixion—II. As to Faith—A Triumph of Faith—His Intelligence—III. As to Results—Not Baptized—Made a Confession—Rebuked Sin—Prayed—IV. As to the Lord's Word to him—The Two Halves of Paul.

A GREAT many persons, whenever they hear of the conversion of the dying thief, remember that he was saved in the very article of death, and they dwell upon that fact, and that alone. He has always been quoted as a case of salvation at the eleventh hour; and so, indeed, he is. In his case it is proven that as long as a man can repent he can obtain forgiveness. The cross of Christ avails even for a man hanging on a gibbet, and drawing near to his last hour. He who is mighty to save was mighty, even during His own death, to pluck others from the grasp of the destroyer, though they were in the act of expiring.

MISUSED SCRIPTURE.

But that is not everything which the story teaches us; and it is always a pity to look exclusively upon one point, and thus to miss everything else—perhaps miss that which is more important. So often has this been the case that it has produced a sort of revulsion of feeling in certain minds, so that they have been driven in a wrong direction by their wish to protest against what they think to be a common error. I read the other day that this story of the dying thief ought not to be taken as an encouragement to death-bed repentance. Brethren, if the author meant—and I do not think he did mean—that this ought never to be so used as to lead people to postpone repentance to a dying bed, he spoke correctly.

I trust, however, that the narrative is not often so used, even by the worst of men, and I feel sure that it will not be so used by any one of you. It cannot be properly turned to such a purpose; it might be used as an encouragement to thieving just as much as to the delay of repentance. I might say, "I may be a thief because this thief was saved," just as rationally as I might say, "I may put off repentance because this thief was saved when he was about to die." The fact is, there is nothing so good but men can pervert it into evil, if they have evil hearts; the justice of God is made a motive for despair, and His mercy an argument for sin. Wicked men will drown themselves in the rivers of truth as readily as in the pools of error. He that has a mind to destroy himself can choke his soul with the Bread of life, or dash himself in pieces against the Rock of ages. There is no doctrine of the grace of God so gracious that graceless men may not turn it into licentiousness.

THE SPECIALITY.

I venture, however, to say that if I stood by the bedside of a dying man to-night, and I found him anxious about his soul, but fearful that Christ could not save him because repentance had been put off so late, I should certainly quote the dying thief to him, and I should do it with good conscience, and without hesitation. I should tell him that, though he was as near to dying as the thief upon the cross was, yet if he repented of his sin, and turned his face to Christ believingly, he would find eternal life. I should do this with all my heart, rejoicing that I had such a story to tell to one at the gates of eternity.

But I do not think, dear friends, that the only speciality about the thief is the lateness of his repentance. So far from being the only point of interest, it is not even the chief point. To some minds, at any rate, other points will be even more remarkable. I want to show you very briefly that there was a speciality in his case as to the means of his conversion; secondly, a speciality in his faith; thirdly, a speciality in the result of his faith while he was here below; and, fourthly, a speciality in the promise won by his faith—the promise fulfilled to him in Paradise.

I. First, then, I think you ought to notice very carefully the singularity and speciality of by which the thief was converted. How do you think it was? Well, we do not know. We cannot tell. It seems to me that the man was an unconverted, impenitent thief when they nailed him to the cross, because one of the evangelists says, "The thieves also, which were crucified with Him, cast the same in His teeth." It would appear that by some means or other this thief must have been converted while he was on the cross. Assuredly nobody preached a sermon to him, no evangelistic address was delivered at the foot of his cross, and no meeting was held for special prayer on his account. He does not even seem to have had an instruction, or an invitation, or an exhortation addressed to him; and yet this man became a sincere and accepted believer in the Lord Jesus Christ.

What do you think must have converted this poor thief? It strikes me that it may have been—it must have been, the sight of our great Lord and Saviour. There was, to begin with, our Saviour's wonderful behavior on the road to the cross. Perhaps the robber had mixed up with all sorts of society, but he had never seen a Man like this. Never had cross been carried by a Cross-Bearer of His look and fashion. Surely that march along the Via Dolorosa was the first part of the sermon which God preached to that bad man's heart.

HIS GOSPEL.

When he saw the Saviour surrounded by the Roman soldiery—saw the executioners bring forth the hammers and the nails, and lay Him down upon His back, and drive the nails into His hands and feet, this crucified criminal was startled and astonished as he heard Him say, "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do." He himself, probably, had met his executioners with a curse; but he heard this man breathe a prayer to the great Father; and, as a Jew, as he probably was, he understood what was meant by such a prayer. But it did astound him to hear Jesus pray for His murderers. Who else had ever prayed so? Certainly not David and the kings of Israel, who, on the contrary, in all honesty and heartiness imprecated the wrath of God upon their enemies. Elias himself would not have prayed in that fashion; rather would he have called fire from heaven on the centurion and his company. It was a new, strange sound to him. I do not suppose that he appreciated it to the full; but I can well believe that it deeply impressed him, and made him feel that his Fellow-Sufferer was a being about whom there was an exceeding mystery of goodness.

And when the cross was lifted up, that thief hanging up on his own cross looked around, and I suppose he could see that inscription written in three languages—"Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews." If so, that writing was his little Bible, his New Testament, and he interpreted it by what he knew of the Old Testament. Putting this and that together—that strange Person, incarnate loveliness, all patience and all majesty, that strange prayer, and now this singular inscription, surely he who knew the Old Testament, as I have no doubt he did, would say to himself, "Is this HE? Is this truly the King of the Jews? This is He who wrought miracles, and raised the dead, and said that He was the Son of God; is it all true, and is He really our Messiah?"

Peradventure, this dying thief read the Gospel out of the lips of Christ's enemies. They said, "He saved others." "Ah!" thought he, "did He save others? Why should He not save me?" What a grand bit of Gospel that was for the dying thief—"He saved others"! I think I could swim to heaven on that plank—"He saved others;" because, if He saved others, He can of a surety save me. Thus the very things that the enemies disdainfully threw at Christ would be gospel to this poor dying man.

But, after all, surely that which won him most must have been to look at Jesus again, as He was hanging upon the cruel tree. Possibly nothing about the physical person of Christ would be attractive to him, for His visage was more marred than that of any man, and His form more than the sons of men; but yet there must have been in that blessed face a singular charm. Was it not the very image of perfection? As I conceive the face of Christ, it was very different from anything that any painter has yet been able to place upon his canvas. It was all goodness, and kindness, and unselfishness; and yet it was a royal face. As the robber looked, he believed. I put it down as a very singular thing, a thing for you and for me to recollect, and dwell upon, with quite as much vividness as we do upon the lateness of this robber's conversion.

II. But now I want you to think with me a little upon the speciality of for I think it was a very singular faith that this man exerted toward our Lord Jesus Christ. I greatly question whether the equal and the parallel of the dying thief's faith will be readily found outside the Scriptures, or even in the Scriptures. Observe, that this man believed in Christ when he literally saw him dying the death of a felon, under circumstances of the greatest personal shame. For him to ask Jesus to remember him when he came into His kingdom, though he saw that Jesus bleeding His life away, and hounded to the death, was a splendid act of reliance. For him to commit his everlasting destiny into the hands of One who was, to all appearance, unable even to preserve His own life, was a noble achievement of faith. I say that this dying thief leads the van in the matter of faith, for what he saw of the circumstances of the Saviour was calculated to contradict rather than help his confidence. What he saw was to his hindrance rather than to his help, for he saw our Lord in the very extremity of agony and death, and yet he believed in Him as the King shortly to come into His kingdom.

Recollect, too, that at that moment when the thief believed in Christ, all the disciples had forsaken Him and fled. John might be lingering at a little distance, and holy women may have stood farther off, but bravely to champion the dying Christ. Judas had sold Him, Peter had denied Him, and the rest had forsaken Him; and it was then that the dying thief called Him "Lord," and said, "Remember me when thou comest into Thy kingdom." I call that splendid faith. Why, some of you do not believe, though you are surrounded with Christian friends—though you are urged on by the testimony of those whom you regard with love; but this man, all alone, comes out, and calls Jesus his Lord! No one else was confessing Christ at that moment; no revival was around him with enthusiastic crowds; he was all by himself as a confessor of his Lord.

And it seems to me that another point adds splendor to that faith—namely, that he himself was in extreme torture. Remember, he was crucified. It was a crucified man trusting in a crucified Christ. Oh, when our frame is racked with torture, when the tenderest nerves are pained, when our body is hung up to die by we know not what great length of torment, then to forget the present and live in the future is a grand achievement of faith! While dying, to turn one's eye to Another dying at your side, and trust your soul with Him, is very marvelous faith. Blessed thief, because they put thee down at the bottom, as one of the least of saints, I think that I must bid thee come up higher and take one of the uppermost seats among those who by faith have glorified the Christ of God!

Why, see, dear friends, once more, the speciality of this man's faith was that he saw so much, though his eyes had been opened for so short a time! He saw the future world. He was not a believer in annihilation, or in the possibility of a man's not being immortal. He evidently expected to be in another world, and to be in existence when the dying Lord should come into His kingdom. He believed all that, and it is more than some do nowadays. He also believed that Jesus would have a kingdom, a kingdom after He was dead, a kingdom though he was crucified. He believed that he was winning for himself a kingdom by those nailed hands and pierced feet. This was intelligent faith, was it not? He believed that Jesus would have a kingdom in which others would share, and therefore he aspired to have his portion in it. Oh, dear sirs, if any of you have thought of this dying thief only as one who put off repentance, I want you now to think of him as one that did greatly and grandly believe in Christ; and oh, that you would do the same!

III. But now, thirdly, as God shall help me, I wish to show you another speciality—namely, in of his faith. Oh, I have heard people say, 'Well, you see, the dying thief was converted; but then he was not baptized. He never went to communion, and never joined the Church!' He could not do either; and that which God Himself renders impossible to us He does not demand of us. He was nailed to the cross; how could he be baptized? But he did a great deal more than that; for if he could not carry out the outward signs, he most manifestly exhibited the things which they signified, which, in his condition, was better still.

This dying thief first of all confessed the Lord Jesus Christ; and that is the very essence of baptism. He confessed Christ. Did he not acknowledge Him to his fellow-thief? It was as open a confession as he could make it. Did he not acknowledge Christ before all that were gathered around the cross who were within hearing? It was as public a confession as he could possibly cause it to be. Yet certain cowardly fellows claim to be Christians, though they have never confessed Christ to a single person, and then they quote this poor thief as an excuse. Are they nailed to a cross? Are they dying in agony? Oh, no; and yet they talk as if they could claim the exemption which these circumstances would give them. What a dishonest piece of business! This man came out, then and there, and made as open an avowal of his faith in Christ as was possible.

GOSPEL WORK.

The next thing he did was to rebuke his fellow-sinner. He spoke to him in answer to the ribaldry with which he had assailed our Lord. I do not know what the unconverted convict had been blasphemously saying, but his converted comrade spoke very honestly to him. "Dost not thou fear God, seeing thou art in the same condemnation? And we indeed justly; for we receive the due reward of our deeds; but this Man hath done nothing amiss." It is more than ever needful in these days that believers in Christ should not allow sin to go-unrebuked; and yet a great many of them do so. Do you not know that a person who is silent when a wrong thing is said or done may become a participator in the sin? If you do not rebuke sin—I mean, of course, on all fit occasions, and in a proper spirit—your silence will give consent to the sin, and you will be an aider and abettor in it.

See, again, another mark of this man's faith. He prays; and his prayer is directed to Jesus. "Lord, remember me when Thou comest into Thy kingdom." True faith is always praying faith. "Behold, he prayeth," is one of the surest tests of the new birth. Oh, friends, may we abound in prayer, for thus we shall prove that our faith in Jesus Christ is what it ought to be! This converted robber opened his mouth wide in prayer; he prayed with great confidence as to the coming kingdom, and he sought that kingdom first, even to the exclusion of all else.

Oh, that some penitent spirit here might be helped thus to believe, thus to confess, thus to defend his Master, thus to adore, thus to worship; and then the age of the convert would be a matter of the smallest imaginable consequence.

IV. Now, the last remark is this: There was something very special about the dying thief as to

to him about the world to come. He said to him, "To-day shalt thou be with Me in Paradise." He only asked the Lord to remember him, but he obtained this surprising answer, "To-day shalt thou be with Me in Paradise."

In some respects I envy this dying thief, for this reason—that when the Lord pardoned me, and pardoned the most of you, who are present, He did not give us a place in Paradise that same day. We are not yet come to the rest which is promised to us. No, you are waiting here. Some of you have been waiting very long. It is thirty years with many of us. It is forty years, it is fifty years, with many others since the Lord blotted out your sins, and yet you are not with Him in Paradise. There is something for us to do in the wilderness, and so we are kept out of the heavenly garden.

I remember that Mr. Baxter said that he was not in a hurry to be gone to heaven; and a friend called upon Dr. John Owen, who had been writing about the glory of Christ, and asked him what he thought of going to heaven. That great divine replied, "I am longing to be there." "Why," said the other, "I have just spoken to holy Mr. Baxter, and he says that he would prefer to be here, since he thinks that he can be more useful on earth." "Oh!" said Dr. Owen, "my brother Baxter is always full of practical godliness, but for all that I cannot say that I am at all desirous to linger in this mortal state. I would rather be gone." Each of these men seems to me to have been the half of Paul. Paul was made up of the two, for he was desirous to depart, but he was willing to remain because it was needful for the people. We would put both together, and, like Paul, have a strong desire to depart and to be with Christ, and yet be willing to wait if we can do service to our Lord and to His Church.

SHORT WORK.

Still, I think he has the best of it who is converted, and enters heaven the same night. This robber breakfasted with the devil, but he dined with Christ on earth, and supped with Him in Paradise. This was short work, but blessed work. What a host of troubles he escaped! What a world of temptation he missed! What an evil world he quitted! He was just born, like a lamb dropped in the field, and then he was lifted into the Shepherd's bosom straight away. I do not remember the Lord ever saying this to anybody else. I dare say it may have happened that souls have been converted and have gone home at once; but I never heard of anybody that had such an assurance from Christ as this man had: "Verily, I say unto thee; such a personal assurance: 'Verily, I say unto thee, To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise.' Dying thief, thou wert favored above many, 'to be with Christ, which is far better,' and to be with Him so soon!

Why is it that our Lord does not thus emparadise all of us at once? It is because there is something for us to do on earth. My brethren, are you doing it? Are you doing it? Some good people are still on earth; but why? But why? What is the use of them? I cannot make it out. If they are indeed the Lord's people, what are they here for? They get up in the morning and eat their breakfast, and in due course eat their dinner, and their supper, and go to bed and sleep; at a proper hour they get up the next morning, and do the same as on the previous day. Is this living for Jesus? Is this life? It does not come to much. Can this be the life of God in man? Oh, Christian people, do justify your Lord in keeping you waiting here! How can you justify Him but by serving Him to the utmost of your power? The Lord help you to do so! Let us begin to live if we have been half dead. May the Spirit of God make something of us yet, so that we may go as industrious servants from the labors of the vineyard to the pleasures of the Paradise! To our once crucified Lord be glory forever and ever! Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

AUTHORSHIP OF THE GOSPELS,

by William Marvin. Among the most dangerous of the assaults on the Bible is that which denies that the four Gospels were written by the men whose names they bear. This denial assails the very foundation of faith. It is true that a man might still hold to his faith while doubting whether the books were actually written by Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John. He might believe that, as Bancroft has given us a trustworthy history of the United States, and accurately described events which happened long before he was born, so these Gospels may have been written by scholars who had access to materials from which they constructed a true and reliable narrative. Such a man, however, would have an uneasy consciousness of insecurity. He would feel that perhaps the writers were mistaken, had accepted myth for fact, and, without intending to deceive, had placed on record false or exaggerated statements which they honestly believed. The feeling would be fatal to his peace. He would lose the power that springs from absolute, unwavering confidence, and which nerves the heart and inspires for labor and suffering. This seed of doubt is being sown broadcast through the land, and it is doing a deadly work outside the Church; and no one fully realizes how much mischief it is doing within the Church, especially among its younger members. They keep up their Church connection because their pious father and mother would break their hearts to see their son leave the Church, or their respectability would be impaired; but their hearts are no longer right. Their zeal dies away. They cannot teach in Sunday-school, because when the children ask questions they cannot answer according to their belief. They become weak in the faith.

For such as these Judge Marvin writes this little book. He remembers that many of them are busy men absorbed in business and with no opportunity for investigation, and he therefore collects testimony from the Fathers, from ancient authorities, and places it verbatim in evidence. It is the work of a lawyer, and a lawyer who is convinced that he has a good case. Many a troubled, distressed man will rise from its perusal with a sigh of relief, convinced that the aspersions cast on his beloved book are false. Judge Marvin presents a case which would convince an intelligent jury if the question involved were one of copyright, and his argument is very much such as one might fancy him addressing to a jury in a suit brought to decide the authorship of Longfellow's "Hiawatha." It will do an immense amount of good, and deserves a wide circulation. Pp. 142; price, 75 cents. Published by Thomas Whittaker, 2 Bible House, New York.

and the Pompeiians, by Marc Monnier, is an illustrated work describing the exhumed city which was buried nearly two thousand years ago. There is something very fascinating about those ruins which appeals to every one. So sudden was the eruption which burst from Vesuvius on that November night of the year 79, that when, recently, the ashes and lava were removed, the life of the city was spread before the excavators with terrible realism. There were the loaves of bread still in the baker's oven, while the baker himself, caught by the descending stifling torrent, lay there in the midst of his occupation a corpse. Women who stayed to collect their jewels fell in the streets, and the jewels for which they gave their lives lay clenched in their lifeless hands, or scattered on the sidewalk.

Natalie, Queen of Serbia, Visiting Wounded Soldiers in the Red Cross Hospital.

Life was suddenly arrested—so suddenly that it is possible to see exactly what the people were doing at the dreadful moment, what they wore, the implements and utensils they used, the shape of their houses, and the very pictures on their walls. M. Monnier gives a vivid description of all these things, and of many of them he gives pictures. His historical sketch of the city, also, is very interesting. No Christian reader can peruse the volume without being solemnized as he reads. As one thinks of the possibility of an American city being suddenly stricken with death, one cannot but realize how sad would be the picture it would present when uncovered. What revelations there would be of the life men are leading now—of crime and shameful vice. Such a calamity could not happen, but the day is coming when the summons will be heard, "Behold, the Bridegroom cometh," and only those who are waiting and watching will go in with Him to the marriage. We are irresistibly reminded of that day as we read these pages. Pp. 250; price, $1. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

LITTLE INTERCESSORS.

THE following letter speaks for itself:

"DEAR SIR: At this time, when the minds of Christians are being much exercised over James 5: 14, 15, and other passages in God's Word bearing on the same subject, it seems to me that the following little instance of the kind of true, simple, unquestioning faith, such as our God delights to honor, should be recorded.

"The parents of three little children have anxiously thought and prayed over the question as to how soon and how much to teach the little minds entrusted to them about heavenly and unseen things. They decided to tell them only by degrees what they could clearly understand, praying that spiritual things might always be a great reality to their little hearts.

"A few weeks ago the mother was taken seriously ill. One morning little Magdalen, the eldest, stopped short in the midst of her play, and came to her father with an earnest look on her merry little face. 'Father,' she said, 'don't you think the Lord Jesus would make mother well, if we were all to ask Him together?' 'Yes, darling,' the father answered, 'I am sure He would.' She ran to the others in great delight. 'Come along, Muriel; come along, Cyril! we are all going to ask the Lord Jesus to make mother well!' She made them both kneel down with her, and the father put up a simple prayer for what they wanted, the three little voices all joining in, and repeating each sentence after him; even the youngest earnestly doing his best. Then as they rose, little Magdalen said with a joyous smile: 'There, dad! now we shall soon have mother down to prayers again!'

"From that very day the mother's dangerous illness was suddenly arrested. Each morning, entirely of their own accord, the three little ones came to their father to ask the Lord Jesus again, Magdalen remarking confidently, 'And He'll do it, dad.' On the third day they heard that their mother was nearly well, and coming downstairs. 'Oh! then,' suggested Magdalen, 'we had better ask the Lord Jesus never to let mother be ill again at all any more; and don't you think He'd like his little bodies to thank Him?'

"When they came to the drawing-room that evening, and found their mother down, their joy was great. 'And, you know, my own mother,' said little Magdalen, eagerly, 'we asked Him three times with father, and lots and lots of times alone.' And little Muriel said, 'I asked Him, too.' And the baby boy looked up solemnly, and just said: 'Lord Jesus.'

"Is not this a 'prayer of faith,' such as brings down an immediate answer from the Throne of God, and bears glorious testimony to the teaching power of the Holy Spirit?

"Yours faithfully,

"THE MOTHER."

QUEEN NATALIE AT THE HOSPITAL.

THE Servian war has again called into active exercise the Christian sympathies of the world. Servia has had the skilled assistance of four branches of the Red Cross Society. Hospitals have been set up in Belgrade, the capital of Servia, respectively by the branches of Austria, Prussia, Russia, and England.

The illustration on this page is a copy of a picture taken on the spot by Mr. F. Villiers, an artist who has followed the Servian army. It is of the English Red Cross Hospital, in Belgrade, on the day when Queen Natalie visited it. Her majesty, unlike some royal personages, does not keep herself secluded from the gaze of "the vulgar herd," but goes freely through the streets like any ordinary lady. During the sad time of the weeks succeeding the battles, she spent nearly all her time in the hospitals, going from one to the other, and inquiring after the health of the injured men. She insisted on going through the wards and speaking words of encouragement to the wounded men. She did this not only in the Servian hospitals, but also in those of the foreign agencies of the Red Cross, personally thanking the surgeons and nurses for their ministrations. How welcome her visits are, and how much good they do to loyal Servians, may be imagined. Queen Natalie is only twenty-six years old, and is said to be the most beautiful queen in Europe. It appears from this report of her sympathy that she also possesses beauty of character.

THE DOMINIE'S ONLY SON.

"HAVE you seen the Dominie's baby?" I was asked one morning some two and twenty years ago by one of my brother members as we travelled to the city together from the country village where we lived.

I confessed that I had not. Being a bachelor, I took little interest in babies, and avoided being in their society as much as I could. At that period I voted babies a nuisance. So, though almost every one in the church had been to the parsonage, and the ladies took a deep interest in the new prodigy, I had omitted as yet to tender my homage. I liked Dr. and Mrs. Randall exceedingly, and some of my happiest evenings had been spent in their snug little parsonage; but the coming of the baby had spoiled all that, and I knew that I was best away.

It was the first baby, and as I learned from my mother and sisters it was likely to be spoiled. The dominie was almost as silly about it as his wife. I heard that he would sit and watch it by the hour, and see new wonders in it all the time. It was so intelligent, so bright, and so pretty—in short, it was thought at the parsonage that there had never been quite such a wonderful baby in the world before.

The baby affected everything. The dominie did not speak of it directly from the pulpit, but we heard a great deal in his sermons at that time about parental love; and the opening intelligence of childhood was a favorite illustration with him just then. Of course I had to go to the parsonage sooner or later, and I went. I remember how proudly the doctor called his wife, and what a pretty picture it was that the young mother made entering the room with her infant son in her arms. The dominie took it from her, and dandled it in his arms, and pointed out its beauties to me. He even showed his confidence in me by inviting me to hold it, that I might see how fine a babe it was for its age. "No, thank you," I said, bashfully, "I might drop it and break it." Mrs. Randall looked at me pityingly, and smiled.

The child was not spoiled, in spite of my sisters' predictions. He grew up a fine, intelligent boy. I liked him better when he could run around, and had many a romp with him. He had his father's love of learning, too, and when he went to school he was ahead of all his competitors. Mrs. Randall had no more children, and the dominie gave his only son unlimited attention, supplementing his school instruction as none could do so well as he. He was careful, too, of his physical training, and the boy could run and jump and swim better than any boy of his years. "He will be a credit to you, Doctor," was the best compliment you could pay the dominie, and if you predicted that the boy would be in the Senate or even the Presidential chair some day, it would not be thought that you were talking nonsense. In fact, many more unlikely things might happen, for the boy was a noble, brilliant, intelligent fellow.

It was a memorable day for the dominie when two of his trustees waited on him as a delegation from the church, to inform him that it was the general opinion that his son ought to go to college, and a little sum had been raised sufficient to pay the young man's expenses for the first year, and a similar sum would be forthcoming every year afterward. Nothing could have touched his heart more closely. He was a proud and a happy man—happy in his church and in his son. The young man was duly sent, and we all took an interest in his progress. He succeeded beyond even his fond parent's expectations. When he graduated he was at the head of his class, and the principal of his college spoke of him publicly as a young man of great promise.

The choice of a profession was a serious matter, and I think we were all consulted about it. Eventually the young man's own preference for the law was confirmed, because it was the recognized road to the highest offices in the State and nation. The Presidency or the Senate did not seem such impossible things, after all, when one spent an evening in the young man's society, or heard him lecture in the school-room, as he did several times. So he was received into one of the best law offices in the State, and Dr. and Mrs. Randall thought more than ever of their beloved son.

Two years later I was in Battery Park, New York, and keeping myself well hidden by the trees, I watched unseen a sight I shall never forget. There were the dominie and his wife on the flagstones, close to the chains, looking at a vessel being tugged down the bay. The Doctor was holding a white handkerchief above his head as a farewell signal, while Mrs. Randall clung to his arm. She was not leaning upon it, but the two seemed mutually supporting each other. What was passing in their minds I could guess, and I took care not to intrude upon them. They waited till the ship was lost to sight, and then turned homeward with the look upon both faces of people who had passed a severe ordeal.

In the ship they were watching was their only son, their beloved, almost idolized son, of whom so great things had been expected. He was going to a heathen land to preach the Gospel of Christ, and to do this he had, with his father's approval, sacrificed his brilliant prospects and the joys and comforts of home. How much it cost the parents and the son to carry out this thing no one ever knew. Some of us understood something of it the next Sunday when the dominie preached the most powerful sermon that he had ever produced. The text was: "For God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son" (John 3: 16).

Rescue.

How startling are the contrasts of life! In a crowded street there are differences in the men who brush against each other as they walk, as wide as though they belonged to different orders of being. Differences of occupation, of circumstances, of mental capacity, of moral character set each apart while they are flung together by the tide of life. It is so with any large house. Under the same roof there may be going on at the same moment employments utterly incongruous with each other. But surely there never was a more startling contrast under any roof than in the two scenes which might have been witnessed in that Santa Fé hotel on the night when Crance was making his characteristic attempt to fulfil his pledge to the imperilled girl.

While that strange game of cards was going on down-stairs Myrtie Vane was in her room, on her knees, pleading with God for deliverance. It was not much that she had been taught of religion. Before she came to America with her mother she had lived the life of religious indifference common in European cities. Mrs. Vane gave her daughter little instruction, and that little was directed chiefly to warning her against becoming a Roman Catholic under the influences surrounding her in the Italian capital. Myrtie did not become a Catholic; she learned to despise the gorgeous ritual and the Mariolatry as superstition; but while kept from error she was not led into truth. The severe New England training under which Mrs. Vane grew up was a life unknown to Myrtie. She came to America almost a heathen, and it was not until her good old grandfather had taught her and opened her eyes that she had any real knowledge of the things of God.

During the happy months in which they had all lived together in the Richmond home Myrtie learned much. Her little Bible, the gift of her grandfather, was read attentively and often; the white-haired Christian would spend his morning with the girl explaining the Word and answering his granddaughter's questions. There was much in her nature to which she found a response in Christianity. Gentle, kindly, affectionate, thoughtful, she saw in the meek and lowly Jesus the majesty of the Godhead, and she felt that could she but have seen Him she would gladly have sat at His feet, as Mary did, and have given Him her most treasured possessions, as the woman broke the alabaster box of precious ointment. A few years ago and the direst calamity, the most appalling peril, would not have driven her to her knees; now it was her first impulse.

So much had James Grey's teaching been blessed to her. Not yet did she know Jesus as her Saviour, but she knew Him as a divine Being, knew that He lived still, that she might pray in His name to One who, notwithstanding His infinite majesty, she was privileged to call "Our Father who art in heaven." Thus it was that in her strange predicament, while journeying West, she had prayed unceasingly. Bob Crance's entrance to her room at the Santa Fé hotel, his kindness, and his promise of help seemed to her an answer to her prayers, and encouraged her to persevere. God, who had sent her this eccentric but evidently sincere friend, would surely help him to keep his promise. Therefore she prayed again that God would bless him and give him the courage and skill he would need for her rescue. While she prayed, the man for whom she prayed was below in the gaming room, staking a large sum in money and jewels on a game of cards, while her captor was playing with herself as a stake.

Of all this Myrtie knew nothing. Only once that day had her privacy been disturbed. Stephen Vane came soon after noon and unlocked the door. He directed her to rise and arrange her dress and wash her face, so that she might be seen by the servants without arousing suspicion. She obeyed silently, and then Vane called a servant, who brought up refreshments. Vane stayed while she ate and drank, and waited until the cloth was removed, so that she might have no opportunity of communicating with the servants. Then he had gone away, warning her against making any outcry, and locking her in as before.

Since he went down-stairs the hours seemed to have passed with leaden feet. Again and again she rose from the lounge, and kneeling down, cried earnestly to God for patience and for the coming of the rough man who had promised to protect her and send her to her mother. Where was he? Was it possible that he could fulfil his promise? It seemed so. He looked like a man who could do and dare anything. Also he seemed a man not likely to forget his promise. Still he came not. With every silent hour Myrtie's hopes sank. Remember, she was but young in faith, she had no past experience of God's faithfulness to encourage her, and the difficulties to be surmounted by any one who would rescue her were appalling. Still she prayed; it was her only comfort.

As she was upon her knees a knock came at her door. It was a summons to descend, brought by one of the hotel servants. Myrtie was uncertain as to what she ought to do; but the summons was imperative, and it appeared that if she refused force might be used. She therefore concluded to obey, and followed her conductor to the gaming-room.

She shrank back in terror as the servant threw open the door and revealed the crowd of gamblers, the brilliant lights, the liquors, and the gambling apparatus. She would have turned and fled if she had been able, but she was a stranger in a strange place, and flight would probably end in her being brought back again under more perilous circumstances. She looked around with one swift glance, like a frightened fawn surrounded by dogs, and then her eyes were cast down. Rapid as her survey was, it had shown her the two faces she knew—those of Vane and Bob Crance. Crance's face was pale, but determined, and Myrtie was sure she might count on his protection.

It was a strange silence that fell upon the group of gamblers as the girl entered. Every eye was turned upon her, and in not a few the bold, undisguised admiration expressed was mingled with pity. Her beauty was not of the florid order they generally admired. The frail, retiring, modest face, with its downcast eyes, was a new sight to them, like a vision from another world. Her innocence, her defencelessness, appealed strangely to their natures; they seemed almost awe-struck, and no one spoke.

A full minute passed, and then an old trapper from the Divide, who had apparently been delegated spokesman, advanced toward her and made a curious gesture of respectful deference. He said:

"Lady, we've sent fer ye to settle a dispute over ye. Yer father and another feller hev been gambling fer ye, and the other feller's won. He's won ye fair 'nough, but ye've no cause to be scared. What's a game o' keerds what's played fer a human bein'? We'll just disremember the game, an' you may settle it. If yer like to stick to the critter as brung yer here, or if yer'll go with the feller as won ye, say the word, and we've all agreed ter stand by him as yer fix onto."

The old trapper had probably never said so much at once to any woman in his life before. He did not know what nervousness was, and many a time he had stood unshaken though conscious that he was covered by an enemy's pistol; but he was nervous now, and his voice trembled a little as he spoke, with a tremor none had ever heard in it before. His manner, which he strove to make respectful, showed the true man, and could not have been more deferential had he suddenly found himself in the White House addressing the wife of a President.

Myrtie glanced at the speaker in a wild, startled way, and asked in a timid voice, "Where is the man who won the game?"

Crance stepped forward. "Lady," he said, "it was me as did it. I axes pardon fer gamblin' fer ye, an' if ye say so, I'll giv yer up. If yer takes me, why, ye shall hev yer own way, and I'll keep my promises." He gave her a significant look as he spoke, which Myrtie understood, as he intended she should, to indicate that he spoke of his past promises, while the men around him thought he was alluding to promises he might make at the ceremony which would do duty for a wedding.

"I will take this man," said Myrtie, with a wave of her hand to where Crance stood, and speaking to the trapper.

"Good; she's yours, Bob. I'll stand by yer," said the trapper.

Crance advanced, took Myrtie's hand, and whispered her to go to her room and prepare for her journey home, which would commence at dawn. A shout behind him caused him to turn, and he saw Vane struggling in the arms of two men. A pistol was in his hand, which he was vainly endeavoring to use. He was quickly disarmed and held firmly, but his malignant gaze, which took in Myrtie as well as Crance, told that his intentions were murderous.

"Take him out," said the trapper. "Yer a cheat to go back on a square game," he added to Vane. "Now you make tracks if yer want ter keep a whole skin. If yer show agin here I'll wing yer, if he don't."

Vane was conducted outside, and disappeared in the darkness. Crance watched him depart, and then returned to Myrtie.

"Lady," he said, "that critter's ugly enough to do yer a mischief yet if he can. If yer don't mind, we'll hev him put where he'll be safe afore we start. I'll take yer to some friends o' mine as'll be kind ter yer. There's decent women folks with 'em as'll be company fer yer, and I'll give to-morrow to looking up thet critter and seein' as he won't do yer no more harm. Don't be afeared. I won't hurt a hair of his head."

"I will do as you wish," said Myrtie, faintly. "I will be ready in a few minutes."

Crance briefly explained his design to his friends, and they approved his caution. When Myrtie returned dressed to accompany him, Crance gallantly offered his arm, and the men volunteered to go with the pair. Six men arm-in-arm marched before them, and the rest as a guard of honor in the rear, and so strangely attended Myrtie was conducted to an adobe house in another part of Santa Fé, where, as Crance had told her, his friends were. A kind, motherly face met her gaze as the door was opened, and she was warmly welcomed. Crance commended her to the care of the family, and promising to return in two days at the latest, left her there, and returned with his friends to the hotel.

The next morning he set out on his search for Stephen Vane. There was a faint, grayish, smoky haze on the mountains when he started, such as artists and poets sometimes rave over on the highlands of the Hudson. Thin, fleecy clouds, silent and motionless, hung above the peaks so long and so strangely that it seemed as if some gigantic, unseen power held them in place.

In the green, shady valleys there was a sighing and sighing, indistinct yet discernible, for which it was difficult to account, since there was not even a tremor among the leaves on the sensitive aspens. The sun, too, seemed to be under some baneful influence, and there was something sinister in the sounds which came up from the creeks and rivers.

To a stranger among the Sierras and the quaint, low-lying foothills, the phenomena would have been enchanting; but an experienced mountaineer or plainsman, who would, of course, judge less superficially, would have seen more to dread than to admire.

One of the wildest of these mountain glens lay open to the west, and between it and the opposite range there was an almost colorless vapory film, which told where Santa Fé lay bathing in the morning light.

Half way down this glen a man was sitting on a broken boulder, looking across the long valley toward the western hills.

He was grimy and dirty, and there was a trace of Indian blood in him. His eyes were small, black, and piercing, and his cheek-bones were high and flat. Evidently he was a half-breed.

"It may come in time," he muttered, as he glanced around him. "But if it don't, there's still another way. The storm would be best, though."

Presently his quick ear caught the sound of stealthy and somewhat guarded footsteps. Some one was coming up the valley.

The half-breed slid noiselessly off of the boulder, and crouching behind it awaited the new-comer.

A moment later he laughed, sprang to his feet, and stepped forward to greet Bob Crance.

"Well, Leon," said Crance, "I'm powerful glad ter see ye."

"Anything in the air?"

"Yer bet!"

Leon glanced around, and then asked Crance to explain.

He did so by describing the scene at the gaming-table in Santa Fé two nights before, and then added that he was on Vane's trail.

"Where's the girl?" asked Leon.

"Safe in Santa Fé with some friends o' mine. If I don't get my paws on Vane in a couple o' days I'm goin' ter take the gal back to her mother in the States."

Leon laughed.

"What's ticklin' ye, pard?" asked Crance.

"I was thinking how near you've got to Vane without knowing it."

"What d'ye mean?"

"That he's less than half a mile away."

"Where?"

"In Red Dog's camp."

"No!"

"I say—yes!"

"Prisoner?"

"Yes. They picked him up last night. He and another man—a stranger from the States, I reckon—were engaged in a deadly encounter. This man you call Vane was trying to kill the stranger, and the stranger was trying to capture Vane. They were about equally matched in strength, and it's hard telling which of them would have got handed in if some of my red brethren hadn't come along and captured them both."

"By thunder!" exclaimed Crance, "if that ain't jest bully!"

"I'm not so sure. Red Dog threatens to broil them both—just for the sake of keeping up the honor of the tribe, whatever that may be, and, also, out of respect for its ancient traditions."

Crance laughed heartily, and slapped Leon on the shoulder.

"There ain't much redskin about you, Leon," he said. "You never seem to want ter 'dentify yerself with yer mother's people."

"Who would? Ain't they a lot of brutes at best? They are natural thieves, murderers, vagrants, and vagabonds. You can't civilize, humanize, or do anything with them but kill them. I know them full well—by association and experience. I never caught them at anything yet which wasn't in some way disreputable. As for myself, there's more hellishness in me than there should be in a whole nation. The 'noble red man.' Pah!"

And he turned away with an exclamation of disgust, and with unmitigated contempt on his face.

"Leon," said Crance, after a moment's silence, "you're mighty hard on 'em all, an' specially hard on yerself. You've got a horrid mean temper sometimes when ye git riled, sure enough, but fer all that I like ye better'n any other man in the kedentry. That ain't much, I know, but it's somethin'."

"Give me your hand, Crance. What you've just said is a good deal—coming from one in whose blood there is no taint. A few such words, from earnest men like you, would almost make me forget that my mother, a simple, senseless Indian girl, allowed herself to be made the toy of some thoughtless white man in a gay uniform; and that I am only a half-breed. But come; let's go to Red Dog's camp."

NEHEMIAH'S PRAYER.

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 28, Neh. 1. Golden Text, Ps. 108 : 12. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Nehemiah in his Occupation—Concerned for the Jews—Appeals to God—Crying Day and Night—Confessing his People's Sin—Confession Essential—Turning to the Promises—All Committed to God—The Prayer Answered—The Midnight Exploration—Christians who are a Reproach—The Work Completed.

MORE than two years had passed by since the rebuilding of the temple. Although so many of the leading Jews had left Persia under the decree of Cyrus, and the captivity was virtually at an end, yet many of the children of Israel filled important posts and held government offices under the king of Persia, or about his person. One of these was Nehemiah, the son of Hachaliah. This man was going on

of his vocation, seeking, no doubt, in these things to glorify God, when one of his brethren, newly returned from a visit to Jerusalem, came with some fellow-travellers to tell him the state of things in their own beloved land. It was the first question on the heart of Nehemiah how it fared with "the Jews which had escaped, which were left of the captivity, and concerning Jerusalem." It was a sad story which his countrymen had to tell: the people were "in great affliction and reproach: the wall of Jerusalem also is broken down, and the gates thereof are burned with fire."

What was to be done? Nehemiah was but a subordinate, there was no one in Persia who would be likely to take up the cause of the poor despised Jews; why, then, trouble about it? Nehemiah knew how dear God's people were to Him, and he knew, too, that there was this state of things; and so, without a word to any man, he definitely turned the whole state of things over into the hands of God. How often we hear people complain of the spiritual death in their churches, in their cities, in their homes! What is to be done? Shall a work of reformation be set on foot? But who is equal to accomplish it? the odds against us are so great. Shall we sigh over it, and let it be? This is the way with most people; but this was not the way with Nehemiah. God did not need to reproach him as he reproached His priests because they would not lay it to heart to give glory to His name (Mal. 2 : 2). "When I heard these words . . . I sat down and wept, and mourned certain days, and fasted, and prayed before the God of heaven." This man of God had his people so upon his heart, that until things were fairly settled with God he could neither rest nor eat. But Nehemiah's prayer was

THE PRAYER OF FAITH;

he began, not by urging his suit and repeating his plea, but by considering the God he had to deal with, "the great and terrible God, that keepeth covenant and mercy"—i.e., the God who is to be relied on, and who could not, and would not, fail him. We do not find Nehemiah examining his own faith or gauging his own zeal; he has gone over to God's side, and seeks to be assured of the reception which his suit will meet with. "Let Thine ear now be attentive, and Thine eyes open, that Thou mayest hear the prayer of Thy servant, which I pray before Thee now, day and night, for the children of Israel, Thy servants." But could this be the prayer of faith, if Nehemiah was praying it day and night? Was it not more like the heathen, who think they shall be heard for their much speaking? No, no, for they use "vain repetitions," and this servant of God was not vainly repeating a request, but confessing the sins of his people as they were brought to his memory, and also his own sins, and those of his father's house.

There is never any real, true turning to God, or returning to Him without

there is no true cleansing of the heart while sin is covered up: "He that covereth his sins shall not prosper; but whose confesseth and forsaketh them shall have mercy" (Prov. 28 : 13). God lays the axe to the root of the trees. God's servant knew His Word, and that the condition of Jerusalem was no chance, but a sure result of defecation on the part of his people; and so fully does he realize the unity and corporate relationship of God's people to one another, that he says, "We [not they] have dealt very corruptly against Thee." But Nehemiah does not remain occupied with the contemplation of sin. Once confessed, God would have us turn from sin and be occupied with Him, our Deliverer and Liberator. Accordingly, Nehemiah turns from the sin to the promises of God (Lev. 26 : 33-42; Deut. 4 : 25-29); and here we see how his prayer was the prayer of faith: "Remember, I beseech Thee, the word that Thou commandedst Thy servant Moses, saying, If ye transgress, I will scatter you abroad among the nations: but if ye turn unto Me, and keep My commandments, and do them; though there were of you cast out unto the uttermost part of the heaven, yet will I gather them from thence, and will bring them unto the place that I have chosen to set My name there." Having thus recalled to God His own repeated promise, Nehemiah applies it with the utmost assurance to the present circumstances. "Now these are Thy servants whom Thou hast redeemed by Thy great power, and by Thy strong hand"—as much as to say, "Now, Lord, is the opportunity to fulfil Thy Word. . . . And prosper, I pray Thee, Thy servant this day, and grant him mercy in the sight of this man" (i.e., the king, whose cup-bearer he was).

Nehemiah had now committed all into God's hands, and had believed for the people, as for himself, that God had undertaken; now he could rest, although no change had taken place. How should it come about? This man of God knew that the God of Israel was not exhausted of resources. In the course of the same day, the king remarked on the sadness of Nehemiah's countenance, and read aright that it proceeded from "sorrow of heart." And then in eloquent terms he said, "Let the king live forever: why should I not be sad when the city, the place of my fathers' sepulchres, lieth waste, and the gates thereof are consumed with fire?" God was at work, and inclined the king to make everything easy; he said: "For what dost thou make request?" Could it be possible that the heathen king was in earnest in giving this servant of his palace a carte blanche to ask for what he would? Even so; but the man of God now felt his dependence more than before. "So I prayed unto the God of heaven. And I said unto the king, 'Led by God, he makes the bold request that himself might be sent to Jerusalem to rebuild it, and yet more, that a passport be given him to present to the governors beyond the river who had so thwarted Ezra the scribe, and yet more, that a grant of wood from the forest should be made, that so timber might be procured for all the building operations which he proposed. Was it wonderful that the king granted him all this? No; himself explains it, 'according to upon me.' So complete and full was the answer of God that His servant could bear witness. "So it pleased the king to send me." But blessed and full as was God's answer to his prayer, this child of God must, in common with all His children, meet with trial; all was not smooth sailing. On his arrival in the land of Judah, furnished with the king's letters, and accompanied by a Persian bodyguard, it did not please Sanballat the Heronite, and Tobiah the servant, the Ammorite, but "it grieved them exceedingly that there was come a man to seek the welfare of the children of Israel." The time will never be till Jesus comes again that the servants of God shall be without persecution.

Before Nehemiah told his mission to his brethren the Jews, he came and abode in the city, and took a survey of it by night—probably a moonlight night—that he might speak of the desolation of it from the testimony of his own eyes, and not from hearsay. If we would do any good in our churches, Sunday-school classes, or elsewhere, we must learn how to take a survey of the state of things while others are asleep; then we see things that others do not see at all: we see needs which they do not recognize, and God uses us to awaken them to these things. After making this survey Nehemiah sought out the rulers, and said to them, "Ye see the distress that we are in, how Jerusalem lieth waste, and the gates thereof are burned with fire: come, and let us build up the wall of Jerusalem, that we be

NO MORE A REPROACH."

How many of God's children are a reproach, not to their churches, but to the name of Christ! Sour, unkind, selfish, grasping Christians! Oh, what dishonor do they do to the name of Christ! And the saddest part of all is, that those who do the Lord the most dishonor are unconscious of it themselves. God will provide means to make them know it, as here He sent His messenger to the rulers of the Jews; and if they hear, then will come deliverance. "Then I told them of the hand of my God which was good upon me." Yes, and he gave them solid proof, "also the king's words that he had spoken unto me." It was enough; the hitherto lethargic Jews were stirred up, and said,

"LET US RISE UP AND BUILD."

The same God who had worked in Shushan with the king worked in Jerusalem with the Jews. If we were always on God's side, considering Him and His will and power working with us, we should always see Him strong to work on those to whom He sends us.

Nehemiah was not left to work on without hindrance; while the Jews arose and built (all except the nobles), Sanballat and Tobiah came and laughed them to scorn. But the man of God asserted divine authority for what they were doing, and declared that God would prosper them. Their enemies next sought to turn them into ridicule, but the man of prayer, without answering them, turned this also over to God (Neh. 4 : 1-4). They next conspired to fight against Jerusalem, and again this man of prayer called in his God to the rescue. Their next attempt was to divert Nehemiah from the work to meet with them outside Jerusalem, but he answered, "I am doing a great work, so that I cannot come down." They then sent word that it was reported he was stirring up rebellion, and that it was absolutely necessary that he should consult with them. But all throughout Nehemiah was dealing with God, and praying about everything as it arose, letting God have the burden. Consequently the work was done, his prayer was fully answered: "And it came to pass that when all our enemies heard thereof, and all the heathen that were about us saw these things, they were much cast down in their own eyes: for they perceived that this work was wrought of God."

FROM DAY TO DAY.

BY MRS. HELEN E. BROWN.

My days are stairs that lead to life's great end,
And one by one I steadily ascend;
Climbing with purpose true the upward road
That brings me to the city of my God.

Sometimes the step is bright with the full sun
That shines in cloudless radiance thereon;
Sometimes a shadow falls upon the way,
But, dark or light, I need not go astray.

One stair is rough, with thorn-points all bestrawed,
But shoes of iron tread the nettles down;
And one, so steep, my weary crippled feet
The painful ascent scarcely can complete.

Sometimes it is a slippery step I tread,
And fierce temptations make my soul afraid;
But held in Christ's dear hands, so tender, strong,
The next I mount with courage and a song.

Each step in the long course a history has;
I make a mark as one by one I pass;
A gladness record here, a tear-spot there,
A rescued soul, a struggle or a prayer.

And on life's mystic ladder to the skies
Bright angels come and go to paradise;
And work grows dearer as the end draws near,
Until I reach at last the golden stair.

And enter through the open pearly gate;
Where, with our King, souls watch for me and wait;
There at his feet I'll cast my trophies down,
And shout the victory which his love has won.

The EARL OF ROSEBERY, British Secretary of State—Mr. JOHN MORLEY, Irish Secretary—Queen Victoria's Marine Residence.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY, The British Secretary of State.

AMONG the group of men whom Mr. Gladstone has called to his assistance in conducting the administration of Great Britain, the most interesting figures are the two men whose portraits appear on the first page. Those readers who have studied the condition and character of the British Empire know that the management of Ireland and the conduct of the State Department are the duties which will be the most difficult to perform, and which demand the highest qualities of statesmanship. Who can so conduct the government of Ireland, with its complications of landlord and tenant, and the irrepressible desire for Home Rule, as to satisfy the Irish, on the one hand, and the English on the other? Again, England has succeeded in acquiring territory in all quarters of the globe. No war can break out in Europe, Asia, Africa, or America, in which her interests are not nearly or remotely concerned. Who, then, can guide the foreign policy of the government so as to keep clear of complications? At the head of each of these critical departments Mr. Gladstone has put a comparatively untried man. If he had chosen unknown men for the positions he would have been censured, but the men, though new to official life, are both well and favorably known to the public.

The Secretary of State, the Earl of Rosebery, is a much younger man than is usually placed in so responsible a position. He is only thirty-nine years of age, having been born in 1847. He is a Scotch nobleman, though born in London. He was educated at Eton College and Oxford University. Before he arrived at man's estate his father died, and he consequently became next heir to the peerage then held by his grandfather. In 1868, before the young man had finished his college course, the old nobleman died, and Archibald Philip Primrose became Earl of Rosebery. He belonged to the small class among the British nobility not spending their lives in idle pleasure. Serious, thoughtful, earnest in character, he gave himself to the study of public questions, and soon won the respect of the people by his sensible, manly utterances. When he had occasion to make a speech in public he addressed his audience, if not as equals, at all events as men, which is a rare thing for the haughty British peer to do. Beside this, whether speaking in the House of Lords or to a mixed audience, he did not speak without showing that he had mastered his subject, and what he said was worth hearing.

The young Earl became an ardent admirer of Mr. Gladstone, and cultivated friendly relations with him. The Premier was a frequent guest at his house, and it delighted the Earl to render him personal homage. The regard was mutual. Mr. Gladstone liked the young man, and conceived a high respect for his character and talents. An evidence of this fact was given under his last administration. During that critical time last year, when war between Russia and England on the Afghan question seemed inevitable, a confidential mission to the German Government from England was deemed advisable. How much Prince Bismarck might do to avert war, if he felt disposed, was realized, and a mission was decided upon. It was placed in the hands of the Earl of Rosebery. His tact and wisdom were proved, and he was completely successful. Doubtless the qualities he displayed on that occasion suggested to Mr. Gladstone the propriety of placing him at the head of the Foreign Office in his new Cabinet.

The appointment gives general satisfaction. The English people were tired of the compliant, pulpy policy of Lord Granville, and were very much of the opinion, expressed some time ago by Lord Rosebery himself, that "nothing is so calculated to bring about war as evincing anxiety at any price to avoid it." Even the London Times, which has few good words just now for Mr. Gladstone and his Cabinet, says of the appointment that it is very satisfactory, and adds: "In his hands the foreign policy of England may be rightly or wrongly guided, but at all events, it will not be allowed to drift helplessly to and fro on the waters of diplomacy."

Apart from politics, Lord Rosebery has attained more eminence than usually falls to the lot of a young nobleman. He was chosen in 1878 Lord Rector of the University of Aberdeen, and acquitted himself very creditably in the duties of the office to which the young men of the University called him. His addresses to the students at the commencement and close of his term were models of grace and vigor of language, and showed much original thought and learning. In July, 1883, Edinburgh, the classic, imperturbable city, roused itself to do honor to the young Scotch lord. It conferred upon him the freedom of the city. The speech in which the Provost explained the reasons for conferring so distinguished an honor on so young a man was remarkable for its unstinted eulogy, a rare characteristic of a Scotchman's speech. He said that for what Lord Rosebery's family had done, for what he himself had done, for what it is hoped he may do hereafter, for the eloquence with which he has contended for the just claims of Scotland, for his knowledge of Scotch affairs, for his unselfish devotion, for the statesmanlike ability which he has brought to the consideration of public business, for his warm interest in the affairs of the city and constant service to every scheme in aid of its welfare—for all these reasons Edinburgh delights to honor the foremost Scotchman of the day.

A great career is open before Lord Rosebery if his life is spared. Not only has he learning, splendid talents, industry, and sympathy with the people, but he possesses great wealth, and has therefore none of those limitations to his opportunities which have crippled other statesmen at the outset of their career. His wife, whom he married in March, 1878, is the daughter of Baron Meyer de Rothschild, and his alliance with the wealthy Jewish house brought him a considerable fortune in possession and in prospect. It was condemned by a section of the Jewish community, but the Earl's influence has already operated to Jewish advantage in so conspicuous a way that possibly he has by this time been forgiven for securing the coveted matrimonial prize.

Lord and Lady Rosebery are well known in this country, where they have many friends. They were here about two years ago on a visit to the Belmonts of New York, and travelled extensively, crossing the continent to San Francisco. The Earl had previously paid several visits to America, his first trip in 1872 having favorably impressed him with our institutions, in which he took a deep interest.

JOHN MORLEY, LL.D., The Secretary for Ireland.

THE distinguished man who has given undoubted proof of his moral courage in accepting the difficult and dangerous post of Irish Secretary is forty-eight years of age, having been born at Blackburn in 1838. His father was a physician of some repute in the town, a pious evangelical Christian, but somewhat eccentric in manner. The boy was sent to Cheltenham College for his education, and afterward to Oxford University. He was not a diligent student, but was remarkable as a deep thinker, profoundly interested in religious and social questions. His fellow-students spoke of him contemptuously as "a mooning evangelical," because he had no sympathy with the Romanizing tendencies of the University, and despised Ritualism, the confessional, and the High Church ideas as retrograde. Unhappily, the epithet itself was misapplied. John Morley was as far from being an Evangelical as from being a Ritualist. He became infected with the doctrines of the school in which John Stuart Mill and George Henry Lewes were the shining lights, and he now presents the mournful spectacle of a man of pre-eminent abilities profoundly anxious to promote the advancement of his fellow-men, deeply sympathetic with them in their sorrows and their wrongs, yet unable to lead them to the only true source of light and hope. Like Carlyle and other great men, he is laboring earnestly for the benefit of the people, warning them of error, crying earnestly against sin, urging them to righteousness and purity of life, yet without faith in Christ, and neglecting the only means which have ever been found efficacious in elevating the human character. His character is one of the saddest subjects of contemplation because his objects are most commendable, yet he persistently rejects the means to their achievement. What he might accomplish for his country and for the masses, whom he loves with all his heart if he could only see in Christ the way, the truth, and the life, no man could conceive. At present he is spiritually blind, and is seeking to accomplish by philosophic Radicalism, tinctured with a dash of Socialism, the ends which nothing but the Gospel of Christ can ever achieve.

John Morley abandoned at Oxford any ideas he may have had on entering of devoting his life to the Church. He adopted the law as his profession, but though he is entitled to practice as a barrister in the courts, he has never used the right. He entered the field of journalism, and from that time to this his efforts have been directed to inducing the wealthy, aristocratic, and cultured classes of his countrymen to adopt Radical ideas. His desire is to raise the condition of the poor, to alleviate their miseries, to render their homes healthy and refined, to help them in their struggles with their selfish employers, and to teach them morality. His first appearance was in a journal called the Leader; subsequently he joined the staff of the Saturday Review, and for a short time was editor of the daily Morning Star. That journal, when he assumed editorial charge, was in the last throes of extinction through pecuniary difficulties, and it was too late for even his brilliant genius to save it. Then he became editor of the Fortnightly, and there he found his congenial work.

He visited America in 1869, shortly after assuming his new duties, and spent some time in studying our institutions. He returned home with his Radicalism invigorated by the sight of a free people governing themselves, unburdened by monarchy or a peerage, and from that time his articles have been bold, fearless, and uncompromising. He showed himself a republican in theory, and makes no secret of his belief that England would be more prosperous, stronger, and better under a republican form of government. Nevertheless he is not an advocate of revolution. Very ingeniously he has shown how, without a social convulsion, England may become really a republic while nominally under a monarchy, and that the people may rule, while the monarch merely executes their will. Recent events show that his lessons are being learned, for already the executive in England has less power than is wielded by the president of a republic.

About four years ago John Morley became editor of the Pall Mall Gazette, but relinquished it after a brief tenure, when he entered Parliament as member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne. He was succeeded by Mr. Stead, whom he had already introduced on its staff as his sub-editor. It was the natural outcome of such work as John Morley had been doing that he should sit in the legislative council of the nation. The bent of his mind and his remarkable abilities qualify him for grappling with the social and political problems which are pressing upon Parliament for solution. The fact has been recognized by Mr. Gladstone, who has placed in his hands the one which it is conceded is the most difficult and almost hopeless of all. If, as Secretary for Ireland, he succeeds in pacifying that unhappy country, he will achieve a triumph which the ablest statesmen from the time of Cromwell to this have tried to achieve and have failed. We in America tender him our most sincere wishes for success. If he makes Ireland so happy and prosperous that the Irishmen in our New York Board of Aldermen and in other public offices are irresistibly attracted to their native country, and go there to assist in the government of it, we will submit to the bereavement, supported by the reflection that the country which produced them ought justly to have any benefit it can get from their services.

As a speaker, Mr. Morley is remarkably clear and pointed. He goes to the root of every question he discusses with calm and merciless logic. His utterances, always carefully prepared, are more like a finished political article for the press, but they are never delivered in a dry and uninteresting manner. His voice is not strong, but the articulation, the intonation, and the management of the vocal organs are so good, that even a large audience is aroused and interested, and can follow him with ease, and this though his appeals are almost invariably addressed to the intellect rather than to the feelings. He is, in fact—his enemies themselves being judges—a remarkable example of a highly cultured man, who by the force of his own brilliant and lucid intellect can rouse and stir the intellect of others, without unduly exciting their feelings or playing upon their passions. It is well that at this trying juncture a recognized leader of the people is a man of this character. It may be hoped that he will be enabled to guide the aspirations of an inevitable broadening democracy, without their efforts for reform degenerating into sanguinary revolution.

That Mr. Morley enters upon his new duties with a desire to establish some kind of Parliament in Ireland is evident from a remark he made in a recent speech before accepting office. He said: "I do not know how Mr. Gladstone is going to crown the work he has done for Ireland, but I trust that he will complete it by giving to Ireland a system of government which will meet her highest claims, and which will leave us in Great Britain free to go on with our own necessary work." He declared for a large measure of Home Rule, in spite of the "enormous risks" which he admitted were inseparable from such a scheme. Elective Boards with merely administrative powers Mr. Morley pronounced both inadequate and untrustworthy, contending that nothing short of "a large assembly, with important functions and great duties and a sense of responsibility," would be a tolerable solution of the Irish problem. There can be no doubt about what Mr. Morley means by such words, and if he is not hampered by his colleagues he will doubtless propose the organization of a Parliament in Dublin with full power to deal with all Irish questions. When that is achieved we may at last have rest from the endless iteration of the shrieks about Saxon tyranny in the Emerald Isle.

OSBORNE HOUSE.

THE royal residence known as "Osborne House" in the Isle of Wight, a picture of which appears on the first page, was the place in which the administration of the British Empire was formally transferred, during the recent political crisis, from Lord Salisbury to Mr. Gladstone. The British mind is peculiarly conservative, and clings to old forms and ceremonies long after they have become meaningless. The old constitutional fiction that the Premier and his colleagues are the servants of the Queen is still observed. Therefore, when, owing to the vote of the House of Commons, Lord Salisbury had to relinquish office, he travelled to the Isle of Wight, where the Queen happened to be at the time, and tendered to her his resignation. There, too, Mr. Gladstone went when he received the royal command to take the office Lord Salisbury had quitted, and was formally invested with it. It is well understood that the ceremony is a mere form. The Queen does not exercise the power which our Presidents exercise of choosing and dismissing a Cabinet. If she could choose she would not have chosen Mr. Gladstone. She simply obeys the wishes of the people, and when the representatives elected by the people pronounced condemnation on the Cabinet, she appointed the man in whom the people are supposed to have confidence.

The Queen has many residences, but since the death of her husband, in 1861, she has divided her time between Osborne House and Balmoral in Scotland. At rare intervals she has gone for a few days to Windsor Castle, and occasionally has spent a day at her magnificent residence in London called Buckingham Palace. Osborne House is a modern residence. The Queen purchased the estate on which it stands from its owners in 1840. It was originally called Austerbourne, or Oysterbourne, and derives its name, it is said, from the "oyster-beds of the river Medina." It was an ancient possession of the Bowermans, an old Isle of Wight family not yet extinct. The estate passed subsequently into the hands of one Eustace Mann, who, during the troubles of the Civil War in the seventeenth century, buried a mass of gold and silver coins in a coppice still known as Money Coppice, and having forgotten to mark the spot, was never afterward able to recover his treasure. The estate passed into the hands of his granddaughter, who married a Mr. Blachford, and it was from one of his descendants, Lady Isabella Blachford, that the Queen bought it. She has since bought adjacent lands as she had opportunity, until now the estate comprises five thousand acres.

The original stone mansion was demolished when the Queen became its possessor, and the present Osborne House was erected in the Italian style, under the direction of Mr. T. Cubitt. The campanile, or belfry tower, is ninety feet high, and the flag-tower one hundred and twelve feet. The royal apartments are superbly adorned by a large and choice collection of statuary and paintings, and look out upon terraced gardens, and a lawn which stretches to the shore of the Solent. On this lawn, in summer, marquees and tents are erected for fêtes, garden-parties, etc., when her Majesty's German relatives, some of whom are generally about her, enjoy themselves to their hearts' delight.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

An Unexpected Summons.—At a recent Meeting Mr. Sommerville observed: "Four weeks ago I visited a man upon business. He was in perfect health, and assured me that he would transact business with me the next time I called upon him. But how uncertain our time is; we know not what a day may bring forth; we cannot say for certain what we will do the next hour. Four days after I left him, his body was in the grave, and his soul gone to appear before his God, whether prepared or unprepared I cannot say. Dear friends, death must come to all sooner or later; then let me entreat of you, ere it be too late, remember how short the time is, and 'prepare to meet thy God.'"

A Perilous Present to a Lady.—"In an Evangelistic meeting lately there was a young woman being shown by earnest friends the way of life through Christ; but after much pleading from a worker, she rose and said: 'I can't understand it; I don't see how I am to become a Christian.' But just as she was going away, the Holy Spirit arrested and enlightened her, and, turning, she exclaimed: 'I will trust Him.' And then she told how she had been hindered from accepting Christ by being unwilling to part with what she knew to be wrong. A young man had sent her a ticket for a ball. Now, she knew that if she became a Christian she could not consistently go to the ball or take pleasure in it if she did go. When she had made her decision, her heart was so full of joy that she had no desire to go to the ball, and she mailed the ticket that night to the giver."

Hugging Sour Apples.—"A Little Boy Came into his father's house with some sour apples, which, sour though they were, the little fellow seemed to enjoy. His father called him, and asked for the apples, telling Johnnie they would hurt him. But Johnnie was of a different opinion, and did not feel disposed to give them up; so he only hugged them closer to him, and continued chewing the unwholesome fruit. Seeing that the child would not part with the apples, the indulgent father went to a fruiterer's shop and bought some ripe pears, and taking them to Johnnie, he said: 'Now, Johnnie, give me the apples, and I will give you these pears.' No need to ask a second time, for the child dropped his apples willingly, that he might possess of the better things. He was wiser than some of you. While a wise and loving Father is pleading with you against your indulgence in sin, and offers you something far better, you still hug your sin to you eagerly."

Mr. Moody and a Millionaire.—At a recent meeting Mr. Ferrie said: "One day Mr. Moody was going along a street in Chicago, when he met a very wealthy gentleman, a millionaire, one of the leading men of the city. Mr. Moody, stopping, asked him to give him some money for his mission work, and the gentleman, laughing sarcastically, said: 'I will give you the widow's mite.' 'That is your all, then,' said Mr. Moody. The gifts of millionaires, when they make them, are not to be despised, but they cannot hope to take rank in God's sight with the widow, because He estimates the value of the gift by the self-denial it involves."

Three Demented Debtors.—Mr. Dale remarked: "In India, in the city of Delhi, a man was imprisoned for debt. He was placed in an apartment with some others who were there for the same cause. While he was in prison he became heir to a large sum of money. He soon paid what was due, and was released. When he was set at liberty himself his heart was filled with pity for his imprisoned friends, and he wondered if he would have enough money to set them also free; so he went to the governor and asked him to make up the sum of the debt. He did so, and the man found he had enough of money to cover it, and at once paid down the required sum. 'Now,' said he to the governor, 'go and set them free.' 'No,' was the reply; 'you must come and have the honor yourself, for you have paid their ransom.' Don't you think those imprisoned men would have been very joyous and glad? Oh, friends, wait a moment; some were, but some were not! There were three men in that prison who refused to be set at liberty by him because he was not of the same religion. Did they not deserve to stay and suffer in prison? They were like Naaman, who wanted to be healed in a particular way, and like many more who would have salvation if they could get it by being good or any way but as a free gift."

A Saved Drunkard's Confession.—At a Praise and prayer-meeting lately a man in the audience gave the following personal testimony: "Dear friends, it is not without deep gratitude to God that I tell of His wonderful love to me. I was a great drunkard, and when God's spirit used to strive with me I thought, 'Had it been any other sin but drink I could have given it up, but strong drink I can never.' One day it forcibly struck me that no drunkard will ever enter the kingdom of heaven. From that moment I had no peace. My wife was a praying woman, and often pleaded with me to accept of her Jesus. At such times I feigned to be angry with her to get the subject stopped, but it was of no use; God's still small voice continued to whisper to me through the loving entreaties of my dear wife. One day I called upon a friend to try and divert my mind from this subject, and spoke of worldly amusements. My friend even remarked that I was looking very blithe, but my heart was sad and weary, for in the midst of all my feigned happiness the solemn words came into my mind, 'No drunkard will ever enter the kingdom of heaven.' Oh, how these words preyed upon my mind! and in that friend's house I cried in my heart, 'Oh, God! I must yield to Thee.' I went home and read a part of the 54th Psalm; then I went on my knees and cried to the Lord to forgive me, and make me His own faithful child; and there God, for Christ's sake, forgave me all."

DUTIES OF WIVES TO HUSBANDS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, Feb. 21, 1886.

"The name of his wife was Abigail: and she was a woman of good understanding and of a beautiful countenance."—I SAMUEL 25: 3.

A Wife's Propitiation—A Submissive Pair—A Model Wife—Good to a Drunken Churl—Wives to be Sympathetic and Forbearing—To be Lovable—To Hide the Husband's Frailties—To Permit no Interference—Get Intelligence—Adorn the Home—A Husband and Son Saved—Good Missionary Work—A Faithful Warning—The Wife the Actual Boss—Her Christian Duty—A Contrast—Marriage for Eternity.

THE ground in Carmel is white, not with fallen snow, but the wool from the backs of three thousand sheep, for they are being sheared. And I hear the grinding of the iron blades together, and the bleating of the flocks, held between the knees of the shearers while the clipping goes on, and the rustic laughter of the workmen. Nabal and his wife Abigail preside over this homestead. David, the warrior, sends a delegation to apply for aid at this prosperous time of sheep-shearing, and Nabal peremptorily declines his request. Revenge is the cry. Yonder over the rocks come David and four hundred angry men with one stroke to demolish Nabal and his sheepfolds and vineyards. The regiment marches in double quick, and the stones of the mountain loosen and roll down, as the soldiers strike them with their swift feet, and the cry of the commander is "Forward! Forward!"

A FAIR PROPITIATOR.

Abigail, to save her husband and his property, hastens to the foot of the hill. She is armed, not with sword or spear, but with her own beauty and self-sacrifice, and when David sees her kneeling at the base of the crag, he cries: "Halt! Halt!" and the caverns echo it: "Halt! Halt!" Abigail is the conqueress! One woman in the right mightier than four hundred men in the wrong! A hurricane stopped at the sight of a water-lily! A dewdrop dashed back Niagara! By her prowess and tact she has saved her husband, and saved her home, and put before all ages an illustrious specimen of what a wife can do if she be godly, and prudent, and self-sacrificing, and vigilant, and devoted to the interests of her husband, and attractive.

As, Sabbath before last, I took the responsibility of telling husbands how they ought to treat their wives—and, though I noticed that some of the men squirmed a little in their pew, they endured it well—I now take the responsibility of telling how wives ought to treat their husbands. I hope your domestic alliance was so happily formed that while married life may have revealed in him some frailties that you did not suspect, it has also displayed excellencies that more than overbalanced them. I suppose that if I could look into the heart of a hundred wives here present and ask them where is the kindest and best man they know of, and they dared speak out, ninety-nine out of a hundred of them would say: "At the other end of this pew."

ABIGAIL'S BAD BARGAIN.

I hope, my sister, you have married a man as Christian and as well balanced as that. But even if you were worsted in conjugal bargain, you cannot be worse off than this Abigail in my text. Her husband was cross and ungrateful, an inebriate, for on the very evening after her heroic achievement at the foot of the hill, where she captured a whole regiment with her genial and strategic behavior, she returned home and found her husband so drunk that she could not tell him the story, but had to postpone it until the next day. So, my sister, I do not want you to keep saying within yourself as I proceed, "That is the way to treat a perfect husband;" for you are to remember that no wife was ever worse swindled than this Abigail of my text. At the other end of her table sat a mean, selfish, snarling, contemptible sot, and if she could do so well for a dastard, how ought you to do with that princely and splendid man with whom you are to walk the path of life?

First, I counsel the wife to remember in what a severe and terrific battle of life her husband is engaged. Whether in professional, or commercial, or artistic, or mechanical life, your husband from morning to night is in a Solferino, if not a Sedan. It is a wonder that your husband has any nerves or patience or suavity left. To get a living in this next to the last decade of the nineteenth century is a struggle. If he come home and sit down preoccupied, you ought to excuse him. If he do not feel like going out that night for a walk or entertainment, remember he has been out all day. You say he ought to leave at his place of business his annoyances, and come home cheery. But if a man has been betrayed by a business partner, or a customer has cheated him out of a large bill of goods, or a protested note has been flung on his desk, or somebody has called him a liar, and everything has gone wrong from morning to night, he must have great genius at forgetfulness if he do not bring some of the perplexity home with him. When you tell me he ought to leave it all at the store or bank or shop, you might as well tell a storm on the Atlantic to stay out there and not touch the coast or ripple the harbor.

RESPECT SELF-SACRIFICE.

Remember, he is not overworking so much for himself as he is overworking for you and the children. It is the effect of his success or defeat on the homestead that causes him the agitation. The most of men after forty-five years of age live not for themselves, but for their families. They begin to ask themselves anxiously the question: "How if I should give out; what would become of the folks at home? Would my children ever get their education? Would my wife have to go out into the world to earn bread for herself and our little ones? My eyesight troubles me; how if my eyes should fail? My head gets dizzy; how if I should drop under apoplexy?" The high pressure of business life and mechanical life and agricultural life is home pressure.

Some time ago a large London firm decided that if any of their clerks married on a salary less than £150—that is, $750 dollars a year—he should be discharged, the supposition being that the temptation might be too great for misappropriation. The large majority of families in America live by utmost dint of economy, and to be honest and yet meet one's family expenses is the appalling question that turns the life of tens of thousands of men into martyrdom. Let the wife of the overborne and exhausted husband remember this, and do not nag him about that, and say you might as well have no husband, when the fact is he is dying by inches that the home may be kept up.

BE LOVABLE.

I charge also the wife to keep herself as attractive after marriage as she was before marriage. The reason that so often a man ceases to love his wife is because the wife ceases to be lovable. In many cases what elaboration of toilet before marriage, and what recklessness of appearance after! The most disgusting thing on earth is a slatternly woman—I mean a woman who never combs her hair until she goes out, or looks like a fright until somebody calls. That a man married to one of these creatures stays at home as little as possible is no wonder. It is a wonder that such a man does not go on a whaling voyage of three years, and in a leaky ship. Costly wardrobe is not required; but, O woman! if you are not willing, by all that ingenuity of refinement can effect, to make yourself attractive to your husband, you ought not to complain if he seek in other society those pleasant surroundings which you deny him.

DO NOT COMPLAIN.

Again, I charge you never talk to others about the frailties of your husband.* Some people have a way, in banter, of elaborately describing to others the shortcomings or unhappy eccentricities of a husband or wife. Ah, the world will find out soon enough all the defects of your companion! No need of your advertising them! Better imitate those women who, having made mistake in affiance, always have a veil to hide imperfections and alleviations of conduct to mention. We must admit that there are rare cases where a wife cannot live longer with her husband, and his cruelties and outrages are the precursor of divorce or separation. But until that day comes keep, the awful secret to yourself—keep it from every being in the universe except the God to whom you do well to tell your trouble. Trouble only a few years at most, and then you can go up on the other side of the grave, and say: "O Lord, I kept the marital secret! Thou knowest how well I kept it, and I thank Thee that the release has come at last. Give me some place where I can sit down and rest awhile from the horrors of an embittered earthly alliance, before I begin the full raptures of heaven." And orders will be sent out to the usher angels, saying: "Take this Abigail right up to the softest seat in the best room of the palace, and let twenty of the brightest angels wait on her for the next thousand years."

* As Abigail did (1 Sam. 25: 25).

AVOID MEDDLERS.

Further, I charge you, let there be no outside interference with the conjugal relation. Neither neighbor nor confidential friend, nor brother nor sister, nor father nor mother, have a right to come in here. The married gossip will come around, and by the hour tell you how she manages her husband. You tell her plainly that if she will attend to the affairs of her household you will attend to yours. What damage some people do with their tongues! Nature indicates that the tongue is a dangerous thing, by the fact that it is shut in, first by a barricade of teeth, and then by the door of the lips. One insidious talker can keep a whole neighborhood badly stirred up. The Apostle Peter excoriated these busybodies in other people's matters, and St. Paul, in his letter to the Thessalonians and to Timothy, gives them a sharp dig, and the good housewife will be on the lookout for them, and never return their calls, and treat them with coldest frigidity. For this reason better keep house as soon as possible. Some people are opposed to them, but I thank God for what are called flats in these cities. They put a separate home within the means of nearly all the population. In your married relations you do not need any advice. If you and your husband have not skill enough to get along well alone, with all the advice you can import you will get along worse. What you want for your craft on this voyage is plenty of sea-room.

BE INTELLIGENT.

I charge you, also, make yourself the intelligent companion of your husband. What with these floods of newspapers and books there is no excuse for the wife's ignorance either about the present or the past. If you have no more than a half-hour every day to yourself you may fill your mind with entertaining and useful knowledge. Let the merchant's wife read up on all mercantile questions, and mechanic's wife on all that pertains to his style of work, and the professional man's wife on all the legal, or medical, or theological, or political discussions of the day. It is very stupid for a man, after having been amid active minds all day, to find his wife without information or opinions on anything. If the wife knows nothing about what is going on in the world, after the tea-hour has passed, and the husband has read the newspaper, he will have an engagement, and must "go and see a man." In nine cases out of ten when a man does not stay at home in the evening, unless positive duty calls him away, it is because there is nothing to stay for. He would rather talk with his wife than any one else if she could talk as well.

ADORN THE HOME.

I charge you, my sister, in every way to make your home attractive. I have not enough of practical knowledge about house adornment to know just what makes the difference, but here is an opulent house, containing all wealth of bric-à-brac, and of musical instrument, and of painting, and of upholstery, and yet there is in it a chill like Nova Zembla. Another home, with one twentieth part of the outlay, and small supply of art, and cheapest piano purchasable, and yet, as you enter it, there comes upon body, mind, and soul a glow of welcome and satisfied and happy domesticity. The holy art of making the most comfort and brightness out of the means afforded every wife should study.

At the siege of Argus, Pyrrhus was killed by the tile of a roof thrown by a woman, and Abimelech was slain by a stone that a woman threw from the tower of Thebes, and Earl Montfort was destroyed by a rock discharged at him by a woman from the walls of Toulouse. But without any weapon save that of her cold, cheerless household arrangement, any wife may slay all the attractions of a home circle. A wife and mother in prosperous circumstances and greatly admired was giving her chief time to social life. The husband spent his evenings away. The son, fifteen years of age, got the same habit, and there was a prospect that the other children, as they got old enough, would take the same turn. One day the wife aroused to the consideration that she had better save her husband and her boy. Interesting and stirring games were introduced into the house. The mother studied up interesting things to tell her children. One morning the son said: "Father, you ought to have been home last night. We had a grand time. Such jolly games and such interesting stories!" This went on from night to night, and after awhile the husband stayed in to see what was going on, and he finally got attracted, and added something of his own to the evening entertainments; and the result was that the wife and mother saved her husband and saved her boy and saved herself. Was not that an enterprise worth the attention of the greatest woman that ever lived since Abigail at the foot of the rock arrested the four hundred armed warriors?

THE TRUE SPHERE.

Do not, my sister, be dizzied and disturbed by the talk of those who think the home circle too insignificant for a woman's career, and who want to get you out on platforms and in conspicuous enterprises. There are women who have a special outside mission, and do not dare to interpret me as derisive of their important mission. But my opinion is that the woman who can reinforce her husband in the work of life and rear her children for positions of usefulness is doing more for God and the race and her own happiness than if she spoke on every great platform and headed a hundred great enterprises. My mother never made a missionary speech in her life, and at a missionary meeting I doubt whether she could have got enough courage to vote-aye or no, but she raised her son John, who has been preaching the Gospel and translating religious literature in Amoy, China, for about forty years. Was not that a better thing to do?

Compare such an one with one of these diadems, attitudinizing, frivolous, married coquettes of the modern drawing-room, her heaven an opera box on the night of Meyerbeer's "Robert le Diable," the ten commandments an inconvenience, taking arsenic to improve the complexion, and her appearance a confused result of belladonna, bleached hair, antimony and mineral acids, until one is compelled to discuss her character, and wonder whether the line between a decent and indecent life is, like the equator, an imaginary line.

A PRESSING WANT.

What the world wants now is about fifty thousand old-fashioned mothers, women who shall realize that the highest, grandest, mightiest institution on earth is the home. It is not necessary that they should have the same old-time manners of the country farm-house, or wear the old-fashioned cap and spectacles and apron that her glorified ancestry wore; but I mean the old spirit which began with the Hannahs and the Mother Lois and the Abigails of Scripture days, and was demonstrated on the homestead where some of us were reared, though the old house long ago was pulled down and its occupants scattered, never to meet until in the higher home that awaits the families of the righteous. While there are more good and faithful wives and mothers now than there ever were, society has got a wrong twist on this subject, and there are influences abroad that would make women believe that their chief sphere is outside instead of inside the home.

A DEADLY SIN.

Hence in many households children instead of a blessing are a nuisance. It is card case versus child's primer, carriage versus cradle, social popularity versus domestic felicity. Hence infanticide and ante-natal murder so common that all the physicians, allopathic, hydropathic, homœopathic, and eclectic are crying out in horror, and it is time that the pulpits joined with the medical profession in echoing and re-echoing the thunder of Mount Sinai, which says: "Thou shalt not kill," and the Book of Revelation, which says: "All murderers shall have their place in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone." And the man or the woman who takes life a minute old will as certainly go straight to hell as the man or woman who destroys life forty years old. And the wildest, loudest shriek of Judgment Day will be given at the overthrow of those who moved in the high and respected circles of earthly society, yet decreed by their own act, as far as they could privately effect it, the extermination of the advancing generations, abetted in the horrid crime by a lot of infernal quacks with which modern medicine is infested. When, on the Last Day, the criers of the Court shall with resounding "Oyez," "Oyez!" declare the "Oyer and Terminer" of the Universe opened, and the Judge, with gavel of thunderbolt, shall smite the nations into silence, and the trial of all the fratricides, and parricides, and matricides, and patricides, and uxoricides, and regicides, and deicides, and infanticides of the earth shall proceed, none of my hearers or readers can say that they knew not what they were doing. Mighty God! arrest the evil that is overshadowing this century.

THE HEAD OF THE HOUSEHOLD.

I charge you, my sister, that you take your husband along with you to heaven. Of course this implies that you yourself are a Christian. I must take that for granted. It cannot be possible that after what Christianity has done for woman, and after taking the infinitely responsible position you have assumed as the head of the household, that you should be in a position antagonistic to Christ. It was not a slip of the tongue when I spoke of you as being at the head of the household. We men rather pride ourselves as being at the head of the household, but it is only a pleasant delusion. To whom do the children go when they have trouble? When there is a sore finger to be bound up or one of the first teeth that needs to be removed to make way for one that is crowding it out, to whom does the child go? For whom do children cry out in the night when they get frightened at a bad dream? Aye, to whom does the husband go when he has a business trouble great or too delicate for outside ears? We, the men, are heads of the household in name, but you, O wives! are the heads of the household in fact, and it is your business to take your husband with you into the kingdom of God, and see that house prepared for heaven.

You can do it! Of course God's almighty grace alone can convert him, but you are to be the instrument. Some wives keep their husbands out of heaven, and others garner them for it. If your religion, O wife! is simply the joke of the household, if you would rather go to the theatre than the prayer-meeting, if you can beat all the neighborhood in progressive euchre, if your husband never sees you kneel at the bedside in prayer before retiring, if the only thing that reminds the family of your church relations is that on communion-day you get home late to dinner, you will not be able to take your husband to heaven, for the simple reason that you will not get there yourself. But I suppose that your religion is genuine, and that the husband realizes there is in your soul a divine principle, and that, though you may be naturally quicker tempered than he is and have many imperfections that distress you more than they can any one else, still you are destined for the skies when the brief scenes of this life are over. How will you take him with you? There are two oars to that boat—prayer and holy example.

But you say he belongs to a worldly club, or he does not believe a word of the Bible, or he is an inebriate and very loose in his habits? What you tell me shows that you don't understand that while you are at the one end of a prayer, the omnipotent God is at the other end, and it is simply a question whether Almightiness is strong enough and keeps His word. I have no doubt there will be great conventions in heaven, called for celebrative purposes, and when in some Celestial assemblage the saints shall be telling what brought them to God, I believe that ten thousand times ten thousand will say: "My wife."

A CONTRAST.

I put beside each other two testimonies of men concerning their wives, and let you see the contrast. An aged man was asked the reason of his salvation. With tearful emotion he said: "My wife was brought to God some years before myself. I persecuted and abused her because of her religion. She, however, returned nothing but kindness constantly, maintaining an anxiety to promote my comfort and happiness; and it was her amiable conduct when suffering ill-treatment from me that first sent the arrows of conviction to my soul." The other testimony was from a dying man: "Harriet, I am a lost man. You opposed our family worship and my secret prayer. You drew me away into temptation and to neglect every religious duty. I believe my fate is sealed. Harriet, you are the cause of my everlasting ruin." How many glorious married couples in heaven—Adam and Eve, Abraham and Sarah, Laphoth and Deborah, Isaac and Rebekah, Jacob and Rachel, Zacharias and Elizabeth, Joseph and Mary, and many whom we have known as good as the most of them!

As once you stood in the village or city church or in your father's house, perhaps under a wedding-bell of flowers, to-day stand up, husband and wife, beneath the cross of a pardoning Redeemer, while I proclaim the banns of an eternal marriage. Join your right hands. I pronounce you one forever. The circle is an emblem of eternity, and that is the shape of the Marriage Ring.

Lost All Night on the Prairie.—"Some People from Scotland some time ago went out as settlers to the great Australian prairie. They had three children: the eldest, Maggie, the second, Lizzie, and the youngest, Willie. One day those little ones went out to gather the wild flowers which grew so plentifully in the prairie. By and by, after they had gathered large bouquets, they turned to go home; but where was their home? they knew not whither to turn, to the right or to the left. They were lost there, poor little things, on that great prairie. In vain they sought to retrace their steps. Soon the younger ones grew tired, and wished to be carried, and Maggie, to whom they looked, with Willie in her arms, and little, crying Lizzie by her side, set out to find their home. At last all three were so worn out that Maggie said she would put them to bed, and taking the little ones, she put them to sleep beside a bush, and stripping off most of her clothing, she covered the little ones, and soon they were fast asleep. There they lay till morning, when their parents, who had been searching for them all night, came upon their darlings. But how grief and joy were mingled together upon finding that Maggie, their dear, brave child, was dead. In her anxiety for the comfort of the little ones she had put off the clothing which would have protected herself from the cold, which had deprived her of life. How like what our self-sacrificing Saviour has done for us! Was 'He not wounded for our transgressions, and bruised for our iniquities?'"

THE DUNGEONS OF MOROCCO.

THERE is probably no country in the world in which such work as Howard, the prison philanthropist, was enabled to perform is so sorely needed as in Morocco. In the prisons of that country large numbers of men entirely innocent of crime are immured in the hope of extracting a ransom from them or their friends. Others who are guilty are confined there indefinitely, and are not brought to trial. The treatment to which they are subjected is barbarous, and many die under it or from starvation. The government is corrupt, and government employés depend almost entirely for their support on bribes and the plunder they get from the prisoners and their petty filchings from the prisoners' rations. It is a relief to learn that Christian men are now at work in these prisons, and though little can be done to alleviate the physical sufferings of the prisoners, much is being done to lead them into the liberty of Christ. Among these workers is the Rev. J. B. Ginsburg, of the Jews' Society, whose headquarters are at Mogador. From the reports of these devoted men the following facts are gleaned:

"There are three prisons in Morocco City, of which one, in the Jewish quarter, only serves for those Israelites who have committed slight faults. The two other prisons are situated, one in the town for ordinary criminals, or those accused. The other is in the 'Kasbah' (or citadel), and is reserved especially for State prisoners. All the prisoners have iron fetters on their legs, and some of them have a chain round their neck, but they are allowed to drag themselves about the prison, which is very large, and has in the middle a reservoir of water and a mosque. Prisoners are generally maintained by their relations and friends, otherwise they live on charity. Some die from starvation. This prison contains from five to six hundred prisoners.

"The prison of the Kasbah, where State prisoners are confined, is partly uncovered, and the inmates have no other shelter than some small chambers built up against the inner side of the wall, and a subterranean dungeon in the middle of the open space. The prisoners receive almost all their sustenance from their friends. It sometimes happens that all at once a prisoner is released, in order to send him as governor to some province, in place of another who has just been put in prison. As may be expected, all the governors tremble when they are obliged to repair to the Sultan's palace, and it often happens that they leave the palace to go to prison.

THE MORSTAN OR LUNATIC ASYLUM serves also as a female house of detention. The violent lunatics have heavy iron chains round their necks, fastened to the wall, and which the guards slacken at night to enable these unhappy creatures to lie on the ground. They are allowed two rolls of bread per day from the revenue of the mosques. The female prison is on an upper floor; the women are not chained, and are set free on paying a fine."

The following description is by a native who had himself suffered several months' imprisonment in the Mequinez Prison: "Thirty men were sent from my tribe as prisoners to Mequinez. I was one of them. We travelled on camels, and had heavy iron fetters on our legs. At night, when we halted, we were chained together by the neck. From the place we started to Mequinez it was eight days' journey. On arrival we were brought to the prison, but the heavy iron fetters were left on our legs, and I was released seven months afterward at the intercession of an English gentleman. The Sultan allows two leaves a day to each prisoner, but the prison officials only give each man a couple of small leaves every three or four days, and keep the rest. We used to make baskets to sell, and then buy bread. The prison was so full of people that they could hardly move. There were no windows in the walls, the stench in the place was dreadful, and we were eaten up with vermin. The heat was intense, and some died. Unless people went and saw for themselves they could not believe the horrors of the place."

"Moorish prisons are used for the most part as instruments of extortion. The governors of districts, the petty employés, and even the subordinate prison officials and doorkeepers, receive either no salary or a merely nominal one; their trade is extortion; it is their means of livelihood, and the performance of official duty is a distinctly secondary consideration to that of amassing money.

THE PROCESS.

"Suppose, unfortunately for himself, a native gains the reputation of possessing concealed wealth; he is liable at any moment to be arrested on any charge or no charge. He is without trial incarcerated, and now the squeezing process commences. The Kaïd el Habz, or jailer, with a sharp eye to business, commences by making himself the reverse of agreeable to the person consigned to his care. For instance, the prisoner has an iron collar put round his neck; sometimes two, one over the other, to make the wearer the more uncomfortable. He is then chained by the neck to another man, perhaps to three or four other men during night and day, and he has heavy iron fetters placed on his legs. In proportion to the avarice or cruelty of the jailer, the prisoner pays for the indulgence of having the collar and chain taken off; but now comes the contention between the prisoner and the governor who has imprisoned him. The official wants money; the accused, if he has any, will give some to be released, but tries to make the best terms he can.

"At last a bargain is struck, a certain sum is paid, and the native is then called upon to defray the sokera (or prison fees) to the minor officials. This done, and every one's cupidity having been more or less satisfied, the prisoner is discharged, carrying with him sometimes the seeds of consumption or some other illness, and sometimes with an affection of the sight ending in partial or total blindness, which appears to be the result of the unwholesome condition of the prison. With murderers, thieves, and highway robbers in these filthy dens are mingled debtors unable to pay their creditors. Many of the poor wretches are confined at the caprice, or to gratify the animosity or cupidity of some native official."

A MARRIAGE IN INDIA.

THE marriage of an Indian prince, the Gaekwar of Baroda, is described in the Indian Witness of January 9th. The following is its account of the quaint ceremony:

"In the marriage hall the final ceremonies of the marriage were begun. The bridegroom having entered, stood in the centre of a ring of holy Brahmans, who chanted Sanskrit prayers and hymns. Between each verse the bystanders scattered rice. The bride was led in to be 'given away' by her father. She was dressed in a red sari, and so muffled up in garlands and tassels that one could not catch the smallest glimpse of her face. A large shawl of red silk, embroidered with gold, was held up between the young couple, who stood facing, but unable to see each other. Behind the bridegroom stood two executioners with drawn swords, and the bridegroom made his marriage vow, promising to protect her always, and declaring that those headsmen who stood near might kill him if he ever should cease to be a true and loving husband to her.

"While these vows and hymns were going on, an astrologer sat close by, watching a sort of water-clock (something like the Greek klepsydra, I should say) until the auspicious moment should arrive. This water-clock consisted of a small earthen vessel with a tiny hole in it, set afloat in a bowl of water. As the water gradually leaked into the vessel it began to settle down slowly, and then suddenly sank to the bottom. The auspicious moment was come; the curtain that divided the pair was rapidly flung aside. The bride and the bridegroom at the same instant placed garlands of flowers round each other's neck, and stood there man and wife. The Brahmans chanted their hymns aloud, sounds of applause were drowned in the crush of music, the rattle of a grand feu de joie from the troops outside, and the roar of cannon from near at hand.

"Amid this din the pair sat down, facing each other; the officiating priest took a ball of string, the sacred kankan thread, and, sitting in a circle about the married couple, wound the cord round them several times as an emblem of their union. The ball, which passed from hand to hand, was then all unrolled, and the cord was cut in two pieces, one being tied round the bridegroom's right arm, and the other round the bride's. These pieces of string will be taken off when the bride goes to her husband's house, at another auspicious moment, which the astrologers will watch for and duly notify. The agni puja, or ceremony of worshipping the sacred fire, brought this interesting marriage to a close." It is estimated that the cost of the ceremony, with its attendant hospitalities, would be $125,000.

THE CHURCH IN THE HOUSE.

Suggestions for a Home Service by Dr. Deems.

Lessons: Gen. 18: 1-19; 11 Cor. 11: 1-19; Luke 8: 1-18.

[The leader should announce the place of lesson, so that each worshipper may open the Bible and follow the reading.]

THE DISCOURSE.

Text: "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear Him" (Ps. 25: 4).

The greatest thing is love.

The best thing we can get from others is to be loved. One of the chief characteristics of love is confidence.

When a man loves the Lord he confides to Him the secrets of his soul.

The Lord repays the confidence.

We all with open face behold the glory of God (11 Cor. 3: 18).

But not all of us see all the glory at once.

Suppose our friend is a great man, a man of vast knowledge, knowing the affairs of business and of State. As he gains confidence in us he tells us his secrets, his plans. Society increasingly respects us the more it learns that we are in the confidence of our great friend. We have pleasure in the confidence and profit from the knowledge he imparts. Men outside would give much for what we know.

The Lord has His secrets and His confidants.

Remember His friend Abraham, and read Gen. 18: 17.

Remember Moses and his intimacy with the Lord, as of a beloved Prime Minister with a Monarch.

Remember the Apostles, and read John 15: 15.

One great value of this is that it affords us a certainty of being able to reach the truth. We may have such revelation from the Lord of His secret that we shall be sure we know it. He shall cause us to understand the Bible. What other eyes see not we shall see. We shall be the initiated. The initiation is "the fear of the Lord," not tormenting, but loving fear. This fear attracts God to us, and us to God.

AFTERNOON TALK.

[A service may be held, and the following discourse read:]

PAUL'S ANTI-CLIMAX.

By B. M. Palmer, D.D.

Read again Rom. 15: 18—"The God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, that ye may abound in hope through the power of the Holy Ghost." This looks like an anti-climax, but the anti-climax disappears as soon as we recognize another law of experience, that the emotions deepen into permanent conditions or habits of the soul. They crystallize into principles, become concrete, and go back into character, and give it strength.

The order mentioned by the Apostle is often the order in which our conversion is first revealed to us. The first act of the new-born soul is undoubtedly trust in the Redeemer; out of which hope next dawns upon the soul; which then deepens into peace and becomes a holy calm; rising, at length, in its tide into the majesty of joy. But how often is the first manifestation of our pardon made in the joy which bursts in its fulness upon us! The transition from darkness to light intoxicated the heart; which is flooded with joy, as though the radiance of heaven rested upon the spiritual birth of the sinner as it did eighteen hundred years ago upon the plains of Bethlehem. Soon, however, the effervescence of feeling gives way; joy sobers into peace, and there is a quiet resting upon the Redeemer and His promises. In this descent from joy to peace, and from peace to hope, there is a crystallizing of the emotion into a habit which forms a second nature with the Christian, and the faith deepens into a permanent condition of the soul.

The Apostle desires not merely that we shall hope, but that we shall abound in hope; and so we have the climax still. The word "salvation" is used in a narrower and in a broader sense. A man is saved when his sins are pardoned and he feels the first pulse of spiritual life; still more when, through progressive sanctification, he is delivered more and more from the dominion and pollution of sin; but when delivered finally from the being and presence of sin, and he is translated to heaven, then is salvation completed in the fulness of its meaning. Because these blessings are largely in the future, they are brought within the range and influence of hope: so the Apostle speaks of our "being saved by hope." This principle of hope may be increased in various ways: (1) The Holy Spirit may stimulate the natural instinct of hope. Thanks be unto God, despair in its fulness is known only to the damned. May not the Divine Spirit, who operates through all the faculties of our nature, stimulate this natural instinct in the Christian; so that when he cannot see the ground upon which his hope rests, it shall yet bear him up, and he shall go on hoping against hope even in the darkest hour? (2) The Holy Spirit may strengthen the Christian principle of hope, implanted at the new birth; enabling us to see the ground upon which it rests, and to exercise faith in the covenant and promises of Almighty God. (3) We abound in hope when this rises into the grace of assurance—a frame of spirit in which confident expectation of a promised blessing is its abiding posture. Let not the defect of our individual experience lead us to depreciate the value of this good grace. Our error may consist in not distinguishing between the assurance of hope occasionally enjoyed and this assurance as the permanent condition and frame of the soul. There is many a precious moment when the child of God has this assurance, though it has not crystallized into a fixed habit. Let hope then have its scope, until it rises into unclouded assurance of our "acceptance in the Beloved."

OUR JESUS

Happy are we, God's own little flock,
Sheltered so close in the cleft of the Rock,
Far above storm, or danger, or shock,
Happy are we in Jesus.

What shall we do for the Master so dear?
Oh, there are many in need of our cheer,
Souls that know nothing but darkness and fear,
Souls in the dark without Jesus!

Many He has who are not of this fold,
Out in the storm and the pitiless cold;
These we will win by our prayers and our gold,
Win them to love our Jesus.

Over the mountains and over the seas,
Lovingly, joyfully, speed we to these Seeking to save them by tenderest pleas,
Save by the blood of Jesus.

Joyfully, then, let us spread the glad news,
Never this service for Jesus refuse,
Never a moment to work for Him lose:
Joyfully work for Jesus.

—MRS. HERRICK JOHNSON.

THE WORLD'S FINAL HARVEST.

By G. Warrand Houghton.*

The Mixed Crop—The Order to the Reapers—The Tares to be Gathered First—Bound Together for Burning—The Apocalyptic Exposition—Interval between Firstfruits and Harvest—Privileges of Firstfruits—Close of the Harvest—A Practical Lesson.

ONE of the most beautiful, the most comforting, and the most refreshing of the themes pursued in Holy Writ is that which treats of the important symbol of the harvest of God (Matt. 13).

The operation of the husbandman is carefully elucidated from the tilling of the field to the storing of the produce. The field is sown with good wheat. An enemy during the night has maliciously covered the field with tares. While growing they looked like the wheat. There was the same bright green hue, the same reaching toward the sun, whose light and warmth refreshed both alike; but, lo! when the grain began to ripen, the field did not present the pure golden lustre of ears of wheat, but was tarnished by the intermingling of the funeral shade imparted by the tares.

ORDERS TO REAPERS.

Will the crop, then, be a failure? No. The husbandman is a man of resource. His servants suggested that they should go and root up these tares when they saw the color of the fruit. The master determined that not a grain of wheat should perish. He was fearful that wheat might be uprooted with the tares, and gave the order that no separation should be attempted before the harvest.

He next proceeds to give particulars as to the treatment of each class of grain in order that there may be no final mixing, no losing a grain of wheat, no storing a single tare.

Suppose, thought he, my men should winnow the wheat and tares together. They would have rooted up some of the wheat in the field had I acted on their suggestion; now they may make the opposite mistake, and so mix them up together that separation on the field will become impossible, and then either both must be garnered or both thrown away.

Therefore, when the reaper commences operations he is instructed to be careful to make the separation then and there. He must first bind the tares into bundles. The field is the husbandman's, and he will not have one remaining there. They are to be burned, utterly destroyed on the field itself.

It is fortunate for us that we are not dependent upon human interpreters for the exposition of the Parable of the Tares. The dear Master Himself has revealed these things to us. The revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave unto Him, sent and shown by symbols unto His servant John, expounds to us with a clearness apprehensible to the spiritual mind what is the order of these events—notably in Rev. 14.

In studying the chapter we notice that it is all one vision, clearly marked off from the preceding and succeeding chapters. The next thing we observe is the considerable between the firstfruits and the harvest, corresponding to the interval that elapsed between them in the Jewish Ritual, as shown us in Lev. 23. Indeed, many events intervene. There is the preaching of the everlasting good tidings—which may occupy a considerable period of time; there is next the announcement that the fall of Babylon is determined, and therefore, in the counsels of God, accomplished; then comes the awful warning against all who shall worship the beast, showing that to be yet future after the firstfruits are plucked; this is followed by a promise of blessing to all who die in the Lord from that time forward. After all these things comes the harvest. What an interval!

Now, as the Church of God is the wheat, this Scripture places the fact beyond all question that there will be a rapture of one portion of the Church of God before the harvest (it may be some years before) at the end of the age, as surely as it was a fact that the Jews gathered their firstfruits considerably before they gathered their harvest. Further, we may well understand, from due consideration of the symbols, that of the great bulk of believers on earth at the time of the Lord's descent into the air, the proportion of those who will then be "taken" to His bosom to those who will be "left" on earth will be but as one sheaf to many acres of sheaves—exactly as is commensurate with the small amount of interest now taken in the subject of His coming!

THE ORDER.

Yet solemn and significant as this fact is, it still leaves untouched the question of the priority of the reaping of the wheat and the tares. That, however, comes out also clearly in this chapter. There are no tares in the symbology of this vision, it is true; it was not necessary that there should be; but as the burning of the tares and the gathering of the vintage both represent the destruction of the wicked (compare 19:11-16 and Isaiah 63:1-6), we have only to observe which comes first in order of fulfilment, to see whether or not the remainder of the Church will be caught up before the destruction of the wicked.

In the order of nature the harvest was reaped first, and the vintage gathered afterward. And that is the precise order observed in this chapter (compare verses 14-16 with 17-20). The Church, therefore, will be all away before the wicked are destroyed.

The interval between the gathering of this harvest and that of the vintage has been computed, from other Scriptures, to consist of the final 1260 days of unequalled tribulation, while the rapture of the first-fruits may be at any moment from this day forward.

It will now be interesting to draw a comparison between the first-fruits and the harvest. It is a specially blessed privilege to be among the first-fruits. They have the name of the Father and the Son on their foreheads, identifying them with those who keep the Word of the Lord's patience—i.e., wait for the coming of the Lord, and who, in consequence, are promised to be kept from the hour of temptation that is to come upon the whole world to try them that dwell upon the earth—kept, that is, not merely sustained or preserved during a time of affliction, but taken away from the time itself.

THE FIRST-FRUIT,

standing on the heavenly Mount Zion, could sing a song that no man else could learn. They had been purchased by the blood of the Lord out of the earth—i.e., out of the whole earth, for they are not Israelites like the one hundred and forty-four thousand of Rev. 7:1-8. They had not been guilty of spiritual adultery, for they abhorred Babylonianism; they are called "virgins," and would appear to be "the wise virgins" of Matt. 25. They follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth, though "the foxes have holes and the birds their nests, and the Son of Man hath not where to lay His head." They were not gathered with a sickle at all, but tenderly taken away one by one with the hand (verses 1-5).

We have in Rev. 7:9-17 the close of the whole harvest. For the Gentile multitude reaped with the sharp sickle are here keeping the Feast of Tabernacles in Heaven. The palms they are holding in their hand are not palms of victory, as our hymn-books delight to tell us. We have simply the observance and anti-typical fulfilment of Lev. 22:39, 40. With the Feast of the Passover the Jewish Ritual opened; with the Feast of the Tabernacles it closed. So in the great antitype, the Christian Dispensation, the great Christian Passover opens it, while the heavenly Feast of Tabernacles brings the Church's earthly history to a close.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Dispute between the President and the Senate now appears likely to issue in a deadlock, which is a result much in favor with Congress. The report of the Republican members of the Judiciary Committee, prepared by Mr. Edmunds, and approved by a caucus of Republican Senators, outlines the plan of the campaign. Mr. Edmunds proposed that the Senate should go on calling for information regarding the conduct in office of persons removed or suspended, and that every time such information was refused the nominee for the office in question should be rejected. This was regarded as a decisive forward movement in the contest with the Administration, and it is said that it was fully discussed and adopted. There will probably be a minority report from the Committee. The lengthy document issued by the majority contains some curious arguments, which will doubtless be remembered should a Republican President ever find himself in collision with a Democratic Senate. As both the President and the Senate still cling to secrecy, a suspicion is growing that both in the White House and the Capitol there have been transactions which will not bear the light of publicity.

The Details of the Tariff Bill Prepared by Mr. Morrison deserve and will doubtless receive careful consideration before a vote is taken in either branch of Congress. It is in some respects a more conservative measure than that desired by the majority of the advocates of reduced duties. The Hayes-Oliver Commission, three years ago, urged a general reduction of twenty-five per cent, which is a larger reduction than that which would be effected by the Morrison bill as a whole. Among the most important changes proposed is that of putting salt, timber, and iron, copper, and lead ores on the free list. Another serious change proposed is to reduce, by one quarter, the duty on sugar and molasses, which would entail a loss of revenue amounting to ten millions a year. The guiding principle of the bill appears to be to relieve the burdens that restrict manufacture, and care is taken that no domestic manufacturer shall be injured by new facilities being given to his foreign rivals. If that is really the principle of the bill, it may be supposed that any manufacturers who would suffer by the enactment of the law will have opportunity afforded them for protesting against it. While there are absurd anomalies in our tariff as it now exists, our welfare as a nation would not be promoted by changes which would discourage home enterprise.

Another Attempt to Solve the Difficult Silver question was made in the House last week. Mr. Scott, of Pennsylvania, made a proposal which he called a compromise. He suggested that a reserve of twenty million silver dollars should be kept, and that whenever that reserve was encroached upon in any month sufficient silver dollars should be coined to bring the reserve up to the prescribed number. Thus the public could regulate the coinage by taking less or more of the coins out of the Treasury. The more coins there were in circulation, the larger would be the quantity to be coined to make up the twenty million reserve. On the face of it this would appear to meet the requirements of the silver men, who contend that the public want the silver dollar. They will not, however, support the proposition, as they are shrewd enough to see that it would cause the suspension of the coinage. There is no sign that the public has changed its mind. The people will not take the silver dollar if they can get the paper dollar.

Serious Losses from Floods were Reported early last week from many cities. Boston, Mass., was the worst sufferer. For four days the water covered an area of the city two miles square in the Roxbury district. In the Highlands the damage to houses and furniture amounted to over $1,000,000. In the poorer districts the suffering was more severely felt, though the actual loss may have been smaller. The houses in several places collapsed altogether, but happily their occupants had previously been rescued in boats. On Wednesday, February 17th, the worst was past. The water ceased to flow across Tremont Street, and sank rapidly over the submerged districts. A fund was raised for the relief of homeless sufferers, and coal, wood, food, and medicine were distributed. Physicians went through the district as the waters subsided, prescribing preventives for diseases likely to ensue from the miasma rising out of the foul cellars. St. Louis, Mo., also suffered severely, as did towns in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and New York. The floods were caused by ice gorges.

The Death of Mr. John B. Gough, the Famous temperance orator, causes widespread sorrow throughout the Union and across the Atlantic. He was stricken with paralysis on February 15th while lecturing in the Presbyterian Church at Frankford, Pa. He was immediately removed to the house of Dr. R. Bruce Burns, and the most skilful medical assistance secured. Mr. Wannemaker and other Christian friends also visited him, and held a prayer service in his room. His condition was unfavorable from the commencement of the attack, and as the physicians gave but little hope of recovery, Mrs. Gough and other relatives were summoned. He died peacefully on Thursday last. He was nearly sixty-nine years old. His activity was not diminished by his advancing years, though during his recent visit to New York his friends noticed that his physical strength was decreasing, and he himself expressed the conviction that he would not live through the year. We hope to publish his portrait and a sketch of his life next week.

Four of the Socialists who Led the Riots in London on February 8th were examined on Wednesday of last week. They were Burns, Hyndman, Champion, and Williams. Burns is an engineer, who ran unsuccessfully for Parliament at the recent election. Hyndman is the most remarkable of the four, because he is by birth and connection an aristocrat. He is an M. A. of Cambridge University, was a companion there of two students who have since become Cabinet Ministers, has travelled round the world, been in America, and has a thorough knowledge of India. He is the author of a book on the historic basis of socialism, and has written many brochures on economic subjects. He is a man of means, but has given his time and money to the cause of socialism since 1881.

Champion is an ex-artillery officer, and Williams a dock laborer. The evidence against them was directed to proving that they had attended meetings previous to the one at which the riot took place, and had made speeches inciting to riot. Reporters gave evidence of the seditious character of the speeches in Trafalgar Square. Among other things, they swore that Burns said "we will have bread, or the others must have lead." The hearing was adjourned for a week, and the accused were admitted to bail. Among the bailsmen was Joseph Cowen, a noted Member of Parliament.

The Irish Policy of the New British Cabinet will not be disclosed before March 22d. Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues having been re-elected to Parliament, their acceptance of office having, under the constitution, rendered their seats vacant, appeared in the House on February 18th. Mr. Gladstone then stated that when the Government has concluded the financial business they had to place before the House they would be able to state a part, if not the whole, of the Irish measures they intended to introduce. Mr. Gladstone also announced that the Government had no intention of renewing coercion in Ireland. The desire of the Government, he said, was to propose to the House measures of a positive and substantive character, dealing with Ireland respecting social order and the questions of land and the future Government of Ireland, including a method for such government. He said that a further statement on the subject would be made on March 22d.

More Labor Riots in England Occurred Last week. As in London, comparatively little damage was done, and that not by the working men. Leicester, the headquarters of the hosiery trade, was the chief scene of the disturbances, though in Birmingham and other towns there were important demonstrations. In Leicester the riot was the result of a strike. The employers, who have been paying different prices respectively for the same class of work, formed a union, and pledged themselves to a uniform rate of pay, which involved a reduction in some cases of thirty per cent in the wages. A strike followed, throwing two thousand persons out of employment. The riot which succeeded was led by the young roughs of the town, who appear to have been prompted by a spirit of mischief. They confined themselves to the breaking of windows in the manufactories, and no one suffered from personal violence. The loss by broken glass and injured looms is estimated at $2500. The most serious feature of the disturbances is that the mob learn that the police are powerless to check them if they unite. That knowledge is dangerous, when there are so many men unemployed, as there now are in England, and when socialists are busy.

Socialism in Germany is Assuming a Threatening aspect. One of the leaders, Herr Bebel, who is a member of the Reichstag, spoke openly there on Wednesday of last week on the question, and boldly advocated socialistic doctrines. He taunted the Government with the growing strength of the social democrats in Germany, and ended by telling them that, repression or no repression, the cause he represented would conquer. Herr Viereck, one of Bebel's henchmen, hinted that the social democrats might ere long try the effect of an appeal to "the brutal instincts of the people."

The French Government is Preparing for active opposition to England in the Egyptian question. She has espoused the cause of the Sultan of Turkey. A cable dispatch from Paris states that the French Premier, M. de Freycinet, has instructed the new French Minister at Cairo to support the demands of the Porte for the formation of a Turco-Egyptian army to replace the British troops in Egypt, and the evacuation of that country by the English at the earliest possible date. If England opposes the demands of the Porte, M. de Freycinet will seek to induce the powers to take combined action for the purpose of vindicating the Sultan's suzerain rights in Egypt.

The Baptist Ministers' Home at West Farms N. Y., is an institution not sufficiently known among the churches. It has been in existence about three years, and is doing work of the most beneficent character. It was given, subject to a small annuity, to the denomination by Deacon James Angus for a minister's home, to "provide for disabled Baptist ministers and missionaries, their dependent families, widows of ministers and missionaries, and the dependent orphan children of ministers and missionaries in the States of New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut, during the time of their disability, with a comfortable home, the necessities of life, together with medical attendance, and, in case they should die while inmates of the home, with a Christian burial." There are now eighteen beneficiaries, of whom seven are wholly supported, and eleven partially supported by the institution. Some of them are over eighty years old. The Rev. N. W. Miner, D.D., the superintendent of the home, informs us that gifts will be very welcome just now to the inmates. Help in the shape of money, provisions, or second-hand clothing will be gratefully received.

The New York Medical Missionary Society, which is doing a valuable work in the training of young men for foreign missions, held its annual meeting at the training institute, 118 East Forty-fifth Street, recently. Mr. Cornelius Vanderbilt presided. The Superintendent, Dr. G. M. Dowkontt, gave a cheering report of the work for 1885. The Society now has four dispensaries, a home and institute, and eight students. Over fifty young men and women had offered themselves to the Society, but what was needed, he said, was more means. The treasurer's report showed an expenditure of $4000 for 1885. It being stated by Dr. Dowkontt that there were seven young men ready to enter with the best indorsements, five being from Amherst College, and that these would need aid to about $1000, it was resolved to raise that additional sum for 1886. Mr. Cornelius Vanderbilt headed the list for 1886 with $600, and Mr. George W. Vanderbilt followed with $300. Seven or eight friends promised to give or get $100.

A Remarkable Revival of God's Work is in progress in Eastport, Me. The Rev. C. F. Whitcomb baptized ten new converts on Sunday, January 31st; two hundred persons have made a profession of faith in Christ, and the work is still going on with increasing manifestations of the Holy Spirit's power.

The Revival Services in Cincinnati, Conducted by Rev. Sam Jones, have stirred the people of that city to an extent never before known there. At the closing services, held on Sunday, February 14th, the Music Hall was packed in every part, the Odeon adjoining was crowded, and the police said that the crowd outside unable to gain admission to either building numbered over thirty thousand. Much good has attended these services, and large numbers have made a profession of faith in Christ. Mr. Jones and Mr. Small go from Cincinnati to Chicago. Mr. Jones is taking a brief rest at his home, but will commence on Sunday next. Mr. Small has already held several services in Mr. Moody's church. The Casino Skating Rink has been taken for four weeks for the meetings.

The White Cross Society for the Promotion of social purity celebrated its first anniversary in New York on February 14th. Dr. B. F. De Costa, the President of the Society, read a most encouraging report. He said that the movement has spread among American colleges. The students of Lee University, in Virginia, formed a White Cross Society the moment they heard that one had been established in New York. The Society for the Prevention of State Regulation of Vice is co-operating with the White Cross Society in fighting the social evil and toleration of it. The National Women's Temperance Union of Philadelphia recently established a department for the promotion of social purity, patterned after the White Cross Society. The women of the union have organized to save fallen women by women's aid. In Illinois Miss Frances E. Willard has established in Chicago the Victoria League, an auxiliary of the White Cross, which especially seeks to labor among mothers and daughters with the view of exhibiting the effects of sexual vice, teaching a true physiology, and advocating the general establishment of a White Cross code of morals in female society. The Society has taken root in the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Edinburgh. The report further says that the President of the White Cross Society in America was told by a chaplain in London, familiar with all the facts, that the shocking revelations last summer of nauseous social vices in London did not reveal one tenth of the truth.

A Jolting Ride Over a Rough Road Saved a life recently in New York State. On February 5th a physician residing in Sullivan County was preparing a poisonous lotion, and, being in a hurry, used his lead pencil to stir it. Soon afterward he thoughtlessly put his pencil in his mouth. A strange sensation followed, and the doctor realized what he had done. Knowing that he would soon be insensible and unable to treat himself, he immediately summoned a liveryman, and told him to drive him as fast as possible to the nearest physician, who lived seven miles away. The poisoned man fell asleep before he had travelled a mile, and he was laid in the bottom of the vehicle. The latter part of the path is over very rough road, and the jolting of the car roused the man and kept him awake until the house of the physician was reached. There he was successfully treated, and recovered. Both physicians agree that if the sleep had been continued recovery would have been impossible, yet the one who was poisoned remembers that during the journey the agonizing craving for sleep was almost insupportable. How often awakened sinners have had a similar experience! They would gladly have shaken off their impressions had they been able, but happily their misery continued until they found peace in Christ (Ps. 78 : 33-35).

The Foresight of the Muskrat has been demonstrated during the recent floods. A reporter of the Journal of Providence, R. I., states that several weeks ago, in company with Mr. A. A. Folsom, the Superintendent of the Boston and Providence Railway, he passed the long stretch of marshy lands through which the line runs between Canton Junction and Readville. Mr. Folsom called attention to the numerous hillocks of earth thrown up and scattered over the Neponset marshes. The elevations were the work of the industrious little muskrats, and Mr. Folsom observed that he never before saw them so high above the surface. He observed that there was a popular belief about the mounds that they were constructed by the muskrats as a refuge from coming floods. He said: "If there is very high water the coming spring the coincidence will be something remarkable." During the recent freshet the water rose so high on the Neponset marshes as to submerge the railway tracks, and the swamp became a little sea. So it would appear that the foresight of the amphibious muskrats is established. It would also appear that the foresight was accompanied by prudence, which is not always the case with men. Even people who attend church and know that a day of judgment is approaching often neglect to avail themselves of the refuge God has provided (Heb. 6 : 18, 19).

A Five Days' Imprisonment in a Freight Car imperilled the life of a man who arrived in New York last Thursday. He is a resident of Ross County, O., but being out of work he started out on a long tramp in search of a farm which he and his father could work on shares. On February 13th he was at Dayton, O., and being footsore and weary and without money, he looked around for a place to sleep. A freight train was standing near the depot, and the tired man, noticing that the doors of a car laden with corn stood open, he crawled in, and, lying on the top of the corn, soon fell asleep. When he awoke he found that he was locked in, and the car was in motion. At first he was not alarmed, as he supposed that he would be released when the train stopped. But the car was bound for New York, and though it made several stoppages, he was unable to make any one hear. For five days he remained a prisoner. He kept himself alive by chewing corn, until the last day, when his mouth and gums became so sore and his mouth swollen from want of drink that he could not swallow. He suffered much from the cold. He found himself gradually growing weaker, and had almost resigned himself to death when, to his great joy, after a long stop somewhere, the car door was unlocked and pushed open. He was in New York, and was sent to an hospital for treatment. It is safe to predict that he will never go to sleep in a freight car again. It may be hoped that he will also be preserved from spiritual slumber, in which many are carried away unwittingly, and only wake to find themselves the prisoner of some vicious habit or appetite, from which, if they are delivered at all, it is only after intense suffering (1 Thess. 5 : 6-8).

The Idiotic Escapade of a Miscreant in West Virginia has entailed serious consequences. On February 15th an engine was standing on the side track of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad near Parkersburg. As it was to start in a short time, the engineer and fireman fired it up in readiness, and left it temporarily. While they were away some unknown man jumped on the engine, threw open the throttle, and then sprang off. The engine hesitated a moment, and then darted away like the wind, and was soon out of sight on the main line going east. At a bridge twelve miles out the engineer of the freight, which was running at the rate of twenty miles an hour, heard the approaching engine, and whistled for the brakes; but in a moment the wild engine was upon the train, the two coming together with terrible violence. Both engines and the entire train of freight cars were dashed to pieces, every man on board the freight being wounded, some of them fatally. For an act of pure diabolical mischief this act has rarely been surpassed. It had not even the poor excuse of revenge, for the miscreant could not tell whom his folly might injure. Probably as he reads of the sufferings of his victims he deplores his act; but from the moment the engine started he was powerless to arrest the mischief. Solomon compared the class to which such a man belongs to liars and deceivers, and they are alike in that particular that a lie started on its travels cannot be recalled (Prov. 26 : 18, 19).

The Estate of the Millionaire Tramp is arousing much interest in financial circles, owing to the failure to discover any traces of a will or of his supposed wealth. The tramp, whose name was James Henry Paine, died on December 23d, last year, in a dingy lodging in Bleeker Street, New York. His surroundings indicated extreme poverty, and during his last illness he rejected the services of a physician, under the plea that he was too poor to pay the fees. He used to shuffle about the city in a tattered coat, trousers so ragged that his bare flesh could be seen in places, and wretched old boots on his naked feet. He lived chiefly on scraps of food begged from restaurants. About three hundred dollars in money was the amount found among his rags when he was dead, but there were notes proving his identity, and showing that he was a capitalist. Since then his record has been traced, and evidences have been found that he must have possessed fully a million dollars. He was extremely secretive, and when he operated in stocks, as he often did, he would not go into a bank if he could avoid it, but would meet his agents on the street or in a restaurant. One banker alone paid him $324,000 as the result of one of his stock speculations. Where his property now is and who is his heir are mysteries yet unsolved. His skill in financial operations is mentioned as proof that "he was no fool;" but looking at his life as a whole, it is difficult to see any evidence of wisdom in it. The writer of Ecclesiastes sketches just such a life, and pronounces it vanity (Eccles. 4 : 8).

THE PASTOR'S RETURN.

A Specially-Selected Sermon to his Church, Congregation, Readers, and Friends, by C. H. Spurgeon.

"Forasmuch as the Lord hath blessed me hitherto."—JOSHUA 17 : 14.

It is not an easy task to divide land among different claimants. Joshua divided Canaan with strict impartiality. He was a man of God, and he was also shrewdly wise, as you may gather from many of his speeches. But, for all that, he could not satisfy everybody. He who would please all attempts the impossible. God Himself is quarrelled with. If it be the design of Providence to please men, it is a melancholy failure. Do we not find with their portions? This man would like his lot if it were not where it is, and that man would be perfectly satisfied if he had a little more. One would be contented with what he has if he could keep it always, while another would be more pleased if life could be shortened. There is no pleasing men. We are like the sons of Joseph in the chapter before us, ready to complain of our inheritance. It should not be so. We who have pined in the wilderness of sin should rejoice that we have entered the land of promise, and we ought to be glad to have a portion among the people of the Lord. Contentment should be natural to those who are born of the Spirit of God; yea, we ought to go beyond contentment, and cry: "Blessed be the Lord, who daily loadeth us with benefits."

Brethren, the best advice that I can give to each man among you is, that he should endeavor to make the best of the portion which God has given him: for, after all, Joshua had not arbitrarily appointed Ephraim and Manasseh their lots, but they had fallen to them by the decree of God. Their portions had been marked out by a higher hand than Joshua's long before. You and I ought to believe that—

"There's a divinity that shapes our ends, Rough-hew them how we will."

Let us fall back upon predestination, and accept the grand truth that "The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord." An all-wise God disposes His people according to His sovereign will. Let us not seek to alter our destiny, but let us try to make the best of our circumstances. This is what Joshua exhorted Ephraim and Manasseh to do. "You have a hill country crowned with forests; hew them down. You have fat valleys occupied by Canaanites: drive out the present inhabitants." Oh, sirs, if we would but thoroughly enjoy what God has freely given us, we should be happy to the full, and even anticipate the joys of heaven. We have a deep river of delights in the covenant of grace, yet we are content to paddle about its shores. We are only up to our ankles, the most of us, whereas the waters are "waters to swim in."

A great sun of everlasting love shines upon the globe of our life with tropical force, but we get away to the North Pole of doubt and fear, and then complain that the sun has such little heat, or that he is so long below the horizon. He who will not go to the fire ought not to complain that the room is cold. Did we heartily feed upon what the Lord has set on our table, accept the ring which He has prepared for our finger, and wear the garments which He has provided for our comfort, we might here on earth make music and dancing before the Lord.

I am going to speak upon my text thus: First, here is a confession, which I think many of us will be very happy to make: "Forasmuch as the Lord hath blessed me hitherto." Secondly, here is an argument, which is stated after the manner of logic: "Forasmuch as the Lord hath blessed me hitherto, therefore," so and so.

I. We look at our text, then, first of all, as

A CONFESSION—

"The Lord hath blessed me hitherto." I will not at present speak to those of you upon whom the blessing of God has never rested. Remember, my dear hearers, that every man is either under the curse or under the blessing. They that are of the works of the law are under the curse. Those upon whom their sin is resting are under the curse, for a curse always attends upon sin. Though we read no commination service; though we do not speak to you from Ebal and Gerizim, with the blessing and the curse; yet rest assured that there is before the living God a separation of the precious from the vile, and each day there is a judgment which, in God's apprehension, puts some upon the right hand with the "Come, ye blessed," and others upon the left hand with the "Depart, ye cursed." This will be finally done in "that day of days for which all other days were made." At this hour, my hearer, if you are not the blessed of the Lord, you are resting under the dark shadow of a curse from which I pray God you may at once escape. Faith in Him who was made a curse for us is the only way to the blessing. But I speak to as many as have believed in the Lord Jesus Christ of whom the Lord saith: "Surely, blessing I will bless thee."

GENERAL BLESSINGS.

You can say at this time, "God hath blessed me hitherto." He has blessed you with those blessings which are common to all the house of Israel. Ephraim and Manasseh had received a blessing when God blessed Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, seeing they were in the loins of Abraham. You and I, who are in Christ, are partakers of all covenant-blessings in Christ Jesus. "If children, then heirs;" and if we are children of God, then we are heirs of all things. The trifles in the house, and the jewels of the house, equally belong to the children. We may partake of the common mercies of Providence, and the extraordinary mercies of grace, without stint. None of the dainties of the royal house are locked up from the children. The Lord says to each believer, "Son, thou art ever with me, and all that I have is thine." "Ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's," and therefore "all things are yours."

Can you not say—"The Lord hath blessed me hitherto?" Has He ever denied you one of the blessings common to the covenanted family? Has He ever told you that you may not pray, or that you may not trust? Has He forbidden you to cast your burden on the Lord? Has He denied to you fellowship with Himself and communion with His dear Son? Has He laid an embargo on any one of the promises? Has He shut you out from any one of the provisions of His love? I know that it is not so if you are His child, but you can heartily exclaim: "The Lord hath blessed me hitherto." "Such honor have all the saints." By His gracious past of love the Lord guarantees to His redeemed a future of equal blessedness, for His loving-kindness never departs from those on whom it lights.

PARTICULAR BLESSINGS.

But then, dear friends, besides this, Ephraim and Manasseh had special blessings, the peculiar blessing of Joseph, which did not belong to Judah, or Reuben, or Issachar. In the end of the Book of Genesis, you will see how Jacob blessed the two sons of Joseph, and you will observe with what prodigality of benediction he enriched them among his sons. "Joseph is a fruitful bough, even a fruitful bough by a well; whose branches run over the wall." Moses also, ere he died, seemed to glow with a divine fervor when he came to the tribe of Joseph, and blessed him in some respects above his brethren. Now, I think that many of you may say: "Though I am least of all His saints, yet in some respects the Lord hath specially blessed me hitherto."

I believe that every flower in a garden, which is tended by a wise gardener, could tell of some particular care that the gardener takes of it. He does for the dahlia what he does not for the sunflower; somewhat is wanted by the rose that is not required by the lily; and the geranium calls for an attention which is not given to the honey-suckle. Each flower wins from the gardener a special culture. The vine has a dressing all its own, and the apple-tree a pruning peculiar to itself. There is a blessing of the house of Manasseh, and a blessing of the house of Ephraim; and so is there a special benediction for each child of God. All the names of the tribes were written on the breastplate, but there was a different color in the jewel allotted to each tribe; and I believe that there is a speciality of grace about every child of God. There is not only an election from the world, but an election out of the elect. Twelve were taken from the disciples; three were taken out of the twelve; one greatly beloved was taken out of the three.

Uniformity of loves does not prevent diversity of operations. As a crystal is made up of many crystals, so is grace composed of many graces. In one ray of the light of grace there are seven colors. Each saint may tell his fellow something that he does not know; and in heaven it will be a part of the riches of glory to hold commerce in those specialities which each one has for himself alone. I shall not be you, neither will you be me; neither shall we twain be like another two, or the four of us like any other four, though all of us shall be like our Lord when we shall see Him as He is. I want you each to feel at this hour—"The Lord hath blessed me hitherto."

PROGRESS NOT PERFECTION.

I think, besides this, that these two tribes which made up the house of Joseph also meant to say that, not only had God blessed them with the common blessings of Israel, and the special blessing of their tribe, but also with actual blessings. As far as they had gone they had driven out the Canaanites, and taken possession of the country. They had not received all that was promised; but God had blessed them hitherto. Come, brethren, we have not driven out all the Canaanites yet, but we have driven out many of them. We are not what we hope to be, but we are not what we used to be. We cannot yet see everything clearly, but we are not blind, as once we were. We have not overcome every sinful propensity, but no sin has dominion over us, for we are not under the law, but under grace. We do not know all that the Lord will yet teach us, but what we do know we would not lose for ten thousand worlds. We have not seen our Lord as He is, but we have seen Him; and the joy of that sight will never be taken from us. Therefore, before the Lord and His assembled people, we joyfully declare that "The Lord hath blessed us hitherto."

THE SOURCE.

First, all the blessings that we have received have come from God. Do not let us trace any blessing to ourselves, or to our fellow-men; for though the minister of God may be as a conduit-pipe to bring us refreshing streams, yet all our fresh springs are in God, and not in men. Say, "The Lord hath blessed me hitherto." Trace up every stream to the fountain, every beam to the sun, and say, "I will bless the Lord as long as I live, for He has blessed me. Every good gift which has come to me has come from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning." True as the thought is, we have often to recall God's people to the confession—that all the blessings of the covenant come from the God of the covenant.

The Lord has given each one of us a great multitude of blessings. He has blessed us in His promises. Oh, that we did but know how rich we are! He has blessed us in His providence—in the brightness and in the darkness of it, in its calms and in its storms, in its harvests and in its famines. He has blessed us by His grace. I shall not dwell upon these themes; I should want a century for my sermon, if I did.

And, mark you, there has been a continuity of this blessing. God has not blessed us, and then paused; but He has blessed us "hitherto." One silver thread of blessing extends from the cradle to the grave. "He hath blessed us hitherto." When we have provoked Him; when we have backslidden from Him; when we have been making an ill use of His blessings; yet He has kept on blessing us with a wondrous perseverance of love. I believe in the perseverance of the saints, because I believe in the perseverance of the love of God, or else I should not believe in it. The Lord Himself puts it so—"I am God, I change not; therefore, ye sons of Jacob are not consumed." There is an unconquerable pertinacity in the love of God: His grace cannot be baffled or thwarted, or turned aside; but His goodness and His mercy follow us all the days of our lives.

HOW THE BIBLE ENDS.

And, what is more, when my text says: "The Lord hath blessed me hitherto," there is a kind of prophecy in it, for "hitherto" has a window forward as well as backward. You sometimes see a railway carriage or truck, fastened on to what goes before; but there is also a great hook behind. What is that for? Why, to fasten, something else behind, and so to lengthen the train. Any one mercy from God is linked on to all the mercy that went before it; but provision is also made for adding future blessing. All the years to come are guaranteed by the ages past. Did you ever notice how the Bible ends? It closes with that happiest of conclusions, marriage and happiness. The marriage of the Lamb is come, and His bride hath made herself ready. Infinite felicity closes the volume of revealed history. Earthquakes; and falling stars, and the pouring out of vials, follow with terrible speed; but it all ends in everlasting bliss and eternal union. Even thus shall it be with us, for the Lord hath blessed us hitherto.

Hitherto—hitherto—He has blessed us; and it implies that He always will bless us. Never will the silver stream of His love cease to flow. Never will the ocean of His grace cease to wash the shores of our life. He is, He must be, to His people the blessed and blessing God. "Surely blessing I will bless thee," is a word of Jehovah that stands fast for ever and ever. Thus far is our confession of gratitude.

II. Now we come to

which I wish to press home upon all my dear brethren and sisters in Christ. The tribe of Joseph says, "Forasmuch as the Lord hath blessed me hitherto." What is the inference from that fact? The argument that the sons of Joseph wanted to draw was peculiarly Jewish; it was the inference of business. It was the plea that they should have more because they had so much: because they had one lot, therefore they were to have two portions in the promised land. I want no man to infer that, because God has blessed him in providence, he is to expect to have still more riches, and still more pleasure. Ah, no! Do not wish to have your portion in this life, lest you get it; for then you will be as the ungodly.

Their argument, again, was one of grumbling. They said: "God has blessed us hitherto;" as much as to say: "If we do not get two portions, we shall not say that God is still blessing us; but we will draw a line, and say hitherto." God has many very naughty children; they fall into quarrels with their Heavenly Father. "Ever since that dear child died," says one, "I never felt the same toward God." "Ever since my mother was taken away," cries another, "I have always felt that I could not trust God as I used to do." This is shocking talk. Have done with it. If you quarrel with God, He will say to you: "It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks." There is no happiness but in complete submission. Yield, and all will end well; but if you stand out against the Most High, it is not God's rod that makes you smart; it is a rod of your own making. End this warfare by saying, "It is the Lord; let Him do what seemeth Him good." Do not say, "He blessed me up to a certain point, and then He changed His hand." This is a most slanderous falsehood.

Let us say rather, "The Lord has blessed me hitherto, and this is cause for holy wonder and amazement. Why should the Lord have blessed me?" Be full of holy gratitude. Do not say, "I will look on the bright side." Beloved, the Lord's ways to us are all bright. Do not say, "I will trust God where I cannot trace Him," but rather trace God everywhere. Get into the state of that poor man who was so greatly blessed to

PIOUS TAULER.

He wished the man a good day. The man replied, "Sir, I never had a bad day." "Oh, but I wish you good weather." Said he, "Sir, it is always good weather. If it rains or if it shines, it is such weather as God pleases, and what pleases God pleases me."

Come, let us each one bless the Lord, and say: "If He should treat me hardly in the future, I will still praise Him for what He has done hitherto." I remember saying to myself, when I was in sorrow for sin, that if God would only forgive me my sin, and give me rest from my despair, if I had to live in a dungeon on bread and water, all the rest of my life, I would do nothing else but sing to His praise." I am afraid that I have not fulfilled that promise; but I confess my wrong in not having done so. You, my brethren, I dare say, made much the same spiritual covenant with God, and you have not stood to it. Let us unite our sincere confessions, and say, each one: "The Lord hath blessed me hitherto; therefore blessed be His name."

Furthermore, if this be true, let us resolve to engage in enlarged enterprises. If the Lord has blessed us hitherto, why should He not bless us in something fresh? I want to say somewhat to you as a church, dear friends, for the text is a church-text, and the "me" here comprehends all the tribe of Joseph. Let us joyfully say as a church, "The Lord hath blessed us hitherto." Strangers will excuse us if we have a little mutual joy in what the Lord has done for us during a considerable period of time. Those who have been with me from our earliest days, when we were a mere handful of people, may well rejoice that the Lord taught us to pray, and to trust, when we were so few and feeble, and then He visited us with favor, and greatly multiplied us; and since then He has continued to bless us without pause or stint.

These thirty-three years He has been with us, we have never been without conversions, never without fresh labor for Christ, and fresh projects, and never a failure, never a schism, or a division of heart. I am amazed and humbled by the Lord's goodness. We have gone from strength to strength in the Lord's work. I have been feeble, and I fear I may be so still; but the Lord has not ceased to work by you who are with me. Well, what then? College, Orphanage, Colportage, Evangelists, Mission Halls—thirty-four of them, Sunday-schools, and so forth. What then?

"STOP," SAYS THE DEVIL.

You would like us to stop, would you not, foul fiend? But we shall do nothing of the kind. Wherever you are, O fiend, in this city, it is our business and our desire to fight with you, and drive you out! We cannot cease to be active; for the Lord has blessed us hitherto. "You will get meddling with too much, and get too many irons in the fire." None of them in your fire, O Satan! Brethren, we must have more fire, and more irons in it! I beseech you, do not slacken in any way, but press on.

Did you say, "Now, do not project anything?" I do not know that I shall, but at the same time, I am not sure that I shall not. If the Lord has blessed us hitherto, let us go a little further. When certain brethren raise a stone of Ebenezer, they sit down on it. That is not what the stone is meant for. I have a commission to put spikes on the top of those stones.

You must not dream of sitting down upon—"Hitherto hath the Lord helped us." The voice from the throne saith, "Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward." Though the sea roll before you, forward! Forward, in God's name! Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

MY SERMON NOTES.

A selection from outlines of Discourses delivered at the Metropolitan Tabernacle, with Anecdotes and Illustrations, by C. H. Spurgeon. The object of the two volumes which Mr. Spurgeon has prepared is thus clearly stated by himself in his preface: "It is not always easy to select themes for sermons. Even those who are able to give all their time to reading and study are sometimes glad of a suggestion by which they are directed to a topic; how much more is this the case when a man is all the week engaged in commercial pursuits, and then has to preach twice on the Lord's day. . . . On several occasions the question has been put to me, 'Could you not help us with some outlines of discourses?' To which I have replied that there were many works of that kind in the market. The reply has been that they would like something plainer and less rhetorical. I felt encouraged by their request to try what could be done in the direction indicated."

When Mr. Spurgeon tries what can be done he generally succeeds, and he has succeeded very surprisingly in this case. The texts of the sermons in the two volumes are selected from the Old Testament. The first volume extends from Genesis to the end of Proverbs; the second from Ecclesiastes to Malachi. They are, as the title indicates, outlines only. The divisions and sub-divisions only of the sermon are given. These alone form a valuable aid to preachers, for, as our readers are aware, Mr. Spurgeon is an adept in systematic and orderly sermon construction. But the value of the outlines is increased by a few quotations and illustrations added to each outline, which may be incorporated with advantage in the sermon, increasing its point and effectiveness. Our readers are so well acquainted with Mr. Spurgeon's style that they may well understand the value of such a work. Each volume contains over 370 pages; price, $1 each volume. Published by Robert Carter & Brothers, 530 Broadway, New York.

COMMON SENSE IN THE NURSERY,

by Marion Harland. Young mothers have reason to thank the lady who writes under this name for her efforts here, as young wives have had occasion to do for her former treatises. Sound, practical advice on the management of infants and the training of them is given in this little volume, with the wisdom for which this eminently pious lady is famous. It has more than merely material benefit. Not only is advice given about "Baby's bath," "Baby's food," "Baby's clothing"—but mothers are reminded that sound moral and religious training cannot begin too early. Mrs. Terhune has none of the new religious ideas about a baby's mind being like a sheet of white paper. She says: "Every mother has thrust upon her at some point of her experience the appalling truth that babies learn to do evil more readily than to do well." Several incidents which she mentions show how she herself learned this fact, and without attempting to explain it she earnestly exhorts mothers so to train their children as that when, as they grow up, they are assailed by temptation they will say, "How can I do this great sin and wickedness against God?" Incidentally, too, the suggestion is given with rare delicacy that the mother should herself see to it

THE RT. REV. J. HANNINGTON, Bishop of Equatorial Africa.

A BRIEF cable dispatch published on Monday, February 15th, deepens the painful suspense previously existing about the prelate whose portrait appears on this page. Bishop Hannington was sent out by the missionary society of the Protestant Episcopal Church to take episcopal charge of the work in the East Central regions of Africa. In July last he set out full of life and hope to visit the churches and mission stations of his diocese. He intended to penetrate to Uganda on the northern shores of the Victoria Nyanza, which is the most northern station of the diocese. It was a journey of fully one thousand miles through a country full of danger from its malarial climate, and from the bellicose tribes which infest it. He chose a route more northerly than the one generally taken, thereby shortening the journey a little, and being, beside, less trying to the health.

A letter dated August 11th, which the bishop wrote to his wife, was the latest direct intelligence received from him. In it he spoke of the opposition of the King of Uganda, who appeared to dislike European travellers. Rumors of German annexation had disturbed His Majesty, who could not discriminate between English and Germans. The bishop's letter indicated that although he was not alarmed, he was not sanguine. At the time of writing he had arrived at a point on his journey two hundred miles from Mombasa.

In January came another communication stating that Bishop Hannington had been arrested, and would probably be executed. An appeal was immediately made to the British Government, which received prompt attention. Instructions were telegraphed to Sir John Kirk, the British Government agent at Zanzibar, directing him to send special messengers to the king to secure the bishop's release. At the time of writing official information has not arrived, but on February 14th the London Missionary Society received advices from Zanzibar to the effect that two men who have returned to that place from Usegra report that they saw Bishop Hannington, with fifty men of his expedition, taken out for execution.

The utmost anxiety prevails, but as the melancholy news has not been confirmed, Bishop Hannington's friends refuse to abandon hope. Mr. H. M. Stanley, the explorer, says that he does not believe the king would kill the bishop, but he admits that the king is uneasy about the German movements, and thinks it was peculiarly unfortunate that a German exploring party would reach one point of the Uganda Territory at about the same time as the bishop would arrive at another point. Many prayers are being offered for the safety of the bishop.

THE PRINTED WORD.

A CORRESPONDENT who has had occasion, in the course of his professional labor, to make inquiries about the extent of the circulation of religious literature, sends us the following interesting statement of facts:

The London Religious Tract Society was organized in 1799. The British and Foreign Bible Society came into existence in 1804; the American Bible Society began in 1816; the American Tract Society commenced in 1825. These four great catholic societies, two in England and two in America, have been operating respectively eighty-seven, eighty-two, seventy, and sixty-one years, or together three hundred years; divided by four we have seventy-five years, three quarters of a century, as the average age of each society; and these four societies have each, by average, received over $1000 a day during their entire existence.

Together their money receipts are over $112,000,000 in this the nineteenth century. The two tract societies, estimating their entire issues, have reached an average equal to about one two-page tract for every inhabitant now living on the globe. The two Bible societies, since the middle of this century, 1850 have averaged for thirty-six years an issue of over ten thousand copies of the Word of God for each business day, while their issues for 1885 were more than seventeen thousand copies a day. Over one hundred and fifty million copies of all sizes have gone forth from these two sources during the nineteenth century. Even these large figures do not represent the whole product of the Christian printing-press, for there are seventy other Bible societies among the different nationalities of the earth.

A BALKY HORSE CONQUERED.

"WHAT'S the matter there?" asked a man, pointing to a crowd which had gathered in a narrow street around a heavily-laden wagon.

"Only a balky horse," replied the boy addressed.

The man crossed over, and went to join the throng. He stood watching the efforts of the driver and his advisers to get the horse in motion again. It was a difficult task. The horse had evidently struck with a determination that was not to be overcome by blows. The driver used his whip vigorously, while the men around pushed the wagon, and tried to turn the wheels. It was no use; the animal stood still with dogged obstinacy, and the load was a very heavy one. "Ought to have had a pair for such a load as that," said one. "You'll have to wait for a team to hook on to him," said another. "Put some straw under him, and light it," suggested a third. The driver stood still, looking at the horse in despair. Now and again he gave the beast a vicious cut with the whip, using all his strength. The horse's flesh quivered, but he did not move.

The new-comer went away to the corner of the block where there was a fruit stall, and bought an apple. He came back, and pushing his way through the crowd, he said: "Now, my man, just keep your whip still a minute, and let me have a show." He drew the reins loose, patted the horse's neck, and spoke kindly to him. Then he broke off a piece of the apple, and offered it to the animal. The horse took it, and put out his lips for more. "Now, then, some of you give a hand to the wheels," he said. Holding the apple in front, and still patting the horse's neck, he coaxed him to make an effort. It succeeded. The balky horse was a new creature. The wagon was in motion, and the successful man walked a block or two at his head, still holding the apple out as a promise of reward, while the laughing crowd ran along the sidewalk. "Use him well, my man," he said to the driver, as he gave the horse the apple, "and you will have no more trouble with him," and so saying he turned and went his way, while the driver went cheerfully on by the horse.

As we read of the disastrous conflicts between labor and capital, of the strikes and lock-outs, the suffering and rioting, we can but wish that some wise friends of both employers and employed might try to break the deadlock by methods similar in principle to those which set that wagon upon its way.

A BLASPHEMER'S NIGHT ALARM.

AN amusing incident, showing the cowardice of blasphemers, appears in the pages of a contemporary. It appears that an Irishman named Barney Sheehan concluded to better his condition by emigrating to the United States. He was a devout Roman Catholic in his own country, but by no means in good standing in the church. Sundry acts of dishonesty in which he had been detected and a strong propensity to lying and drunkenness had brought Barney into disrepute; so when he decided to cross the Atlantic there was little regret expressed by his priest or his neighbors.

When he arrived in New York he had the misfortune to fall into the company of men worse than himself, who taught him infidel notions. It was remarkable how readily Barney welcomed these ideas. One of his most painful experiences in the past was his dread of a future judgment. The priest had tried to cure him of his wicked practices by dwelling upon the punishment he would have to undergo after death if he did not repent and reform. Now Barney heard with delight that there was no God to punish him, and that hell was a mere bugbear invented by the priests. He rejoiced in the immunity this implied, and when he left New York to get work in the country he was a regular and foul-mouthed blasphemer.

One night, after spending some time in the saloon, where he had horrified the company there by his blasphemous utterances, declaring that there was neither God nor devil, heaven nor hell, he retired to rest in the barn where his employer allowed him to sleep. He was soon sunk in a heavy slumber, but after some time was awakened by a strange noise. He started and looked around. It was a bright moonlight night, and as he turned toward the half door which he had left open, he saw the moonlight streaming in. But he saw something else, too, which made his blood run cold, and his hair almost rose with fright. There, looking at him intently, was a creature with horns—just such horns as Barney had seen on the head of the devil in a picture in an old book at home in Ireland. It was a dreadful sight. He sat up spellbound for a minute, unable to speak or move. Then he jumped up and ran to the farthest extremity of the barn in abject terror. There in the darkness he knelt and prayed as he had never prayed in his life before.

After a time he ventured to creep forward to where he could see the door. The dreadful monster was gone, and Barney hastily dressed himself and ran to the house, awoke the farmer, told him what he had seen, and begged that he might sleep in the kitchen. He made all kinds of vows and protestations of amendment of life, and swore he would never drink another drop of liquor or touch again anything that did not belong to him. The farmer let him in, and made him comfortable in the kitchen for the rest of the night.

A Blasphemer's Nocturnal Visitor.

"What was the matter with the man?" the farmer's wife asked him when he returned.

"Oh, it was that drunken Irish infidel," said the farmer. "He thinks he saw the devil at the barn door, and was scared out of his wits. He must have been a bad fellow by what he says. I hope it will teach him a lesson he won't forget."

"What was it he did see, do you think?"

"Only the goat; but if the beast looked in over the door, as she does, I can imagine that when half awake his muddled wits, spurred by his conscience, made him mistake her for the devil. I hope he won't find it out in the morning."

A FATAL FRAUD.

AN ORIGINAL SERIAL STORY. BY LEW VANDERPOOLE.

In Red Dog's Camp.

NOWHERE else in the world does one encounter such singular freaks of nature—so much that is at once grand, beautiful, and startling—as in the Rocky Mountains of North America.

The Himalayas, the Alps, the Andes, the Apennines, Teneriffe, Parnassus, and so on to the end of the list, all have grandeur, sublimity, and fascinating beauty. All are magnificent and wonderful. But in Colorado, New Mexico, and the other States and Territories which are clasped and bound together by this tremendous mountain girdle, which is the pride and marvel of our great country, one sees more which is inspiring, thrilling, bewildering, than in any other land under the sun.

Cañon, gorge, ravine, gulch, crag, peak, cliff, lake, river, mesa—from the greatest to the least, from the vastest to the most minute—each has a charm, a magical, resistless power, peculiarly its own.

Each point, feature, and characteristic of these wild, majestic mountains and their environments has its legend or its bit of history.

The religious and poetic fervor of many races of opposite and diverse traits enters into this story treats of. It was, by nature, a safe retreat and stronghold. Three sides were walled in by gigantic rocky cliffs, and in front, a hundred feet below, was a roaring river.

Two hundred Indians, with their wives and children, were living there, temporarily, under the leadership of Red Dog, an Apache chief.

Near the middle of the camp were the two prisoners of whom Leon had told Crance.

One of them, sure enough, was Stephen Vane and the other, if one might judge by his strong, brown eyes, was John Smith, the detective.

He was so cleverly disguised, however, with abundant gray hair and beard, that Vane never even once suspected his identity.

That the stranger was an officer Vane was positive, for the seeming old man had attempted his arrest in the mountains; he was fighting for freedom, in fact, when the Indians surprised them.

He supposed that his attempted arrest was an outgrowth of his affair with Crance. It never once entered his mind that he was in any danger of discovery and punishment for the crimes he had committed before fleeing Westward.

In fact, he had observed so many precautions that he doubted if it would be possible for any one to follow him to New Mexico.

An hour after Leon and Bob Crance met in the mountains that weird, sultry morning after Vane's capture by the Indians, Red Dog and his braves began discussing some means for the disposition of their prisoners.

Before they came to any decisive point Leon and Crance entered the camp.

Both men were respected by Red Dog, and he invited them into the council. Crance listened eagerly to all that was said.

After taking in the situation he briefly explained who Vane was, claimed him as his own rightful prisoner, and demanded permission from the council to have him handed over to the State authorities for safe custody.

After much parleying, Red Dog, convinced that he could not exact a ransom from any one for the person of Vane, promised to turn that rich and inexhaustible treasury of lore and tradition. Toltec, Aztec, Indian, Mexican, Spaniard—each contributed his share; and the vast and glowing fabric is characteristic of the countless hands which helped to weave it.

In it are the fire and passion of the tropics, and the chilling glitter of the northern ice-fields; the luxuriant palm and myrtle, and the hardy, scanty, storm-stunted pine; one burns with the fierceness and frenzy of love, and the other is frigid and pulseless as death. Refulgence and desolation!

The earth, in her measureless and bounteous bosom, holds nothing more perfect, more complete. Perfect and complete it was for years—and then man came.

Alas that the destroying torch of labor and commerce should enter so holy a sanctuary! Alas that the sound of the pick and the drill should ring on the air where only the voices of the birds giving sweet praise to the Creator should be heard!

In the heart of these wonderful mountains, in sight of the smoke from Santa Fé, and in hearing of the bells of that ancient town, there was an Indian encampment at the time which this worthy over to Crance the next day. He reserved the right, though, to let his braves first amuse themselves by hurling knives and tomahawks at him.

Indian nature always asserts itself in some way, and if a prisoner is too insignificant to make ransom a possibility, it is generally voted that he will at least do to torture or tantalize.

No one put in a plea for Smith, but as he seemed very old, and possessed of that kind of innocence which nearly all savage tribes respect, Crance and Leon decided that to ask for his liberation was only to crave that which was certain to be granted unasked.

Smith seemed to realize this himself. He was quiet and passive, while Vane was constantly raging and raving.

Notwithstanding his unruffled demeanor there was a tumult in the brain of the disguised detective, though his personal safety had no part or parcel in it.

When he and Vane were struggling in the ravine where they were captured, the latter delivered himself of many disjointed remarks. Judging from these it was apparent to Smith that Myrtie had been rescued by some stranger. Smith felt certain that she could have scarcely fallen into worse hands than Vane's, yet, with her beauty and youthfulness, she was certainly in a position of great danger, to say the least of it, anywhere in that wild country, with its still wilder men.

He must obtain his freedom in some way and find her. He observed the coming of Crance and Leon, and felt, somehow, that it portended good to him. Still, he made no attempt to attract their attention, deeming it best to let matters take their own course.

Vane did not see Crance and Leon when they came, and so was not aware that there was any white man in camp, except himself and his fellow-prisoner.

Smith was quick to discover that Crance had some reason for keeping out of Vane's sight, and not knowing about the episode in the gaming-house, he found it impossible to account for it, except, perchance, Crance might be one of his brother-detectives. As he paid no attention to Smith's signals, the latter decided, at length, that Crance was avoiding Vane's eyes for some personal reason of which he knew nothing.

He had about come to the conclusion that Crance was not, after all, trying to keep out of Vane's sight, and that he merely imagined it, when something happened which proved that his supposition to the contrary was correct.

At a signal from Red Dog, Vane was suddenly brought forward, unbound and placed near a wide-spreading madroño. Crance quickly moved into the shadow behind the prisoner, evidently, from some motive which was not apparent, determined that Vane should not see him.

The fact was that Crance for almost the first time in his life, was afraid of a conflict. Ordinarily he was ready to meet an enemy, however desperate, and rather sought a fight than avoided it. In this case it was not that he feared Vane or had any apprehensions on his own account for his personal safety. But he wanted to carry through the generous enterprise on which he had entered. If the girl who had shown so much confidence in him were once restored to her mother he would be content. But if he should die now—and Vane had displayed a violent, murderous temper—who was there who would convey the lady to her home? For the first time in his life Crance found himself concerned about his own body. He had suddenly become a person of importance to another, and it is astonishing how rapid is the change the consciousness of that fact produces.

Crance, therefore, waited impatiently for Red Dog's permission to secure Vane and carry him away. He would then have him lodged securely in prison, and could proceed with Myrtie to her home undisturbed by apprehension of attack from the baffled schemer. He flung himself face downward on the ground within hearing of the Indian talk, but away from the group of young braves who had Vane and the other prisoner in charge.

As he lay there strange thoughts passed through his mind. He was conscious of a disgust for his mode of life which he had never experienced before. The short time he had passed in Myrtie's society seemed to have revolutionized him. He could not analyze the change nor recognize the causes that had led to it, but that he was changed he knew. He dwelt on every act and word of the strange lady, and always reverted to the singular and mysterious fact that she had trusted him. Why could she have done so? Rough, reckless Bob Crance asked himself the question again and again. It was a new sensation for him to have a human being, and one so fragile and beautiful, relying upon him for safety, and trusting him implicitly. Was he worthy of such confidence? Crance felt that he was in this case, for he would defend his charge with his life, and was resolved that all that mortal man could do to secure her safety should be done. But it was strange that the lady should have trusted him. He would ask her the reason when he met her again. Perhaps there was good in him after all; but if so, why was she the first to recognize it? He would talk to her, and perhaps he would give up his wild life, which had become so suddenly distasteful to him, and live a decorous, civilized life. Crance laughed as the thought crossed his mind of himself in city dress engaged in ordinary business in a crowded town. But it might come to that if the lady encouraged him.

A loud yell startled him from his meditations. He was on his feet in an instant. One glance showed him the cause of the commotion. Vane had escaped. He ran swiftly to the place where he had last seen the man, and then followed the Indians who had started in pursuit. They came to a stand on the edge of the ravine, and Crance joined them. They were looking down its precipitous sides into the gloomy depths below.

"Is he gone over?" Crance asked.

There was no need for an answer. Concentrating his gaze where an Indian silently pointed, he saw a confused heap lying between two huge rocks, and realized that Vane's opportunities for wrong-doing were closed for some time at least.

That conviction, however, was not sufficient for Crance. He thought it possible that the lady might want to know what had become of her persecutor, and besides he did not wish to have left in his own mind any doubt as to his security. There was, too—though Crance would not admit the feeling—a merciful motive even toward his enemy, who might be living down there in agony. Silently he set out alone by a circuitous path from which, at the distance of a mile, he could strike a point where it was possible to reach the bottom of the ravine, and he trusted to his own agility for working along it to the place where Vane had fallen.

From what he had heard he inferred that the young braves had been amusing themselves with their other prisoner, and there being no particular interest attaching to the safe custody of either of them, ransom being out of the question, they had neglected to keep a close watch upon Vane. It seemed that Crance was to have him anyway, and if Crance wanted him he might have watched him. Seeing himself unnoticed Vane crawled out of sight and was unmissed for some moments. When the yell told that his flight was discovered he was but a few yards away, and he rose to his feet and ran for his life. He knew nothing of the ground, and stepped clear over the precipice before he could have discovered his danger.

It was slow and toilsome work that Crance had undertaken. He was strong and sure-footed, but it took him nearly an hour to reach the bottom of the ravine, and he had still a long distance to traverse over rocky boulders before he could find the spot where Vane lay. He persevered, however, and at last stood looking down at the motionless heap of clothing which he had seen from the edge of the precipice far above.

So far as his humane motives were concerned the journey was useless. He moved the heap carefully, but one glance at the face which he turned over told him that the man was dead. He must have died before he struck the foot of the ravine, for there was an injury on the back of his head that must have been fatal, and that had been inflicted before he reached the spot where Crance found him. Some rocky projection—many of such Crance could see as he looked up—must have broken Vane's skull and killed him instantly. His body seemed scarcely human, so broken and mangled was it by his descent.

"Well, the critter won't hurt anybody any more. He's passed in his checks sure. He's been a bad 'un in his time, I should say. He's done his last game now, though."

Crance turned and picked his way back again by the toilsome road over which he had come. He was solemnized by what he had seen, and in his altered mood he felt no vindictive joy over the fate of his dead enemy. He was softened altogether, and though not given to inward examination, he recognized the fact and wondered how long it would last. When he had fulfilled his promise and had seen the lady safe with her mother, the old reckless mood might return. It might not, and if it did not Bob Crance would be seen no more in these parts.

He was in no need of Red Dog's assistance now, so he decided not to return to the camp, but to proceed right on to Santa Fé. Myrtie would be anxious, and though he knew that she was safe where he had left her, he felt uneasy until his promise was fully executed.

Had he known who was the other prisoner in Red Dog's camp he would have returned. As it was, he imagined that he was some idle loafer, or perhaps a robber with whom Vane had got into a wrangle. For such a man Crance had no trouble. He might shift for himself now. There was little fear that Red Dog would do him harm. He was right in that, for the man was set at liberty that night, and at once sought out Leon in the hope of learning something about Myrtie.

The half-breed, however, was not easily found, and when found was not communicative. "Yes," he knew the man who had come to the camp about Vane. Supposed he had some quarrel with him, and was going to settle it if he could have got him from Red Dog.

"Look here, stranger," said Smith, "I am going to trust you. I believe you are a square fellow, and I'll deal that way with you."

"I am a half-breed," said Leon. "That is what I am. There is very little good about me. Those savages over there are pretty much the same as me, I guess. Not much to choose between us. Thank ye, all the same, for yer good opinion."

"I am accustomed to act on my first opinion," said Smith, "and my first opinion about you is that you are better than you pretend to be. Now, I'm going to tell you my story, and you can help me or not as you like."

They sat down on a rock, and Smith told the half-breed about Vane. Told him of his crime in Virginia, of his escape, his abduction of Myrtie to secure immunity from punishment, and his own persistent pursuit of him.

"Well, what do you want of me?" the half-breed asked, when he had heard him to the end.

"I want you to help me find the lady. Do you know anything about her?"

"I won't deny that I do," Leon answered, remembering all he had heard from Crance. "I may or may not, stranger. The thing is none of my business, and I might do harm if I interfere. Crance can manage the thing, I believe, whatever it is. I've no call to meddle."

"I assure you that you could do no better thing for the lady than to guide me to her if you know where she is. I am her best friend."

"I won't do that," Leon answered. "Crance is my best friend, and I ain't goin' to offend him. I'll tell you what I will do, and I won't do a thing more; I'll take you to a place I know of whar you'll be comfortable. You wait there while I find Crance. I'll tell him what you've told me, and you shall give me a line in writing to show who you are, and I'll come back and tell you what Crance says. Mebbe he'll come, too, if you are doin' the straight thing."

"I agree," said Smith. "I told you I would trust you, and I will. You might be taking me where I should be robbed and murdered, but I trust you."

"Shake," said Leon, briefly, extending his hand. They shook hands, and went on side by side to the place where Leon had decided to leave him while he went to search for Crance.

READING THE LAW.

S. S. Lesson for March 7, Neh. 8:1-15. Golden Text, Ps. 119:18. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Preachers Putting the Bible Behind Them—Hearers Failing to Check off the Reader—Scottish Caution—Jewish Neglect of the Law—Royal Example—Light in the Dark Ages—The People's Request to Ezra—The Six Hours' Bible Reading—Reverence of the People—The Instruction Following—Their Sorrow Turned into Mirth.

"OPEN Thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of Thy law." So prayed the Psalmist when the Word of God comprehended only about one half of its present riches of truth. How much more may we pray, "Open Thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of Thy grace in Thy blessed Word!" It is wonderful that God should have given us a written revelation of Himself and of His will concerning us, and that we should take so little account of His Word! The majority of sermons which one hears are not expositions of Scripture at all, but essays upon some verse or part of a verse of Scripture, the smallest amount of what God has said furnishing a theme on which man shall speak his words for half an hour, or an hour, as it happens. Enter most of the Protestant churches in Europe, and you will see the pastor, as soon as he has read his text, put the Bible behind him, and too often it is significant of the kind of sermon which follows. Look to the Jews, and you see an universal dearth of Bibles. This is too often the case in England, too, in many churches, and most sadly so in America. Again, how often at family prayer the children and servants have not their Bibles in hand! Thank God, in dear old Scotland we have still a people who habitually carry their Bibles to church, make use of them in family worship, and who are deservedly recognized through the world as

THE BIBLE-READING PEOPLE.

It was a grievous thing for Israel and Judah when their kings failed to obey the law of God concerning them, "And it shall be when he [the king] sitteth upon the throne of his kingdom that he shall write him a copy of this law in a book out of that which is before the priests the Levites. And it shall be with him, and he shall read therein all the days of his life; that he may learn to fear the Lord his God, to keep all the words of this law, and these statutes to do them. It was a grievous thing when the people failed to teach them unto their children, and to talk of them when they sat in their house, when they walked in the way, when they sat down, and when they rose up" (Deut. 6:7). It was still more grievous when Jehoiakim, King of Judah, took the roll of the book which contained God's Word to him, and cutting it with a penknife, threw it into the fire which was upon the hearth, until its was consumed (Jer. 36:23). It was a grievous thing when, in the time of King Josiah, both king and priests and people were living so independently of the Word of God that when Hilkiah found the Word of God in the house of the Lord it was a long-forgotten treasure instead of the thing which was most prized and valued (II Kings 22:8). Oh, how wonderful is the long-suffering of our God, that He should have borne with the disregard of His Word for ages! Yet again and again through the dark ages of the Church has the Word of God been studied and preached by those whom God raised up. Wycliffe's poor preaching priests in England; later on John Huss; then Luther and his friends in Germany, Zwingli in Switzerland, the Huguenots and Port Royalists in France, the Waldenses and others kept alive the knowledge of the Word of God.

In the time of Nehemiah, when God had stirred him up to rouse them to the point of rebuilding Jerusalem, it was who made request for the Word of God.* "All the people gathered themselves together as one man into the street that was before the water gate; and they spake unto Ezra the scribe to bring the book of the law of Moses, which the Lord had commanded to Israel." They were in downright earnest; all labor was suspended, the field work and the housework alike, and Ezra the priest gave them a six hours' Bible-reading. Men, women, and all the children who were old enough to understand were there, drinking in God's words of life. Oh, how it must have gladdened the heart of God! Oh, how it rejoices Him now when His people come together with open Bibles to know what the Lord their God will say to them! It was new to them, and came with wonderful freshness. But so it does now. Go to any meeting where man has all the say, and to another where the Word of God is explained by reference to other passages; you never tire of the Word of God, but half an hour of man's words makes you weary. "My soul is athirst for God, for the living God" (Ps. 42:2). Oh, what a rest it is to get away from man's discussions and theories, opinions and ideas, and get some solid Word of God on which to rest—something which is so sure that heaven and earth shall pass away, but shall leave that work as firm and immutable as ever!

There was a great deal of

in this ancient Bible-reading. Ezra stood on a pulpit of wood, he opened the book in the sight of all the people, and when he opened it "all the people stood up." Would to God there were more of reverence in our day, more respect for God, His worship and His Word! So many come to church or to meetings just for personal enjoyment, and with that idea uppermost expect everything to minister to them. They seek the most comfortable place, are vexed if the preaching does not please them, and realize in no way that they are the audience of the King of Heaven, who has something to say to His servants. Selfishness and irreverence go together. Ezra first blessed the Lord, the great God; but the people must have their part also, and a fervent universal Amen rang throughout the assembly, "with lifting up their hands" in token of receiving all which God would give to them, "and they bowed their heads, and worshipped the Lord with their faces to the ground."

The reading of the law by Ezra without comment was followed by an earnest and general inquiry meeting; a large number of priests and Levites "caused the people to understand the law." When people are in real earnest about their souls, whether for salvation or sanctification, whether about the Lord's coming or Scriptural healing, they never hear the Word of God, or read it alone, without having questions arise in their minds; and God would have His Levites (His teaching elders, whoever they be) to cause the people to understand. Let the people ask questions, or ask them questions which will bring them out, and then answer from the Word of God itself; this is what is really helpful. It seems as though they must have broken up into little groups, each one around their teachers—a kind of large extempore Sunday-school. "So they read in the book in the law of God dis-tingly (taking good care that the people should hear), and gave the sense, and caused them to understand the reading." This is the essence of true spiritual instruction: the Lord make it to be more widely done inside as well as outside of our churches!

The people wept when they heard the words of the law. So much of their time had been passed in ignorance of God, they were so convicted of their shortcomings, that it seemed natural to mourn over them. But here came in the precious instruction of those who knew more of God's heart: "This day is holy unto the Lord;

MOURN NOT, NOR WEEP.

... Go your way, eat the fat, and drink the sweet, and send portions unto them for whom nothing is prepared: for this day is holy unto our Lord: neither be ye sorry; for the joy of the Lord is your strength." The natural heart gives itself over to despair and useless grief when we find ourselves in the wrong about anything; we are so hurt and so disappointed that we did not do better; we feel like giving up altogether. But this indulgence in grief has more mortified pride about it than genuine humility. True humility brings us to our loving God, that He may set the wrong things right, and rejoice both His own heart and ours. A day that is holy to the Lord, or a heart that is holy to the Lord, is not filled with groans and lamentations, but rejoicings, that we have found Him who forgives sin and cleanses it away—one who turns sorrow into joy, who comes Himself into our weakness, and says: "The joy of the Lord is your strength." God has been more grieved by our sin than we ever can be; but He wants it cleansed, and wants us delivered as quickly as possible. "So the Levites stilled all the people, saying, Hold your peace, for the day is holy; neither be ye grieved." God would rather see us spend time in praising Him for a conscious deliverance than in mourning over a sin while we are keeping Him waiting to deliver, until we are through with our sorrow. Real sorrow for sin does not make us remain occupied with it, but turns us to Jesus for instant deliverance. The people understood the message, glorious liberty followed. Joy, pardon, freedom, shone on every face. "The people went their way to eat, and to drink, and to send portions, and to make great mirth, because they had understood the words that were declared to them." Holiness and gladness go together. In Ps. 81:1-5 joyful praise is spoken of and a law of the God of Jacob . . . ordained in Joseph for a testimony." No heart is so light as that heart which is right with God, and which really casts all its care on Him, because He careth for us. The fruit of the Spirit is "joy" as well as love, peace, etc., and Paul exhorts us to rejoice always, yet not in ourselves, our progress, our experience, but "rejoice in the Lord always;" not in what we are or ever can be, but in what He is, who is the chiefest among ten thousand, the altogether lovely.

GOD'S PROMISES.

Lord, I believe! The cross of care
That crowds upon my tired heart,
I bring to Thee! No other love
Could lift the load, relieve the smart,
Strength for the day, Thy promise gives;
Because Thou art, Thy servant lives.

Lord, I believe! The rain of tears
That dims these weeping eyes to-night,
Can never hide Thy rainbow arch,
Thy sign of love and life and light!
In mystic grandeur, calm and high,
It arches o'er my western sky.

Lord, I believe! The Babel sounds
That ring upon my weary ear,
Drown not the still, small voice that speaks
In steadfast accents, true and clear.
Lord, here am I! Thy will reveal,
As at Thy blessed feet I kneel.

Lord, I believe! The cross is hard,
The night is dark, and long the road,
Can I forget the form that bowed
'Neath sharper cross; and heavier load?
The wounded feet that here have trod,
And marked with blood the shuddering sod?

Lord, I believe! Mine unbelief,
My weakness and my wrong forgive!
Tried, trembling, troubled, let me touch
Thy garment's hem, and I shall live.
For, wounded, sinful, though I be,
God's promises are all for me.

THE death of Mr. Gough on February 18th is an event which thousands of people in this country and in Great Britain heard of with sincere sorrow. We cannot afford to lose soldiers in the devoted army which is fighting against the rum traffic, the gigantic enemy of our country and our race. And Gough was a valiant fighter. He hated the enemy with the hatred of a man who had suffered in his own person from its horrible tyranny, and he set himself to help others to throw off its chains as he had himself been delivered. How successful he was we all know. The poor drunkard listening to him knew that the man who was talking to him realized his difficulties, could sympathize with him in the tortures of the ordeal through which he must pass to emancipation, and understood the desperate character of the struggle which he encouraged him to make. How many men in helpless, hopeless bondage have taken courage from Gough's kind words to fight the battle and have won the victory no one knows, but they must be counted by thousands. His inspiring eloquence sounded like a general's proclamation to an army; it thrilled his hearers, stimulating the victim to strike for freedom, and the compassionate to help him by their sympathy. But his life of valiant service is closed. He goes to an honored grave amid the blessing of men in all ranks of life, and he leaves the world poorer by his death.

HIS LAST WORDS

spoken in public from the platform of the church at Frankford, Pa., on February 15th, should become a battle-cry in this new era when vice of all kinds, bred of the liquor traffic, fostered by it, and growing out of it like a noxious weed, is poisoning the social atmosphere, corrupting the people and undermining our national greatness. As Gough stood on that platform that Monday night, unconscious that the angel of death was hovering behind him, he uttered the words which, had he known of what was impending, he would have chosen to utter: "Young man, make your record clean." Scarcely had they left his lips when the blow fell, and the voice which had been for more than forty years a powerful force for good was silenced forever in this world. The words should never be forgotten. They should be treasured and sent forth in clarion note through the land he loved so well, as the parting injunction to the army by the general who is forced to quit the field on which he has done noble service.

BIRTH AND EARLY LIFE.

The events of his life are well known. He has told them himself with graphic force on many a platform as an encouragement to others. They may, however, be useful to some who have not heard him, and ought in any case to be placed on record. John Bartholomew Gough was born at Sandgate, England, on August 22d, 1817; he was therefore under sixty-nine years of age when he died. His father was a retired soldier who had fought against the first Napoleon in the Peninsular war, was present at Corunna, and beheld Sir John Moore, the hero of that memorable fight, carried from the fatal field. His mother was a woman of fair education, and, money being scarce, she added to her slender resources by teaching school. She was also expert at making a kind of lace then very fashionable. On one occasion, when their necessities absolutely required extra exertion, she took her basket of work and travelled eight miles and a half to the town of Dover. Her long walk was wasted, no one would buy her lace, and she plodded back again disconsolate. During her absence a gentleman had sent for John to the town library to read to him, and was so pleased with his reading that he made him a present of five shillings ($1.25), and Mr. Purdy, the librarian, in addition, gave him sixpence. Soon afterward, on entering the house, he found his mother sitting in her chair, bathed in tears. She told him of her disappointment and the family's straits. With joy he drew the crown piece and the sixpence from his pocket, and placed them in her hand; and then with feelings of delight they knelt down, while she poured out her heart in thankfulness to God for the relief so seasonably provided.

It is significant that the first money we hear of the young orator possessing should have come into his hands as the result of the exercise of his elocutionary powers, and also that he should have given it all away. It was an indication of the disposition he evinced all through his life. Though he received higher sums than almost any other lecturer for his services, he has not left a large fortune behind him. His benevolence made heavy inroads on his income, and his heart and pocket-book were always open to the calls of the miserable.

COMES TO AMERICA.

When he was twelve years old an opportunity occurred to send him to America. His father knew that there was little chance for him in England, and a family coming out from Sandgate at that time agreed to take the boy with them on payment of fifty dollars. It may be supposed that the old soldier's pension suffered that month, for the money was paid, and on June 10th, 1829, John sailed for America. On August 3d, fifty-four days afterward, the vessel arrived in New York harbor, and the party, after a brief stay in the city, went to the farm they had taken in Oneida County. His pious mother had stipulated that John should go to school when possible, and always to Sunday-school, but the promise was not kept, and there were other disagreeables. John made up his mind to leave, but was not permitted to do so. At last he wrote home for permission to quit the farm, and sold his jack-knife to pay the postage of the letter. His request was granted, and, with his father's consent, he came to New York City to learn a trade. He had only fifty cents in his pocket when he arrived, on December 12th, 1831, but he soon secured work as errand-boy at the Methodist Book Concern.

Soon after this he joined the church in Allen Street, and after a time sent home for his father, mother and sister, and in August, 1833, his mother and sister joined him; but his father, fearing to lose his pension, did not accompany them. John's income at this time was three dollars per week, not a luxurious sum on which to support the trio, but love made amends for all their wants. Their happiness, however, was of short duration. John lost his employment through depression of trade, his sister lost her situation from the same cause, and the three soon fell into dire straits. While they were still in poverty Mrs. Gough died suddenly of apoplexy, on July 8th, 1834, and John's affectionate heart received a blow he never forgot. He was too poor to pay for a funeral, and his beloved mother was buried in an unknown grave in Potter's Field. His sister soon afterward married and went to Newburyport, Mass., and the lad of seventeen was again solitary in the great city.

UNDER THE CURSE.

It was then that he first began to give way to the many temptations that beset young men in this city. He had wonderful conversational powers, a pleasing voice, a stock of capital stories and a great capacity as a mimic. It is not, therefore, surprising that he became a favorite among young men about town prone to habits of dissipation. The glitter of variety shows in the Bowery began to have strong fascinations for the young man, who was now working as a bookbinder, and he also acquired the habit of drinking to excess. In 1837 he joined a body of strolling players then performing at Providence, R. I., playing low comedy parts until the theatre closed. Destitution and drink were then his lot for a period of about a year. He would work hard for a few days and then spend all his earnings in a prolonged debauch, and only resume his labors at his trade when without sufficient money to buy a glass of rum. He went on a fishing cruise next, and was nearly wrecked off Cape Sable. He went to Newburyport, where he married, and for a few weeks was on his good behavior, but his passion for drink prevailed, and he became a confirmed drunkard.

And yet he made many strenuous but futile attempts at reform. A fearful attack of delirium tremens prostrated and nearly killed him, but as soon as he had partially recovered from its effects he flew again to drink. His wife died while giving birth to a child, and this loss drove him to despair, and he indulged more than ever to drown his grief. Deprived of his situation, he was in the habit of frequenting the lowest grogeries every night, telling funny stories, singing comic songs and in other ways amusing the loafers who drank at the bar, and receiving with gratitude glasses of brandy with which they rewarded his efforts to please them. He frequently contemplated suicide, and relates in his autobiography how, in a state of misery and overwhelmed by remorse, he often stood by the railway track with a vague wish to lie across it, drink himself into oblivion and let the cars go over him. Once he stood by the rails with a bottle of laudanum clattering against his lips, but a sudden impulse overtook him, and he dashed the poison to the ground. His drinking continued, and one night he set his bed on fire while intoxicated, and was rescued by neighbors discovering the fire in time. Not long afterward his drinking brought on another and worse attack of

DELIRIUM TREMENS.

"For three days," he says, "I endured more agony than pen could describe. Hideous face appeared on the walls and on the ceiling and on the floors; foul things crept along the bed clothes, and glaring eyes peered into mine. I was at one time surrounded by millions of monstrous spiders that crawled slowly over every limb, while the beaded drops of perspiration would start to my brow, and my limbs would shiver until the bed rattled again. Strange light would dance before my eyes, and then suddenly the very blackness of darkness would appal me by its dense gloom. All at once, while gazing at a frightful creation of my distempered mind I seemed struck with sudden blindness. And then the scene would change: I was falling-falling swiftly as an arrow—far down into some terrible abyss; and so like reality was it that, I fell, I could see the rocky sides of the horrible shaft, where mocking, gibing, mowing, fiend-like forms were perched; and I could feel the rushing past me, making my hair stream out by the force of the unwholesome blast.

"Alone I encountered all the host of demoniac forms which crowded my chamber. No or witnessed my agonies or counted my woes, and yet I recovered—how, still remains a mystery to myself; and once more was I able to crawl into the sunshine; but, oh, how changed! Weak cheeks and hollow eyes, feeble limbs and almost powerless hands plainly enough indicated the between me and death there had indeed been but a step!"

RESCUE.

On the last Sunday of October, 1842, as he was walking in a street in Worcester, Mass., in a state of wretchedness and degradation, he was accosted by Joel Stratton, a waiter in a Temperance Hotel, who in kindly tones entreated him to sign the pledge. He did so the next evening and from that time there dates a new epoch in his career. In the course of a lecture delivered in 1879 he described the experience of the few days. He said: "On the night I signed the pledge I cannot describe to you what I became. I was homeless; I was hopeless; I was friendless. Any person seeing me walk the street might say of me, as they did of Daniel D. There is the man that has been in hell. On Tuesday morning I began the battle with my enemy. Oh, the horrible shivering, as if the ice was in the marrow of my bones, instantly lowed by flashes of heat, as if every pore were punctured by a red-hot iron; and then the longing for the drink! I was twenty-five years of age, and could not hold my hand still, and had no control over my nerves. I thought, 'Oh, if I only had one glass. I believe the doctor would say that I ought to have it. I will go and get it.' But then came the reflection, 'It is a matter of life and death now. Keep the pledge; stick to it or you're lost.'

"Well, what did I want? You might have given me piles of gold, and I would have turned from them. You might have offered me the finest clothing, and I would have despised them. What did I want? I wanted human sympathy. I wanted a human hand to help me. I was not then a praying man. I didn't go to God for help. I longed for sympathy; but the heavens to me had long been brass, and I dare not look up. I wanted some one to help me. I went to the man I worked for, and I said, 'I signed the pledge last night.' 'I know you did,' 'I mean to keep it.' 'They all say that.' 'You don't believe I will, do you?' 'No.' I went back to my bench, crushed.

"I was a bookbinder. I had an iron pin in my hand with which I was screwing the hand-press, and it began to move, and frightened me. I gripped it. Still it moved. I gripped it with both hands, and it moved so that I could feel it tearing the flesh out of the palm of my hand, and I stopped it; and there it lay before me, transformed by my imagination into a writhing, slimy snake. I could not bear the straight bar of cold iron twisting and twining as it did; and I said, 'I will give it up. I had had enough of this. I might as well die one way as another. I cannot stand it. It is too hard for me.'

SYMPATHY.

"Well, in the moment of despair I heard a cheerful voice: 'Good morning, Mr. Gough; good morning. Don't you know me?' 'Mr. Goodridge, the lawyer?' 'Yes; I saw you sign the pledge last night.' 'Yes, I did.' 'I was very glad to see you do it.' 'Glad! Nobody is glad at anything I do.' 'Did you see the young men that followed your example?' 'No. I didn't see anything. I am feeling very badly.'

"Well, I had but a moment to spare this morning. I thought I would just come in and say, God bless you. Keep up a brave heart. You know where my office is?' 'Yes, sir, it is in the Exchange, right by the post-office.' 'Well, come in and see me. I shall be very happy to make your acquaintance. I will give you a good, hearty welcome if you come in and see me any time. Will you shake hands with me? God bless you; keep up a brave heart. Come in and see me.'

"Come and see me! I never dreamed a man of his respectability would cultivate my acquaintance. Who would like to be acquainted with me? A pretty poor acquaintance for any man; but he shall have it if he wants it. He says: 'Keep up a brave heart.' I'll do that; I think I can now."

"I fought it. Six days and nights I fought it with horrible things creeping over me; fought it on the floor; fought it on the bed; fought it without a wink of healthy sleep or a particle of nourishing food passing my lips. For six days and six nights, sufferings and torments such as are burned into my brain forever; I fought it till I stood weak and weary and faint, but exultant in the victory—victory over the damning influence of drink."

FIRST WORK.

He continued his work as a bookbinder for some time, but as he recovered his strength he was induced to give short addresses at temperance meetings. His oratorical and dramatic power soon obtained recognition, and he was in general request. He was still very poor, and his addresses were not paid for. On one occasion he had promised to speak at a rather important meeting, but his clothes were so tattered that he was ashamed to go on the platform. He covered them as well as he could with an old overcoat, and clung to it during the meeting. He was sitting near a large stove, and his suffering from the heat while enveloped in his coat was almost unbearable. His addresses took him away from his work, and Gough was getting poorer and poorer. At last he found it necessary in his humorous way to remind the people who invited him to speak that he could not afford to give his time and pay his own fare without some compensation. One evening after he had spoken for two hours the chairman rose and proposed a vote of thanks for the lecturer, which was passed unanimously. As the audience was being dismissed Mr. Gough asked if the vote of thanks could be given him in writing, as, perhaps, the conductor on the train would take it for his fare. The hint was sufficient, and a collection was taken up amounting to $4.

During the first two years he worked very hard. "In three hundred and sixty-five days," he says in his autobiography, "I gave three hundred and eighty-three addresses and received for them $1059, out of which I paid all expenses. I travelled six thousand eight hundred and forty miles, and obtained fifteen thousand two hundred and eighteen signatures to the pledge." He was married for the second time November 23d, 1843, to Miss Mary Whitcomb, and in the following year, May 9th, he delivered his first lecture in New York. He produced a great sensation here, and followed up his success by lectures in Newark, Philadelphia and Washington. He visited the Southern States and Canada, and his eloquence and power aroused the same enthusiasm everywhere. In two years, from the commencement of his work, he obtained thirty-one thousand seven hundred and sixty signatures to the pledge, delivered six hundred and five orations, and travelled more than twelve thousand miles.

VISITS TO ENGLAND.

The fame of the young orator was spreading beyond the boundaries of his own land, and in 1852 a pressing invitation to visit England came from the temperance people there. He accepted, and landed in Liverpool on July 31st, 1853, after an absence from his native land of twenty-four years. On the following day he addressed a large audience in Exeter Hall, London. Every one was taken by surprise. His glowing eloquence took the town by storm, and it was everywhere acknowledged that never before had there been so powerful a pleader for the temperance cause. On the anniversary of his birthday he visited his native village and delivered one of his impassioned addresses to an audience composed of the principal inhabitants and surrounding gentry. The National and Scottish Temperance leagues, eager to enlist his eloquence in the cause of temperance, urged him to prolong his stay; to this he consented, and the visit, which was originally intended to last no more than six weeks, was extended over two years. During this time Mr. Gough delivered four hundred and forty lectures, and travelled seventeen thousand miles. As he passed through the country his fame as an orator increased, and thousands of reclaimed drunkards and happy homes gave evidence of the practical value of his labors. Finding that he was doing a great work, he was urged to remain, but his heart was in his American work, and he pined for the country of his choice. He came back, promising his English friends to pay them another visit at the earliest opportunity. He redeemed his promise in 1857 by a three years' campaign. The temperance cause had flourished during his absence, and his welcome was even more cordial than on his first visit. In 1878 he made a third trip to England, and remained about a year.

HIS INFLUENCE.

Of his work at home it is needless to write. He was known throughout the Union, and no lecturer attracted audiences so great as Gough. People were never tired of listening to his impassioned oratory, and the practical effects of his words were seen in the numbers of drunkards who were induced by his efforts to sign the pledge. Still more beneficial, perhaps, because multiplied in power, was the effect of his lectures on moderate drinkers. He made them ashamed to continue the practice while their example as total abstainers was so sorely needed in the community.

His energy seemed unabated until this year in spite of his arduous labors. Last July he said that he had travelled over four hundred and eighty-nine thousand miles in the course of his work, and had delivered more than eight thousand lectures. In 1846 he published an autobiography, which was subsequently brought down to 1870. In 1881 he published "Sunshine and Shadow," a volume of recollections and anecdotes. In this he gave an interesting account of his methods of preparation and delivery. Last year he issued "Platform Echoes," a collection of reminiscences and incidents in his work. In all these literary efforts he received valuable assistance from his beloved wife, who was his stay and support from his early days of abstinence, and who continually encouraged him in his efforts. For many years Mr. Gough resided—if his continual wanderings permitted his house to be called his residence—at Hillside, near Worcester, Mass. His household at Hillside consisted of his wife and two nieces, children of his wife's dead brother. Mr. Gough was a member of Piedmont Congregational Church, and when in town was a constant attendant upon its services. There his body was taken on February 20th for interment. He being dead yet speaketh.

MR. SPURGEON'S RETURN.

AFTER an absence from London of two months Mr. Spurgeon has returned from Mentone, where he has been recruiting his exhausted energies, and has resumed his work once more in his accustomed place at the Metropolitan Tabernacle. A crowded congregation assembled to welcome the pastor, who looked quite sunburnt, and appeared little the worse for his sudden plunge from the almost tropical heat of Mentone to England's frozen shores. A minute or two passed in silent expectancy, and all eyes were turned toward the door by which the pastor enters, and many hearts were no doubt hoping that his health would permit of his being present. Precisely at eleven o'clock Mr. Spurgeon was seen to enter and descend the steps leading to his platform pulpit, followed by his deacons. Mr. Spurgeon appeared to be in good health, and after a few quiet moments he rose and said: "Let us all unite in prayer."

The joy Mr. Spurgeon experienced in being at home again found expression in his prayer. "It is the delight of our heart to meet with Thee anywhere in the world" were his opening utterances; "still this spot is familiarly dear to us, for we have a thousand happy memories here." In his general supplication Mr. Spurgeon spoke of the congregation as entering upon a new era that morning. "We are a great company," he went on, though some long united with them in Christian fellowship had fallen asleep during his absence, indirect reference being made to the death, a few days previously, at the age of ninety-seven, of Mrs. Gay, the oldest member of the congregation. Mr. Spurgeon pleaded for a blessing on France, showing that he had grateful recollections of the land which provides him an asylum when jaded nature bids him rest awhile away from the worry and the fog.

The sermon Mr. Spurgeon delivered is that printed in this number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD (pp. 138, 139). It occupied fifty minutes in delivery, and at its conclusion Mr. Spurgeon said, apologetically: "I've been a little longer than usual, but, then, I haven't worried you for the last eight weeks." Judging from the responsive smile which came over the faces of his people, it appeared that the Tabernacle congregation would not object to be "worried" all the year round without the intermission of a single Sunday, if the health of their good pastor only permitted it. "Ain't it a treat to 'ave 'im back?" said an old woman, crippled and half blind, as she came out, and the same sentiment was expressed on all sides in various phraseology.

Volume VIII. of the Christian Herald, Containing the Numbers for 1885, with complete index, bound in cloth, may be had from this office; price $3, including postage. A few volumes of 1883 and 1884 are also for sale. We have none prior to 1883.

HOTELS VERSUS HOMES.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, Feb. 28, 1886.

"And brought him to an inn, and took care of him. And on the morrow when he departed, he took out two pence, and gave them to the host, and said unto him, Take care of him: and whatsoever thou spendest more, when I come again, I will repay thee."—LUKE 10: 34, 35.

The Boarding-House a Blessing—Excellence of American Hotels—The Long-Suffering Landladies—Hotels Unsuitable for Homes—Promoters of Gossip—The Reticent Boarder—Injurious to Children—Home Influences a Benefit for Eighty Years—What Constitutes a Home—The Hazard to Morality—Absence of Household Treasures—Hospitality Abridged—The Ten-Lipped Cup—Christ in the Home.

THIS is the good Samaritan paying the hotel bill of a man who had been robbed and almost killed by bandits. The good Samaritan had found the unfortunate on a lonely, rocky road, where, to this very day, depredations are sometimes committed upon travellers, and had put the injured man into the saddle, while this merciful and well-to-do man had walked till they got to the hotel, and the wounded man was put to bed and cared for. It must have been a very superior hotel in its accommodations, for, though in the country, the landlord was paid at the rate of what in our country would be four or five dollars a day, a penny being then a day's wages, and the two pennies paid in this case about two days' wages. Moreover, it was one of those kind-hearted landlords who are wrapped up in the happiness of their guests, because the good Samaritan leaves the poor wounded fellow to his entire care, promising that when he came that way again he would pay all the bills until the invalid got well.

THE VALUE OF HOTELS.

Hotels and boarding-houses are necessities. In very ancient times they were unknown, because the world had comparatively few inhabitants, who were not much given to travel, and private hospitality met all the wants of sojourners, as when Abraham rushed out at Mamre to invite the three men to sit down to a dinner of veal; as when the people were positively commanded to be given to hospitality; as in many of the places in the East these ancient customs are practised to-day. But we have now hotels presided over by good landlords, and boarding-houses presided over by excellent host or hostess, in all neighborhoods, villages, and cities, and it is our congratulation that those of our land surpass all other lands. They rightly become the permanent residences of many people, such as those who are without families, such as those whose business keeps them migratory, such as those who ought not, for various reasons of health or peculiarity of circumstances, take upon themselves the cares of housekeeping.

QUEENLY CATERERS.

Many a man falling sick in one of these boarding-houses or hotels has been kindly watched and nursed; and by the memory of her own sufferings and losses the lady at the head of such a house has done all that a mother could do for a sick child, and the slumberless eye of God sees and appreciates her sacrifices in behalf of the stranger. Among the most marvellous cases of patience and Christian fidelity are many of those who keep boarding-houses, enduring without resentment the unreasonable demands of their guests for expensive food and attentions for which they are not willing to pay an equivalent—a lot of cranky men and women who are not worthy to tie the shoe of their queenly caterer. The outrageous way in which boarders sometimes act to their landlords and landladies show that these critical guests had bad early rearing, and that in the making-up of their natures all that constitutes the gentleman and lady were left out. Some of the most princely men and some of the most elegant women that I know of to-day keep hotels and boarding-houses.

But one of the great evils of this day is found in the fact that a large population of our towns and cities are giving up and have given up their homes and taken apartments, that they may have more freedom from domestic duties and more time for social life, and because they like the whirl of publicity better than the quiet and privacy of a residence they can call their own. The lawful use of these hotels and boarding-houses is for most people while they are in transitu; but as a terminus they are in many cases demoralization, utter and complete. That is the point at which families innumerable have begun to disintegrate. There never has been a time when so many families, healthy and abundantly able to support and direct homes of their own, have struck tent and taken permanent abode in these public establishments. It is an evil wide as Christendom, and by voice and through the newspaper press I utter warning and burning protest, and ask Almighty God to bless the word, whether in the hearing or reading.

PROMOTERS OF GOSSIP.

In these public caravansaries the demon of gossip is apt to get full sway. All the boarders run daily the gauntlet of general inspection—how they look when they come down in the morning and when they get in at night, and what they do for a living, and who they receive as guests in their rooms, and what they wear, and what they do not wear, and how they eat, and what they eat, and how much they eat, and how little they eat. If a man proposes in such a place to be isolated and reticent and alone, they will begin to guess about him: Who is he? Where did he come from? How long is he going to stay? Has he paid his board? How much does he pay? Perhaps he has committed some crime and does not want to be known; there must be something wrong about him, or he would speak.

The whole house goes into the detective business. They must find out about him. They must find out about him right away. If he leave his door unlocked by accident, he will find that his rooms have been inspected, his trunk explored, his letters folded differently from the way they were folded when he put them away. Who is he? is the question, asked with intenser interest, until the subject has become a monomania. The simple fact is, that he is nobody in particular, but minds his own business. The best landlords and landladies cannot sometimes hinder their places from becoming of whisperers, and reputations are torn to tatters, and evil suspicions are aroused, and scandals started, and the parliament of the family is blown to atoms by some Guy Fawkes who was not caught in time, as was his English predecessor of gunpowdery reputation.

The reason is, that while in private homes families have so much to keep them busy, in these promiscuous and multitudinous residences there are so many who have nothing to do, and that always makes mischief. They gather in each other's rooms, and spend hours in consultation about others. If they had to walk a half mile before they got to the willing ear of some listener to detraction, they would get out of breath before reaching there, and not feel in full glow of animosity or slander, or might, because of the distance, not go at all. But rooms 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, and 25 are on the same corridor, and when one carrion crow goes "Caw! Caw!" all the other crows hear it, and flock together over the same carcass. "Oh, I have heard something rich! Sit down and let me tell you all about it." And the first guffaw increases the gathering, and it has to be told all over again, and as they separate each carries a spark from the altar of Gab to some other circle, until from the coal-heaver in the cellar to the maid in the top room of the garret, all are aware of the defamation, and that evening all who leave the house will bear it to other houses, until autumnal fires sweeping across Illinois prairies are less raging and swift than that flame of consuming reputation blazing across the village or city.

Those of us who were brought up in the country know that the old-fashioned hatching of eggs in the hay mow required four or five weeks of brooding, but there are new modes of hatching by machinery, which take less time and do the work in wholesale. So, while the private home may brood into life an occasional falsity, and take a long time to do it, many of the boarding-houses and family hotels afford a swifter and more multitudinous style of moral incubation, and one old gossip will get off the nest after one hour's brooding, clucking a flock of thirty lies after her, each one picking up its little worm of juicy regalement. It is no advantage to hear too much about your neighbors, for your time will be so much occupied in taking care of their faults that you will have no time to look after your own. And while you are pulling the chickweed out of their garden, yours will get all overgrown with horse-sorrel and mullen stalks.

A WRONG TO CHILDREN.

One of the worst damages that comes from the herding of so many people into boarding-houses and family hotels is inflicted upon children. It is only another way of bringing them up on the commons. While you have your own private house you can, for the most part, control their companionship and their whereabouts; but by twelve years of age in these public resorts, they will have picked up all the bad things that can be furnished by the prurient minds of dozens of people. They will overhear blasphemies, and see quarrels, and get precocious in sin, and what the bartender does not tell them the porter or hostler or bell-boy will.

Besides that, the children will go out into this world without the restraining, anchoring, steady- ing, and all-controlling memory of a home. From that none of us who have been blessed of such memory have escaped. It grips a man for eighty years, if he lives so long. It pulls him back from doors into which he otherwise would enter. It smites him with contrition in the very midst of his dissipations. As the fish already surrounded by swim out to sea, thinking they can go as far as they please, and with gay toss of silvery scale they defy the sportsman on the beach, and after awhile the fishermen begin to draw in the net, hand over hand, and hand over hand, and it is a long while before the captured fins begin to feel the net, and then they dart this way and that, hoping to get out, but find themselves approaching the shore, and are brought up to the very feet of the captors, so the memory of an early home sometimes seems to relax and let men out further and further from God and further and further from shore—five years, ten years, twenty years, thirty years; but some day they find an irresistible mesh drawing them back, and they are compelled to retreat from their prodigality and wandering; and though they make desperate effort to escape the impression, and try to dive deeper down in sin, after a while are brought clear back and held upon the Rock of Ages.

If it be possible, O father and mother! let your sons and daughters go out into the world under the semi-omnipotent memory of a good, pure home. About your two or three rooms in a boarding-house or a family hotel you can cast no such glorious sanctity. They will think of these public caravansaries as an early stopping-place, malodorous with old victuals, coffees perpetually steaming, and meats in everlasting stew or broil, the air surcharged with carbonic acid, and corridors along which drunken boarders come staggering at one o'clock in the morning, rapping at the door till the affrighted wife lets them in. Do not be guilty of the sacrilege or blasphemy of calling such a place a home.

WHAT A HOME IS.

A home is four walls enclosing one family with identity of interest, and a privacy from outside inspection so complete that it is a world in itself, no one entering except by permission—bolted and barred and chained against all outside inquisitiveness. The phrase so often used in law books and legal circles is mightily suggestive—every man's house is his castle. As much so as though it had drawbridge, portcullis, redoubt, bastion, and armed turret. Even the officer of the law may not enter to serve a writ, except the door be voluntarily opened unto him; burglary, or the invasion of it, a crime so offensive that the law clashes its iron jaws on any one who attempts it. Unless it be necessary to stay for longer or shorter time in family hotel or boarding-house—and there are thousands of instances in which it is necessary, as I showed you at the beginning—unless in this exceptional case, let neither wife nor husband consent to such permanent residence.

HAZARDOUS TO MORALS.

The probability is that the wife will have to divide her husband's time with public smoking or reading-room, or with some coquettish spider in search of unwary flies; and if you do not entirely lose your husband it will be because he is divinely protected from the disasters that have overwhelmed thousands of husbands with as good intentions as yours. Neither should the husband, without imperative reason, consent to such a life unless he is sure his wife can withstand the temptation of social dissipation which sweeps across such places with the force of the Atlantic Ocean when driven by a September equinox. Many wives give up their homes for these public residences so that they may give their entire time to operas, theatres, balls, receptions, and levees, and they are in a perpetual whirl, like a whip-top spinning round and round and round very prettily until it loses its equilibrium, and shoots off into a tangent. But the difference is, in one case it is a top, and in the other a soul.

THE LARES AND PENATES.

Besides this there is an assiduous accumulation of little things around the private home which in the aggregate make a great attraction, while the denizen of one of these public residences is apt to say: "What is the use? I have no place to keep them if I should take them." Mementoes, bric-à-brac, curiosities, quaint chair or cosey lounge, upholsteries, pictures, and a thousand things that accrete in a home are discarded or neglected because there is no homestead in which to arrange them. And yet they are the case in which the pearl of domestic happiness is set. You can never become as attached to the appointments of a boarding-house or family hotel as to those things that you can call your own, and are associated with the different members of your household, or with scenes of brilliant import in your domestic history. Blessed is that home in which for a whole lifetime they have been gathering, until every figure on the carpet, and every panel of the door, and every casement of the window has a chirography of its own, speaking out something about father or mother, or son or daughter, or friend that was with us awhile. What a sacred place it becomes when one can say: "In that room such one was born; in that bed such a one died; in that chair I sat on the night I heard such a one address a great public honor; by that stool my child knelt for her last evening prayer; here I sat to greet my son as he came back from sea voyage; that was father's cane; that was mother's rocking-chair! What a joyful and pathetic onrush of reminiscences!"

HOSPITALITY CURTAILED.

The public residence of hotel and boarding-house abolishes the grace of hospitality. Your guest does not want to come to such a table. No one wants to run such a gauntlet of acute and merciless hyper-criticism. Unless you have a home of your own you will not be able to exercise the best rewarded of all the graces. For exercise of this grace what blessing came to the humamite in the restoration of her son to life because she entertained Elisha, and to the widow of Zarephath in the perpetual oil well of the miraculous cruise because she fed a hungry prophet, and to Rahab in the preservation of her life at the demolition of Jericho because she entertained the spies, and to Laban in the formation of an interesting family relation because of his entertainment of Jacob, and to Lot in his rescue from the destroyed city because of his entertainment of the angels, and to Mary and Martha and Zaccheus in spiritual blessing because they entertained Christ, and to Publius in the island of Melita in the healing of his father because of the entertainment of Paul, drenched from the shipwreck, and of innumerable houses throughout Christendom upon which have come blessings from generation to generation because their doors swung easily open in the enlarging, ennobling, irradiating, and divine grace of hospitality. I do not know what your experience has been, but I have had men and women visiting at my house who left a benediction on every room—in the blessing they asked at the table, in the prayer they offered at the family altar, in the good advice they gave the children, in the gospelization that looked out from every lineament of their countenances; and their departure was the sword of bereavement.

The Queen of Norway, Sweden, and Denmark had a royal or lips, each one having on it the name of the distinguished person who had drank from it. And that cup which we offer to others in Christian hospitality, though it be of the plainest earthenware, is a royal cup, and God can read on all its sides the names of those who have taken from it refreshment. But all this is impossible unless you have a home of your own. It is the delusion as to what is necessary for a home that hinders so many from establishing one. Thirty rooms are not necessary, nor twenty, nor fifteen, nor ten, nor five, nor three. In the right way plant a table, and couch, and knife, and fork, and a cup, and a chair, and you can raise a young paradise. Just start a home, on however small a scale, and it will grow. When King Cyrus was invited to dine with an humble friend, the king made the one condition of his coming, that the only dish be one loaf of bread, and the most imperial satisfactions have sometimes banqueted on the plainest fare.

Do not be caught in the delusion of many thousands in postponing a home until they can have an expensive one. That idea is the devil's trap that catches men and women innumerable who will never have any home at all. Capitalists of America build plain homes for the people. Let this tenement-house system, in which hundreds of thousands of the people of our cities are wallowing in the mire, be broken up by small homes, where people can have their own firesides and their own altar. In this great continent there is room enough for every man and woman to have a home. Morals and civilization and religion demand it.

SMALL HOMES NEEDED.

We want done all over this land what George Peabody and Lady Burdett-Coutts did in England, and some of the large manufacturers of this country have done for the villages and cities, in building small houses at cheap rents, so that the middle classes can have separate homes. They are the only class not provided for. The rich have their palaces, and the poor have their poorhouses, and criminals have their jails; but what about the honest middle classes, who are able and willing to work, and yet have small income? Let the capitalists, inspired of God and pure patriotism, rise and build whole streets of small residences. The laborer may have, at the close of the day, to walk or ride further than is desirable to reach it, but when he gets to his destination in the eventide, he will find something worthy of being called by that glorious and impassioned and heaven-descended word—"home."

SOMETHING TO SAVE FOR.

Young married man, as soon as you can buy such a place, even if you have to put on it a mortgage reaching from base to capstone. The much-abused mortgage, which is ruin to a reckless man, to one prudent and provident is the beginning of a competency and a fortune for the reason he will not be satisfied until he has paid it off, and all the household are put on stringent economies until then. Deny yourself all super-fluities and all luxuries until you can say, "Everything in this house is mine, thank God!—every timber, every brick, every foot of plumbing, every door-sill." Do not have your children born in a boarding-house, and do not yourself be buried from one. Have a place where your children can shout and sing and romp without being overhauled for the racket. Have a kitchen where you can do something toward the reformation of evil cookery and the lessening of this nation of dyspeptics. As Napoleon lost one of his great battles by an attack of indigestion, so many men have such with the food swallowed that they have no strength left for the battle of life; and though your wife may know how to play on all musical instruments and rival a prima donna, she is not well educated unless she can boil an Irish potato and broil a mutton-chop, since the diet sometimes decides the fate of families and nations.

Have a sitting-room with at least one easy-chair, even though you have to take turns at sitting in it, and books out of the public library or of your own purchase for the making of your family intelligent, and checker-boards and guessing matches, with an occasional blind man's buff, which is of all games my favorite. Rouse up your home with all styles of innocent mirth, and gather up in your children's nature a reservoir of exuberance that will pour down refreshing streams when life gets parched, and the dark days come, and the lights go out, and the laughter is smothered into a sob.

CHRIST IN THE HOME.

First, last, and all the time, have Christ in your home. Julius Cæsar calmed the fears of an affrighted boatman who was rowing him in a stream by stating: "So long as Cæsar is with you in the same boat, no harm can happen." And whatever storm of adversity or bereavement or poverty may strike your home, all is well as long as you have Christ the King on board. Make your home so far-reaching in its influence that down to the last moment of your children's life you may hold them with a heavenly charm. At seventy-six years of age the Demosthenes of the American Senate lay dying at Washington—I mean Henry Clay, of Kentucky. His pastor sat at his bedside, and "the old man eloquent," after a long and exciting public life, trans-Atlantic and cis-Atlantic, was back again in the scenes of his boyhood, and he kept saying in his dream over and over again: "My mother! mother! mother!" May the parental influence we exert be not only potential but holy, and so the home on earth be the vestibule of our home in heaven, in which place may we all meet—father, mother, son, daughter, brother, sister, grandfather, and grandmother, and grandchild, and the entire group of precious ones, of whom we must say in the words of transporting Charles Wesley:

"One family we dwell in Him,
One church above, beneath;
Though now divided by the stream—
The narrow stream of death—
One army of the living God,
To His command we bow;
Part of the host have crossed the flood,
And part are crossing now."

The New President of the American Bible Society elected in succession to the late Hon. Frederick T. Frelinghuysen is the Hon. Enoch L. Fancher. The Observer, referring to the choice of the Board, says: "We do not know of any more appropriate selection that could have been made for the responsible and honorable position. Judge Fancher has the highest standing as a man, a citizen, a lawyer, and a jurist, and is identified with the Christian institutions of the city and country. He is a worthy successor of the eminent men who have filled the office from the election of its first president, Elias Boudinot, to the present time. Judge Fancher is a prominent member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Too Late to Pray for Himself.—Mr. Smith, the evangelist of Newcastle, said: "Recently after divine service I was asked to visit a bereaved family. I went to the house of mourning, where lay all that was left of the husband and father. I could do nothing but say a word of comfort to the weeping ones who stood around the bed. On asking if he passed away peacefully, I was told that a friend had gone to a neighbor's door just before he died, and said: 'Oh, come and put up a prayer for him; he is just dying, and cannot pray for himself.' This should not have been the case, for if that man had lived a life of faith in Christ and earnest prayer, which we are all enjoined to do, he would not have required that one should hasten to pray for salvation by his death-bed."

A Wall Bored through by an Insect.—"In Holland there was a huge wall built to prevent the water from overspreading the country. Now, there was a little insect got into the lime of this wall, and began little by little to eat its way, not only through the lime, but also through the stone, the little hole growing larger and larger as the insect ate its way through. Then the water began to come through, drop after drop, till eventually the whole place was flooded. That is just like what sin does in our hearts; we begin by tolerating little sins, but we do not end there; and that wickedness which at first we would have shrunk from, we cease to regard as very sinful. But ere our hearts are irrevocably hardened, let us turn to God; for, 'If we confess our sins He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and cleanse us from all unrighteousness.'"

A Woman's Sorrowful Story.—"At Our Last flower-meeting a poor woman came into the church, and when I was speaking to her in the after-meeting she had a sorrowful story to tell. She said: 'I had to come out of the house this morning and wander about the town, for I could not bear to stay and see the sufferings of my poor children through want of food. My husband has not been in work for seven weeks, and we have had a hard struggle to keep the little ones from starving. We have had no food in the house these last two days, and I cannot find any for them. To-day I heard that there was to be a flower-meeting here, so I came in to try and divert my mind from my home, and while I was looking at all those beautiful flowers which have been given away so plentifully and free, I thought, "When men can be so kind as to send in all these beautiful flowers to the poor, surely the Lord, who is a pitiful Father, cannot forget us in our poverty." The thought brought comfort, but I was not a Christian, and therefore had no claim on God.' She was pointed to the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world, and she did not only find comfort that night, but, better far, she found salvation, and she went home praising the Lord who had redeemed her. Strange to say, when she went home she found food in the house, and neither she nor her family have wanted anything ever since, because she cast herself entirely on the Lord."

An Offer of Herrings!—The Rev. C. J. Whitmore related: "As I was passing down a short street in London, I met a man who was loudly crying as he went: 'Herrings! three a penny!' I presume I appeared a suitable object, for he came close to me, and offered his goods, which I courteously declined. 'They are good and cheap, governor, but I cannot sell them,' he said. 'I do not at all wonder at that,' I answered; 'the people have no work to do, and they cannot afford a penny. How much will you take for the lot?' I inquired. 'I will take four shillings, and will be glad to get it,' was the reply. I produced that sum, and transferred it to him. 'Now,' I said, 'go into the middle of the road, and shout with all your might herrings for nothing!' After carefully examining his money he proceeded into the middle of the road, and went along shouting: 'Herrings for nothing!' Out of sight myself, I stood at the corner to watch the result. He neared the house where a tall woman stood at the window. 'Here you are, missus,' he exclaimed, 'herrings for nothing; a fine chance for yer! come and take 'em.' The woman shook her head unbelievably, and left the window. A little child came out to look at him, but she was afraid, and ran indoors. Then in a loud and audible voice, he cried: 'Oh, you fools!' Coming back to me, he said: 'Nobody wants 'em.' 'Well, try again,' I replied, 'and we will both shout.' Into the road we both went, and I cried loudly: 'Will any one have some herrings for tea?' They heard my voice, and they knew it well, and they came flocking out by the dozen, all striving to reach the welcome food, and in a very few moments the basket was empty. You may be amused at this story, which is strictly true, but are you sure you would not have done as they did—been as unbelieving as they? Nay, are you sure you are not in one important respect ten thousand times worse? Their unbelief only cost them hunger a little longer, but what may your unbelief cost you? for God offers salvation for nothing. Friends, the food was paid for, though afterward freely given."

THE MOMENTOUS DECADE.

By the Rev. M. Baxter.

WE are now entering, in this year of our Lord, 1886, on a period of about ten years' duration which the study of prophecy invests with the most intense interest. The stupendous events described by the prophets of the Old Testament, outlined later by our Lord Himself, and subsequently seen in panoramic detail by the Apostle John during his exile in Patmos, may be expected to occur during these ensuing ten years.

Whether this expectation will be fulfilled we shall learn with certainty during the next three years. What the events of the last seven years of this dispensation will be are clearly revealed. They commence with the negotiation of a treaty between the Jews and some potentate, whom we can recognize as the Napoleonic Antichrist by the fact of his signing the treaty. All "ifs" will be set aside when that treaty is signed, and we shall know then with absolute certainty that in seven years from that time the end will come. It is important to remember that the expression "the end" does not signify the annihilation or demolition of our material earth, but the end of this dispensation. It is the end of the world as we now see it in its social, political and ecclesiastical aspect. A careful and prayerful study of prophecy leads us to believe that that consummation will occur in or about the year 1896; but it will certainly occur without a doubt in that year if the treaty before mentioned is ratified in 1889. Whenever that treaty is concluded the later date is finally and definitely fixed. The end will come in seven years.

THE PROPHETIC DATES.

In arriving at the conclusion that the year 1896 will be the date, we have been guided by the significance of certain prophetic dates. These are fully explained in the First Appendix to "Forty Coming Wonders."* A brief summary of the calculation will suffice here. It has long been a belief, prevalent even before the birth of Christ, that the six days of Creation, followed by the Sabbath, typified an era of six thousand years, followed by a thousand years of Sabbatic blessedness. A suggestion for this mode of reckoning is given in II Peter 3:8, where it is said that "One day with the Lord is as a thousand years;" not only the Jews, but Chaldeans, Persians, Egyptians, Greeks and Romans had the same belief. The basis for it in these heathen writers cannot be discovered, but their unanimity of opinion is remarkable. Gibbon, the infidel historian, mentions that it was prevalent in the early Church during the first four centuries of the Christian Era. The calculation based upon this belief is of course only collateral proof, but it is entitled to the weight belonging to it. The years between the Creation and Christ's birth, believed by chronologists to be 4104, added to the 1896 subsequent to His birth, give 6000.

Clearer and more decisive proof is, however, afforded by the dates actually mentioned in prophecy. Thus the seven times (or years) mentioned by Daniel as the duration of the four successive Gentile empires, give us the figures 2520—that is, the 360 days of which the year as then reckoned consisted, multiplied by seven. They commence with B.C. 624, to which add 1896, and the result is Daniel's period of 2520. Another period is that which determines the time during which the holy city (Jerusalem) should be trodden under foot. It was to be forty and two months (Rev. 11:2). The city was taken by the Mohammedans in 636, after a four months' siege, and a mosque was erected on the site of Solomon's temple. Add the forty and two months, or twelve hundred and sixty years, and the same date, 1896, is the result. Other periods mentioned in prophecy likewise appear to terminate in that year, as will be seen on reference to the appendix above mentioned.

The events of the decade, therefore, will be, first, great European wars and revolutions (probably between 1886 and 1888) issuing in the formation of the now existing twenty-three States or kingdoms in the countries of Cæsar's Roman Empire into exactly Ten Kingdoms confederated together—prefigured by the Ten-Horned Wild Beast, and Ten-Toed image of a Man (Dan. 2:31; 7:25).

THE CONFEDERATION.

This Ten-Kingdomed Confederacy will be formed about eight or nine years before the end of this dispensation, and will be: 1. Britain, legislatively separated from Ireland, India, and its other colonies, which never belonged to Cæsar's Roman Empire. 2. France, extended to the Rhine (probably by a future war against Germany), so as to annex to itself seven kingdoms or States, viz., Belgium, Luxemburg, Rhenish Prussia, Switzerland, Baden, Wurtemberg, and part of Bavaria. 3. Spain with Portugal. 4. Italy. 5. Austria, losing East Hungary and Bohemia. 6. Greece, with Thessaly, Epirus and Macedonia added to it. 7. Egypt. 8. Syria, separated from Turkey. 9. Thracian Turkey. 10. Bulgaria and Roumania and Eastern Hungary—the Slavonic States—united together.

Then a Napoleon will arise, as an Eleventh Little Horn, or sovereign in or near Syria, and become king of Syria, and make a seven years' covenant with the Jews (probably about 1889) seven years before the End (Daniel 7:24; 9:27), and during the final three and a half years have "power over all nations" (Rev. 13:7), and then perish at Christ's descent at Armageddon (Rev. 19:20).

THE SECOND COMING OF CHRIST

"in the air" (I Thess. 4:15, 16; Rev. 12:5), to raise from their graves deceased saints and to remove them to heaven, together with a hundred and forty-four thousand living translated Christians, will take place in its first stage about two years and one to three weeks after the Seven Years' Covenant is made between the coming Napoleon and the Jews. Then there will be a great revival of religion and preaching of the Gospel on the earth for about a year (Rev. 14:6; 6:3); and subsequently the three years and a half of the Great Tribulation and massacre of Christians will run its course, during which this earth will be like a Pandemonium, an Aeldama, a Golgotha, or field of blood (Dan. 7:25; 12:7; Revelation 11:2, 3; 12:6-14; 13:5). Our Saviour Himself thus describes it: "Then shall be Great Tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world, no, nor ever shall be; and except those days shall be shortened no flesh shall be saved. And immediately after the tribulation they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and glory, and He shall send forth His angels and gather in His elect from the four winds"

Matt. 24 : 21-31). At this second stage of Christ's Second Coming all the Christians remaining on the earth will be translated to heaven, and then He will descend on Mount Olivet, at Jerusalem, and destroy Antichrist and convert the few Jews and Gentiles remaining on the earth, and personally reign over them and their descendants during the subsequent Millennium of one thousand years which will then commence (Rev. 19, 20 ; Zech. 14 ; Dan. 7).

PROTESTANTISM IN SYRIA.

By Prof. H. W. Hulbert, of Beirut.

(Copyright.)

No disciple of Christ can fail to be interested in the attempts which are being made to preach the pure Gospel in this ancient Land of Promise. There still lingers a germ of the old crusading spirit in the heart of Christendom, more intelligent, it is to be hoped, and purer than that displayed in the rude yet gallant days of chivalry. There are many reasons which conspire to make the interest in this Syrian mission cosmopolitan. The eye of the Christian world rests on this strategic point in the contest. The Presbyterian Church of America in the northern sections, and the Church of England in the southern sections, have sent out their battalions, and taken up with especial zeal the work of evangelizing the people which occupy this soil, once so sacred and still so venerated. The older contributors to the American Board can never lose their interest in this work, which was started and carried on for so many years under the supervision of that organization. The names of Dr. Thomson, Dr. Eli Smith, and Dr. Van Dyck are household words in New England. During those early years of struggle these shores, about which linger so many memories of sacred story, were consecrated by the life-work of many successors to the apostles, who left their bones in Syrian soil, and whose works do follow them. Hence it was that when, in 1870, these domains were handed generously over to the Presbyterian Board, as the dowry, at the nuptials of the Presbyterians of the old and the new schools, there was a pang in the heart of the Puritan mother which she scorned to reveal, but which convinces itself by the loving interest with which she follows the work of her successors.

The field of the Presbyterian mission covers the very northern portion of the territory promised to the children of Israel, but never actually occupied by them. It has been the privilege of the American Christians to take up the work where the soldiers of Joshua left off, and to attempt to bring the whole land under the sway of Him of whom Moses prophesied. This new territory has been divided into five sections, not unlike the allotments to the twelve tribes ; these are : Beirut, Sidon, Abieh, Zahleh, and Tripoli. From these five stations the laborers come once a year in general council to Beirut, the headquarters, to look over the work of the year, to plan for the future, and to receive mutual encouragement. This important meeting occurs about the middle of December. The session for 1885 has just closed, and the statements of the superficial results of the year's work are at hand.

From the first, peculiar difficulties have been encountered in this field. The American Board in its missions in Northern Turkey has had its successes mainly with the Armenians, a nationality which has a good deal of character. The Syrians are on a lower plain. Dense ignorance and a conservative pride are minor evils. Fierce religious bigotry is universal. In this limited territory are found Maronites, Greeks, Druzes, Moslems, Roman Catholics, holding their own in a bitter struggle. The massacres in 1860 show the animus of much of the religious feeling. Jerusalem is the centre of the fiercest strife. A leading man in the native Protestant Church in Jerusalem said, a short time ago, that he did not know a member of his church in the city who was not in some way getting his support out of the mission. And this after more than a half century of untiring labor and the outlay of an immense treasure !

Taking all things into consideration—past, present, and future—there is probably not a mission field in the world where, in the long run, it is going to be harder, considering things from the human standpoint, to evangelize the masses. The Maronites are under the care of the Pope, whose agents have seen to it that little or no Protestant work has been started in their section. The Druzes are equally barricaded against any inroad into their territories. The Moslems have thus far held their own, and the converts from Islam can be all counted on the fingers of one hand. France is looking with expectant eyes upon Syria, and is using every influence to keep and increase her hold upon its peoples. Although she has driven the Jesuits from her own soil, she uses them as her tool wherever she can. They are in force in Syria. American missionaries are looked upon as emissaries of England, and hence are counted enemies to French influence. The Greek churches are under Russian protection, and look forward to Russian dominion in this land. Russia dislikes American missions for the same reason that France does.

But far more damaging than the enmity of the Vatican, or of France, or of Russia, or even of local sects, is the growing hostility of the Turkish Empire. As the breaking up of this vast conglomerate rule has become more imminent, a shudder has gone through the Mohammedan world. It is clearly seen that the ascendancy of Islam is dependent upon the life of the empire. Hence it is that the order has gone forth, and every votary of the Prophet is alert. Christian schools have been closed, churches in process of erection have been stopped, and every kind of obstruction has been thrown in the way of all the Christian sects. The missionaries of Syria say that they have never encountered so much opposition from the Turkish Government as during the past year. They look upon the affairs of the mission as being in a critical state, and are preparing themselves for whatever the future has in store for them.

THE DISCOURSE.

[Then may be read the following, or any other short discourse. The reader may enlarge upon any sentence, or introduce other matter. The paragraph divisions and italics will assist.]

Text : "Wait on the Lord ; be of good courage" (Ps. 27 : 14).

When in trouble we wait on those who can help us. The patient waits on his physician, the client on his lawyer, the subordinate on his superior, the needy on his rich and bounteous friend.

At all times the soul is beset by spiritual foes. If it looks only at these it will become discouraged. It must wait on its Great Deliverer.

Are you tempted to lose courage ? Wait on the Lord.

Wait on Him with a plain statement of your case. The very attempt to put a statement of our trouble into words often makes it cease to be a trouble.

Our troubles are real or imaginary. If we make a statement to God it will be deliberately formed on the basis of real truth.

Reducing our own notion of our case to words will make an imaginary trouble appear so ridiculous that we dare not repeat it to God.

And then it will cease to have power over us.

But if it be real, an explicit statement will show ourselves what our trouble, in point of fact, is, and we shall not make vague prayers, nor seek the inappropriate medicine, nor put the plaster where there is no sore.

Then wait patiently : let the Lord answer when He will and how He will. He is eternal, and we immortal. There is no hurry.

Wait trustingly, being quite sure that He will attend to your case just as He should.

Wait obediently : do not suspend duty until the Lord answer you. You have given that case to Him. Take up the next, and the next, and the next.

Be of good courage. You have a right to. You have called for reinforcements. The Lord has the reserves of the Universe. It is His work. He knows what to send, and where, and when.

Only those have a right to be courageous who are servants of the Omnipotent, waiting on the Lord.

CLOSING PRAYER.

Almighty God, who hast given us grace at this time with one accord to make our common supplications unto Thee ; and dost promise that when two or three are gathered together in Thy name Thou wilt grant their requests ; fulfil, now, O Lord, the desires and petitions of Thy Servants, as may be most expedient for them ; granting us in this world knowledge of Thy truth, and in the world to come life everlasting. Amen.

[The Lord's Prayer should be used somewhere in each service, and the service may be closed with the "Gloria" or other Doxology.]

AFTERNOON TALK.

TELL IT OUT.

By Joseph Parker, D.D.

"I will praise the Lord according to His righteousness, and will sing praise to the name of the Lord Most High" (Ps. 7 : 17).

The Psalm comes in with a tone of sorrow and loneliness, but it goes out with cymbals and dances, and songs and utterances of triumph. We thought in the earlier part of the Psalm David had never sung in his life, or, if he had, he certainly would never sing again. He seems to write himself out of his misery, as men now pray themselves out of their trouble. When the prayer begins the listener says : "How heavily loaded is that heart with sorrow ! Surely that life is distressed beyond all possibility of recovery ! Oh, how sad and mournful and pensive the utterance of that heart !" And lo ! the man talks over his case with God, goes into critical detail about it, mentions everything he can recollect ; and the tone subtly changes all the while, and behold, at the last, the man is singing ; the prayer has blossomed into a song, and he who began with supplication ended with praise.

So it may be in our life : there is room enough, enemies enough there are, no doubt, and difficulties apparently innumerable and insurmountable. Never under-estimate these difficulties. You cannot lecture a man out of sorrow. Encourage him rather to go over his sorrow, to mention it syllable by syllable, letter by letter ; and, when he has continued the story a long time, ask him if he cannot recollect something more, even more deeply distressing in its nature. Encourage him to tell all that is in his heart. Be good listeners. It soothes poor misery hearkening to her tale. Ask her to tell it over again ; ask her if she is quite sure that you heard the statement correctly ; and by this sympathetic cross-examination, by this companionship of soul, you will extract the sorrow, and the heart, without any exhortation from the listener, will begin to recover itself, to take down its harp from the willows ; and you, who entered into a house of mourning, shall find yourself presently at a wedding feast, swinging round in infinite delight in the sacred dance before the Lord, because the rain is over and gone, and the time of the singing of birds has come.

[An appropriate poem is added, which may be committed to memory by the young people.]

PRAYER.

BE not afraid to pray—to pray is right.

Pray if thou canst, with hope,

Though hope be weak, or sick with long delay ;

Pray in the darkness if there be no light.

Far is the time, remote from human sight,

When war and discord on the earth shall cease ;

Yet every prayer for universal peace

Avails the blessed time to expedite.

Whate'er is good to wish, ask that of Heaven,

Though it be what thou canst not hope or see ;

Pray to be perfect, though material Heaven

Forbid the spirit so on earth to be ;

But if for any wish thou darest not pray,

Then pray to God to cast that wish away.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Secretary of the Treasury Reports that the Morrison tariff bill will, if passed, effect a reduction of the revenue to the amount of twelve millions, and not twenty millions, as at first stated. This is due to the proviso that the sugar duties are not to be reduced in cases where the countries from which the sugar comes impose an export tax. Nearly three fourths of the sugar imported comes from Cuba and Porto Rico, both of which collect export duties. One benefit to be gained from the bill has been brought out by the discussion it has caused. It is that admitting rough lumber free of duty. The country is already suffering in climate from the wholesale felling of its forests. If foreign lumber is admitted free that denudation of the uplands may be checked. The chief of the Bureau of Statistics, whose computations form the basis of Mr. Manning's statement, says that the effect which this bill will have upon the volume of imports is a matter of speculation and conjecture, but that the general effect of reduction in duty is, of course, to increase importation. There are, however, so many elements in the problem that it would be hazardous to venture an opinion on the subject.

The Pan-Electric Scandal is to be Investigated by a Committee of the House. A resolution was passed on Friday by that body appointing a committee of nine members to make inquiry into any expenditure on the part of the Government incurred relative to the rights of the Bell and Pan-Electric Telephone Companies to the priority of patents, the inquiry to include all organizations and companies that have sprung out of the Pan-Electric Telephone Company, or for any other purpose, and also to make full inquiry into the issuance of Pan-Electric Telephone stock, to any person or persons connected with either the legislative, judicial, or executive departments of the Government, to whom, when, where, and for what consideration in money or influence the stock was delivered. Also the committee is directed to ascertain what opinions, decisions, and orders have been made by any officer connected with the Government. The committee is given the right to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and make such inquiries as are deemed necessary. As will be seen, the resolution covers the whole ground, and it may be hoped for the sake of the honor of the Government and the country that its work will be thorough and impartial.

Democrats Appointed to Office by the President are complaining of his action in refusing the papers demanded by the Senate. Their nominations are threatened with rejection not on their merits, but because of the deadlock. The difficulty as formulated last week resolved itself into three heads. The Senate demands to know what charges are made against officials "suspended for cause," decides to reject nominations in cases where papers have been refused and to reject nominations of officials where a civilian or ex-Confederate is nominated to succeed a Union soldier. In the debate that is coming on these points, the consideration of the "Tenure of Office" law will occupy an important place. Mr. Hoar advocates its repeal, but as he signed the Edmunds' resolutions, it will be difficult for him to explain how he can consistently support plans apparently antagonistic.

Local Option for Washington is Suggested by Senator Colquitt, who knows how it works in Georgia. He has prepared a bill which he will introduce in the Senate "to establish local option in the District of Columbia. The bill provides in detail for a vote by the people upon the question, and is extremely rigorous. Under its provisions no intoxicating liquors can be manufactured within the limits of the District of Columbia or imported into it, and if it becomes a law no wines can be used at the State dinners of the President. Senators Blair, of New Hampshire, and Hoar, of Massachusetts, are quoted as saying that they will favor it." There are thirteen hundred saloons in Washington, a fact which shows that there is need for temperance work there.

A Violent Hurricane Visited New York on Friday last, doing considerable damage. It commenced at seven o'clock in the morning, when it was blowing from the north-west at the rate of forty-eight miles an hour, and by four in the afternoon it had increased to eighty-four miles, which is twelve miles above the highest record in the city. Previous to that night the highest ever registered was March 28th, 1876, which was seventy-two miles. Several high chimneys were overturned, the cornices were torn from high buildings, and some of them were unroofed. A wagon was blown over in the street, and several people were injured by being blown against telegraph-posts and the pillars of the elevated railroad. The wind blew lengthwise of the Brooklyn Bridge, and made strange music among the steel ropes, like a gigantic Æolian harp. Passengers in the bridge cars did not feel in that state of serene security which they usually do. There was a swaying and trembling motion to the great structure which, though not great under the circumstances, was enough to make nervous people uneasy. The telegraph-poles and wires suffered seriously, and for a time the city was almost cut off from telegraphic communication.

The Funeral Services of the Late Mr. John B. Gough took place at his residence, Hillside, near Worcester, Mass., on Thursday last. The services were in charge of Anthony J. Comstock, of New York, and were of an exceedingly simple and impressive character. The body, clad in a suit of black broadcloth, lay in a coffin which rested upon the writing-table in the library, and was open from head to foot. At its head was placed the heavy library chair in which Mr. Gough used to sit when at work. This was covered with flowers. At the foot of the coffin was a sheaf of wheat, with a sickle in roses and violets. Near by was a floral pillow bearing the word "Boylston," the gift of neighbors and friends, and a floral wreath, ordered by telegraph by the Young Men's Christian Association of San Francisco. These were all the floral offerings. The family, including the wife, sister, brother, and four nieces of Mr. Gough, were seated in the library. The other mourners, about a hundred in number, occupied the double parlors and the dining-room, while the hall was given up to the officiating clergyman and the choir. Dr. A. J. Gordon, of Boston; Rev. Israel Ainsworth, of Boylston; Dr. D. O. Mears, pastor of Piedmont Church; Rev. W. A. Houghton, of Berlin, Mass.; and Dr. William M. Taylor, of the Broadway Tabernacle, New York, took part in the services. The Rev. Dr. George H. Gould, a personal friend, spoke in a voice choked by emotion. He said that he appeared only in obedience to the behest of the stricken family. Dr. Gould spoke touchingly of that scene in Piedmont Church last year on the occasion of the reception to William Noble, the English temperance orator, when Gough introduced his collaborer, and, with inspired action and language, took the mantle off his own shoulders, and placed it upon those of his younger brother, giving it him strictly in charge to stand firm and give no quarter in the battle against the demon intemperance. The body was taken to the receiving tomb, and will remain there until the vault in Hope Cemetery, New Worcester, is ready for its reception.

Sectional Animosity in Ireland Has Been Increased by a tour taken in the north-eastern districts of the country last week by Lord Randolph Churchill. He appeared first at Belfast on Monday, February 22d, when the Orangemen assembled in large numbers to greet the descendant of the famous Marlborough. He exhorted them to organize and fit themselves for the struggle for the maintenance of the union, which was only beginning now, but which he predicted would assume grave proportions. He said: "The Gladstone-Morley policy is a repeal of the legislative union. The Tory party is determined to offer a bitter resistance to anything in the nature of such a policy, and will do it with the sympathy of many persons of position in the Liberal ranks. It is essential, however, that England shall know to what extent we can get the support of the Irish loyalists, and the powers of resistance they can offer." The reply came hoarse and loud, "To the death!" The struggle is becoming increasingly bitter, and the subject more difficult to deal with. In the present temper of the people there is peril of civil war.

The Distress Among English Operatives Continues. One correspondent states that in London it is now near the famine point, and there is growing indignation at the revelations of the workings of the relief fund in the hands of the Lord Mayor, which is now over $300,000, and yet most of the poor who apply to him are repulsed, and none are found who have received more than seventy-five cents out of it. On Friday a starving man broke one of the Lord Mayor's windows, and avowed his desire to go to prison, where he would be fed. The correspondent adds: "Although this state of affairs gives the Continental anarchists so much hope that Prince Kraptokine is going to London to live, it is not likely that socialism will make much headway. It is more probable that the feelings of revolt engendered will find expression in an increased support of extreme Radicals like Mr. Bradlaugh, who on Friday began his long-promised attack upon the pensions still enjoyed by the descendants of Charles II.'s progeny."

The Russian Nihilists are Adopting a New line of policy, having been led to believe that the destructive tactics have done sufficient preparatory work. Mr. William H. Hurlbert, formerly editor of the New York World, who is now in London, cables to the Sun an account of an interesting interview on the subject which he recently had with Stepniak, the famous author of "Underground Russia." He says: "Stepniak assures me that the people's movement in Russia is assuming wider proportions than heretofore. The methods of its propaganda are more moderate, but this only gives it a more formidable character and meaning. The epoch of blind, wild, destructive Nihilism, says Stepniak, is ended. Russian intelligence and enlightenment are concentrating into a new organization, aiming systematically, through political methods, at the overthrow of the dynasty of the Czars, and the establishment in its place of a great federal Russian republic."

Mr. William Noble's Departure for New Zealand and Australia has been delayed by the lamented death of his friend, Mr. Gough, between whom and himself there has been for many years an intimacy founded on mutual esteem of the warmest kind. On Sunday, February 21st, Mr. Noble addressed the Gough Memorial meeting in Philadelphia, and spoke at a Gospel Temperance meeting, and on Sunday last he addressed a meeting at Girard College. He left the East for San Francisco on Monday last, whence he expects to sail for New Zealand on Saturday.

At the State Convention of Young Men's Christian Associations of New York, held at Elmira, it was mentioned that a corps of the White Cross Army for the promotion of personal purity among young men was organized about one year ago, and now numbers five hundred and sixty-seven young men, the object of which is to seek to influence young men of their acquaintance to treat all women with respect, to put down, as far as they may be able, indecent language and coarse jests, to maintain the law of purity as equally binding upon men and women, and to endeavor to fulfil the command, "Keep thyself pure." Those who are brought into very close contact with young men can appreciate in some measure the urgent need of special efforts in this direction by a special agency such as the association has wisely created.

A Call to a Prayer Convention Has Been issued by the Presbytery of Cincinnati. It invites the ministry and the Christian people of the Presbyterian churches in southern Ohio and southern Indiana, and in Kentucky, to come together in the First Presbyterian Church, Cincinnati, on Tuesday evening, March 16th, to spend that evening and the following two days and evenings together in prayer and conference, and in waiting upon God for His blessing. The call declares that "the deep undertone of religious feeling in many of our churches, the already greatly increased activity of many of our members, the spirit of unwonted harmony and co-operation manifested between our own churches and the several branches of the Christian family, and the almost universal expectancy and desire for something better than we have yet obtained, seem to indicate that we are on the eve of great and important events." It may be supposed that members of other churches beside the Presbyterian will be admitted, though they are not included in the invitation.

The Public Recantation of a Well-Known Infidel was read from a Maine pulpit on February 14th. He is an aged man, who has always gloried in being called an infidel. Having been enlightened by the Holy Spirit, he caused to be read in the Methodist pulpit in Pembroke a declaration signed by him, in which he said: "I desire now to counteract the evil that I may have caused. I believe for a person to live and die happy they must believe in the Lord Jesus Christ as recorded in the Scriptures."

The Engineer of the Train which Escaped from the burning bridge, as recently mentioned in these columns, spoke in the Noonday Prayer-Meeting in the John Street church, New York, last week. Rising from a front seat, and turning to the congregation, he said: "Were any of you ever in an accident on a railroad? If not, then you cannot appreciate the situation I was in when I was on the cab of the train which was caught on the burning bridge at Matawan on the New York and Long Branch Railroad a few weeks ago. Looking behind, I saw that the bridge was on fire. For an instant I was paralyzed. Then an inspiration came to me. I believe it was from God. I pulled the throttle wide open. The train was pulled across the bridge, and no one was hurt, though the trucks of the last car, in bumping along the ties, were dragged off, and the car was fairly on its flooring before it was out of danger. I have been a Christian for nearly two years. It was my nearness to death in a railroad accident that made me realize that in the midst of life we are in death."

A Testator's Novel Injunction Appears in a will filed in the Probate Court of New York last week. After disposing of his property the testator, who wrote the will with his own hand, adds this clause: "I wish it to be distinctly understood that my body shall be changed into ashes by means of cremation, and this shall be done without any ceremony whatever, and in the simplest and least expensive way; the ashes to be sprinkled around a tree or in a garden spot where either the rains may mix my remains with the soil, or the winds may dispose of them otherwise." It may be hoped that the testator did not feel the same indifference about the destination of his soul as he did about the disposal of his ashes. The winds might scatter them without injury to him, but unconcern about the safety of the soul involves eternal and inconceivable disaster (Matt. 16: 26).

The Flagman at a Railroad Crossing is blamed by the survivor of two men for an accident which took place at Newburg, N. Y., on February 22d. The two men were in a wagon, which arrived at the crossing just before a switch-engine came along. The engine struck the wagon, overturned it, and injured one of the men fatally. The flagman asserts that he was unable to close the gate, as he usually did, because it was frozen fast, and he could not move it, but he signalled the men in the wagon with his flag that it was dangerous to cross. The man who escaped contradicts the assertion, and says they would not have attempted to cross had the flagman signalled to them. Whether the flagman did or did not neglect his duty, it will be difficult to determine; but it appears certain that if he waved his flag the men did not see it. Men do not often neglect warnings which caution them against physical danger, though they sit unmoved while God's faithful watchmen tell them of inevitable disaster to their souls (Ezek. 33: 9).

A Bell Attached to an Eagle's Neck Has caused it almost to die of starvation. A dispatch from a New England town says that an eagle, with a sleigh-bell tied around his neck, was recently captured there. It was at first thought that as he was extremely thin he must be an aged bird; but when food was placed before him he attacked it voraciously, as he would not have been likely to do had he been suffering from age alone. Inasmuch as he fattened up in the course of a few days, and became an alert and agile bird, it is thought that his ailment was starvation, and that his inability to obtain food was due to the sleigh-bell, which gave warning to his contemplated prey of his approach, and enabled it to make its escape in time from its enemy. The warning bell must have attracted the threatened creature's attention, and the instinct of self-preservation did the rest. It is a pity that the same instinct is not used by those whom Satan would make his prey. While some are captured by insidious devices, the majority fall into his hands after the clearest warning, and in places such as the saloon and the theatre, where, as they are aware, he has captured many others (Prov. 4: 13-15).

A Vitriol-Throwing Woman was Injured in New York last week. On Thursday, February 25th, a woman who is separated from her husband went to his lawyer's office, and asked the lawyer to send for her husband, as she would like to consult with him about her future. The lawyer did so, and in a short time the husband arrived. As he stepped from the elevator his wife met him, and they conversed for a short time. Then she asked him to live with her again, but he refused on the ground that they had not been able to live together without quarrelling. On hearing his refusal the woman took a tin case from her pocket. The husband saw her draw her hand backward, as if about to throw something at him. He stepped forward, and dexterously caught her hand with both of his. The momentum of her hand caused some of the liquid that was in the case to be spilled. Some of it poured over his hands, and more of it flew upward, and was spattered over her face about the eyes. The next moment he was wringing his hands, and the wife had her clothes clapped to her face, jumping about and howling with pain. The contents of the case were sulphuric acid. The husband ran out and called a cab, and he and his wife were taken to a hospital to have their wounds dressed. The husband was able to go to his work, but the wife's injuries were so serious that she had to remain at the hospital, and the surgeons say she will be disfigured for life. This is a remarkable instance of attempted crime working its own retribution. Such cases are rare, but in all cases sin injures the soul of the sinner himself more than any one else, though he may not be conscious of it in this life (Prov. 8: 36).

A Small Reward for Saving a Life was Bestowed on a Connecticut man last week. A farmer who resides near Wallingford, Conn., was walking around his farm on February 22d, when, the path being very slippery, he fell and rolled into a deep ditch. The place was not dangerous ordinarily, but the heavy floods this spring have filled it with water, and as the mud and weeds are apt to hold firmly, the farmer was in a critical situation. He could not get out, and, as the tide rose, the water reached his neck. All the time he shouted lustily for assistance. At last a man who was passing near heard his cries, and at some risk to himself and no little exertion succeeded in getting the farmer out, and assisted him to his home. He had saved the farmer's life, and the latter proved the extent of his gratitude by presenting his rescuer with a dime. How much the farmer's life was really worth is a matter for conjecture. Perhaps the township might rightly consider a dime fair compensation for the service rendered, but the man himself must surely have appreciated it at a higher rate. He could not have considered its value when fixing the reward. Many Christian men act on the same principle when asked to contribute for the propagation of the Gospel, which has been the means of saving their own souls. They forget what is the worth of their soul (Philemon 19).

A Clergyman's Poisonous Study and Bedroom have involved him in a serious illness. The Springfield Republican states that an eminent clergyman in that city has been suffering for some weeks from the recognized symptoms of arsenical poisoning—extreme lassitude, loss of appetite, insomnia, and a swelling of the hands and feet. A week or more ago he suspected the wall-paper in his study and bedroom, and under the advice of a friend samples of the paper were sent to the university laboratory at Cambridge for chemical analysis, with the result that the library paper was found to contain half a grain of arsenic to every square yard, and the bedroom paper nearly the same quantity. Last week he came to New York to get medical advice. He applied to a skilful physician, who, upon examination, said he was suffering from anæmia, very probably caused by arsenical poisoning, and that it was not safe to occupy the rooms containing the paper referred to. It is remarkable that the wall-papers which contain arsenic are largely of a green color, the hue which it is most pleasant for the eye to dwell upon. Pleasant though it is, the clergyman will doubtless have it stripped off the walls rather than submit to its injurious influence. That is what it is sometimes our duty to do with our moral surroundings. Things that are pleasant have to be surrendered if they are baneful to spiritual health or diminish our usefulness (1 Cor. 9: 27).

THE PROBLEM OF THE AGE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And his disciples answered him, From whence can a man satisfy these men with bread here in the wilderness?"—MARK 8:4.

The Perishing People—Their Claim on the Church—When Christ Can Work—I. A Very Pressing Problem—Souls in Present Need—In Peril as to the Future—Responsibility of Disciples—II. A Difficult Problem—The Vast Number—The Desert Place—The Irreligious Tendency of the Times—The Possibilities of a Man—The Imperfections of the Perfect—III. A Solved Problem—The Man Unknown—The Materials—A Grandfather's Question.

I HAVE been for a while lying outside the crowd, unable either to feed the multitude or to bring the sick to the Master. Here and there one I have helped, as opportunity has occurred; but I have been called to rest rather than to serve. Yet all the while I have never ceased from constant thought about the perishing multitudes. This great city and its sad estate, this country, and Ireland, and Continental nations, are all under a cloud of deep depression. One can remove his body from the turmoil, but his heart is in it still.

THE CALL TO WORK.

If ever there was a time when there was a call for the deep sympathy of all Christian people with the perishing multitudes it is just now; if ever the Church should gird herself to do her Master's service it is to-day. Never forget that the Church is the helpmeet of Christ. She is His chosen Bride, and she is, therefore, to unite with Him in His great enterprise among the sons of men—the work of salvation; and that work is to be wrought by means of divine truth, carried to men externally by human hands, and internally through the Spirit of God. The Church will be false to her heavenly Bridegroom if she does not sympathize with the tenderness His heart, and enter into His gracious labor of love.

The question before us is certainly singular, if we remember that those who asked it had seen a former miracle of feeding the multitude. It would seem that those who had seen five thousand fed would not ask concerning the feeding of four thousand, "From whence can a man satisfy these men with bread here in the wilderness?" Inasmuch as on one memorable occasion they had seen the Master multiply loaves and fishes, they might have expected him to do the like again. I grant you to the full that it was an inexcusable question. I will not offer the slightest apology for it; but yet it is a very natural question—natural, I mean, to that fallen and depraved human nature which is our daily grief.

Alas, we may here see ourselves as in a mirror. Those who have a smooth path often boast of a vast amount of faith, or what they think to be faith; but those who follow a wilderness way must often confess to their shame that after receiving great mercy they still find unbelief creeping in. All this makes us fear that had we been with our Lord in the desert we should not have behaved better than Peter and James and John; we, too, might have forgotten the former miracle of the loaves, and have anxiously inquired, "From whence can a man satisfy these men with bread here in the wilderness?"

PREPARATION.

The question, although it is thus surprising and inexcusable, may, however, be used this morning for our profit. It may at least do this good: as we shall not be able to answer it on any human lines, it will show us our inability, and that is what our Lord would make most clear before His power is revealed. I should not wonder but what He drew those people into the desert on purpose that there might be no suspicion that when they were fed they had been supplied from fields or gardens, or by the charity of inhabitants. It was a barren pot, out of which nothing could be got. The disciples had to feel this, and recognize this, and state this, and then the Lord had a clear platform for working His miracle. He wants to clear you out brother; He wants to make you see what a weak, poor, petty, miserable thing you are, and when He has brought you to that, then His own arm shall be revealed in the eyes of all the people, and all who behold it shall give to Him the glory due unto His name. Let us come, then, to our question, with the hope that it may be sanctified to holy ends.

I. First, then, it is

A VERY PRESSING PROBLEM.

What is to be done for the perishing multitude? What is to be done to satisfy men's souls? I confine the question to spiritual matters at this time, though I by no means slight the dreadful social and material questions which are also specially urgent at this hour. At this present moment myriads of souls are in present need. We sometimes think too exclusively of salvation as having reference to the world to come; but it has an urgent, all-important reference to this present state. A man who does not know Christ is a wretched man; a man who has never been renewed in heart, who lives in sin and loves it, is a pitiable being, a lost soul over whom angels might weep. If there were no heaven to miss, and no hell to merit, sin is a curse upon this life. It is hell to live without a Saviour. If there were no poverty in London, it would be quite enough to break one's heart to think that there is sin in it reigning over the ungodly.

The multitudes are also in awful peril as to the future. When our Saviour looked with compassion on the multitude He not only noticed their present hunger, but He foresaw what would come of it. "If I send them away fasting to their own houses they will faint by the way: for divers of them came from far." This our tender Lord could not bear to think of. Thus, when we look into the future of a soul, we start back aghast from the vision. In these times, my brethren, many attempts have been made to represent the condition of impenitent sinners in the world to come as less dreadful than the plain Scripture declares it to be. I cannot see what practical result can arise out of such teaching, except it be the hardening of men's hearts, and placing them more at ease than they are now in their indifference with regard to their fellowmen. I know that at this hour a master argument with my heart in seeking to save my fellowmen is the intolerable thought that, if they die without a Saviour, they enter upon a fixed state, in which they will continue in sin and in consequent misery, without hope of change. I am anxious to save men from hell at once, because I see no other day of hope for them.

CHRISTIAN RESPONSIBILITY.

The case of the multitude is laid upon the Church of God. The Lord Jesus Christ took up all the hungry thousands, and laid them at the feet of His disciples. These were His own words, as He commissioned them, "Give ye them to eat." It was a great honor to them to be taken into co-partnership with their Lord—a high privilege to be workers together with Him in relieving this far-spread hunger. It was a great honor, but what a responsibility it involved! They had the special happiness of handing out the bread to the vast host, who gratefully received the boon. The twelve were very popular men that day, I warrant you; and they were looked upon with great envy by all who surrounded them. Was it not a high privilege to distribute food amongst so many hungry men, and women, and children? Returning to the spiritual aspect of the matter: the Lord has called His Church in these days to this work, onerous and indeed impossible without Himself, but with Him honorable, simple, and easily to be accomplished. He calls His Church to the great task of feeding the multitudes of London, the multitudes of our empire, the multitudes throughout the whole world; and since He is present to multiply our loaves and fishes the pressing problem may not be abandoned in despair.

Brethren, we cannot put aside this work; we that are Christians indeed cannot escape from this service. The Master has laid it upon us, and the only way to get out of it is by renouncing his leadership altogether. To attempt to be a Christian and not to live for your fellowmen is hypocrisy; to suppose that you can be faithful to Christ and let these multitudes die without an effort is a damnable delusion. He is a traitor to his Master who does not enter heart and soul into the great life-work of that Master, and his life-work was "that the world through Him might be saved" (John 3:17). If you will say good-bye to Jesus you may run away with your own loaf and your own little fish, and eat them in secret selfishness; but if you mean to be with Christ you must bring hither your loaf and your fish and contribute it; you must bring yourself, and be the personal dispenser of the multiplied bread and fish; and you must persevere in the distribution till the last man, the last woman, the last child shall be filled.

So you see where we are this very morning. We are called to work out a very pressing problem: "Whence can a man satisfy these men with bread here in the wilderness?"

II. But now, secondly, it is a problem of TREMENDOUS DIFFICULTY.

The difficulty of feeding the four thousand was enormous; but the difficulty of saving the multitudes of the human race is as high above it as the heaven is high above the earth. After all, this miracle only gave a single meal to a few thousands, who soon grew hungry again; the work needed is to feed myriads so that they shall not hunger again forever. Think of this!

For, first, what a thing it is to satisfy the needs of a single soul! I should like those who think the salvation of souls from sin to be easy to try to convert one person. Sunday-school teacher, did you ever attempt to bring one girl to Christ yourself? She shall be one of the sweetest children in the whole school; but if you have attempted her conversion without seeking divine aid in prayer, and without looking to the Spirit of God to influence that little heart for good, you have made a miserable failure of it. If you had to save a soul where would you begin? The introduction of a holy thought into carnal minds is a miracle as great as to get a beam of light into a blind eye, or a breath of life into a dead body. How hard it is to deliver a man from brutish carelessness, and make him think of his soul, and eternity, and God! As to renewing the stony heart, as to quickening the dead soul into life, who can do it? Here we enter into the region of miracles! Can you create a fly? When you have created the most minute creature, then talk about making a new heart and a right spirit.

A WIDE FIELD.

But, brothers and sisters, what am I talking about? One soul! What of that? Think of the numbers who need heavenly bread. We have not only one soul, not only one million of souls, but hard upon five millions of immortal beings in this single city. In this huge world what myriads have we? Well, then, where are we? We are altogether at sea. Why, we have not a notion of what a million is. It will take a very, very long time even to count that number. Think of this city of London—why, you shall ride through it, or you shall traverse it on weary foot for a year, and at the end you shall only wonder more at its incalculable vastness. The Church of God is called to feed all these with the bread of heaven, and all those out yonder in the heathen world. O feebleness! what canst thou do alone? There is the problem. Said I not truly that it is one of tremendous difficulty?

What seems to have struck the disciples was the place they were in—it was a desert place. I may be supposed, perhaps, to croak when I say that the present period is as bare of all help to the Gospel as that ground was barren of help to the feast. The world has never known a period less helpful to the Gospel than the present. The people are not so attentive to the Gospel as once they were: the masses do not care even to enter the house of prayer: in London they have, to a very large extent, ceased to care about the preaching of the Word. They are to be reached—blessed be God, they shall be reached; but is not toward religion, but toward unbelief, materialism, and sordid selfishness. A current, nay, a torrent of unbelief is roaring around the foundations of society, and our pulpits are reeling beneath its force. Many Christian people are only half believers now; they are almost smothered in the dense fog of doubt which is now around us. We have come into cloudland and cannot see our way. Many are sinking in the slough, and those of us who have our feet upon the Rock of Ages have our hands full with helping our slipping friends.

The sting of the question before us, however, I have not quite brought out: it was human feebleness. His disciples answered him: "From whence can a man satisfy these men with bread here in the wilderness?" From whence can a man do it? The possibilities of a man are stupendous. God with a man, nothing is impossible to that man. Give us not the power of gold, or rank, or eloquence, or wisdom, but give us a man.

Though we speak thus of what God can make of us, we are in and of ourselves poor creatures. We do meet with a perfect brother now and then, and I always feel inclined to break that bubble. The imperfections of the perfect are generally more glaring than those of ordinary believers. Alas! we are all such poor, frail creatures, that we are driven away from all confidence in ourselves, and we ask with emphasis the question, "From whence can a man satisfy these men with bread here in the wilderness?"

A SOLVED PROBLEM.

III. I am happy, therefore, to come to a blessed conclusion in the third head of our discourse, by saying that, laying the emphasis on its weakest word, "Whence can a man?" this question is capable of a very glorious answer. I might almost say, as John the Baptist did, "There standeth One among you whom ye know not." Though He has stood among us all these centuries, yet His people scarcely know him. Who knows Him fully? "Oh," saith one, "I know Christ." Yes, in a sense; but yet he passes knowledge. "I believe in God," saith one; are you sure you do? I remember reading of a certain minister who spent many days in wrestling prayer because he was tempted to doubt whether there was a God, and when he came into the full conviction of it he said to his people, "You will be surprised at what I say; but it is a far greater thing to believe in God than any of you know." And so it is a greater thing to believe in Jesus than most people dream. To believe in the notion of a God is one thing, but to believe God is quite another matter. One said to me when I was troubled, "Have you not a gracious God?" I answered, "Certainly I have." He replied, "What is the good of having Him, then, if you do not trust Him?" I was sore smitten by that reply, and felt humbled in spirit. We do not fully know what Jesus is. He is far above our highest thought of Him. He standeth among us, and we know Him not.

HE CAN FEED.

But what I want you to think of is, that this wonderful Man can feed this people with bread this day, and in this wilderness. I hope to make you believe it by the power of the Spirit of God. Therefore I ask you, first, to listen to what this Man says. I read to you just now this narrative as we find it in the fifteenth of Matthew. Turn again to the thirty-second verse: "Jesus called his disciples unto him, and said—" Stop a moment. Prepare your ears for music. He said, "I have compassion on the multitude." Oh, the sweetness of that word! When you are troubled about the people, troubled about Ireland, troubled about London, troubled about Africa, troubled about China, troubled about India, hear the echo of this word: "I have compassion on the multitude."

So I close by one more point, which is this: As I have made you hear our Lord's words, and also led you to remember the infinite resources at His disposal, I now want you to anticipate his working. How does the Christ work among men? How will he proceed when he gets fairly to work among the masses? There are varieties of operations, but there is a continuity of law running through them all, and the divine line of action is much the same in all cases.

THE WAY OF THE CHRIST

was, first of all, to find out what there was which he could use. The little store provided by His followers consisted of a few loaves and fishes. Is it not wonderful how the Lord sometimes finds out little matters which have been hidden away, and makes much of them? Scotland was once under the sway of unbelief and formalism; how was it to be delivered? Thomas Boston went into a shepherd's hut, and found a book which had become extremely scarce; it was Fisher's "Marrow of Modern Divinity." Boston rejoiced in the light of the Gospel which flashed in upon his soul, and he began to bear witness to it. A great controversy followed, and, what was far better, a great awakening: the lovers of the marrow of the Gospel soon broke the bones of error. See what one book may do. Sweden, too, was greatly blessed by the discovery in a country-house of an old copy of Luther on the Galatians. See how one voice may wake a nation.

Brethren, who knows what may come out of seven loaves and a few small fishes? Yea, the enemies may do what they like; they may preach what they please; they may take away one pulpit after another from the orthodox; they may bury us under the rubbish of evolution and false philosophy; but we shall rise again. These small clouds will soon blow over. There may not remain one single sound expounder of the Gospel, but as long as God lives the Gospel will not die. Its power may slumber, but ere long it shall awake out of sleep, and cry like a mighty man who shouteth by reason of wine. As long as we have one match left we can set the world on fire. As long as one Bible remains the empire of Satan is in danger.

The devil's work is never done: it is undone again in five minutes when the grace of God is at work. Even in our ashes live our wonted fires: a breath from heaven shall kindle them into a flame. God is never at a loss for agents. He could turn the Pope into an evangelist, a cardinal into a reformer, a priest into a preacher of the Gospel. The most superstitious, the most ignorant, the most infidel, the most blasphemous, the most degraded, may yet be made the champions of His truth. Therefore let no man's heart fail him; the bread shall be multiplied, and the people shall be fed.

THE GRANDFATHER'S QUESTION.

Dear friends, do not imagine that God will bless one preacher only, or one denomination only. He does bless some preachers more than others, for He is Sovereign; but He will bless you all in your work, for He is God. I shall never forget one day, when my dear old grandfather was alive, I was to preach a sermon. There was a great crowd of people, and I did not arrive, for the train was delayed; and therefore the venerable man commenced to preach in my stead. He was far on in his sermon when I made my appearance at the door. Looking to me, he said: "You have all come to hear my dear grandson, and therefore I will stop that you may hear him. He may preach the Gospel better than I can, but he cannot preach a better Gospel. Can you, Charles?" My answer from the aisle was: "I cannot preach the Gospel better; but, if I could, it would not be a better Gospel." So it is, brethren: others may break the bread to more people, but they cannot break better bread than the Gospel which you teach, for that is bread from our Saviour's own hand.

Get to work each one of you with your bread-breaking, for this is Christ's way of feeding the multitude. Let each one who has himself eaten divide his morsel with another. To-day fill some one's ear with the good news of Jesus and His love. Bring your barley loaf, bring your little fish, and put your provision into the common store. Take it back again from the great Master's hands filled with that blessing which makes it fruitful, and multiplies it, and then feed the multitude with it. So shall you go forth with joy, and be led forth with peace. So be it. Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

THE PEOPLE'S BIBLE.

'God knows how far He Himself is responsible for our circumstances, and up to that degree He is faithful. He will find a solution of all difficulties how tangled and obstinate soever. This is a case in point. The people had not taken themselves into the wilderness; God had taken them there, and He will see them out of it. So we say about honorable men when they undertake to lead us, and certain circumstances transpire which are of the nature of difficulty or hindrance. They say in the spirit of honor: 'We are accountable for this; our strength is yours until this battle is fought; you did not bring yourselves in here, and out of it we will see you, health permitting, life being spared.' So the Lord will not leave us in wildernesses into which He Himself has brought us. If we ourselves have gone into the desert without His permission or consent, we may be allowed to die there, to remain without a grave in the sand in which we vainly thought to find a heaven; but if we have obeyed the divine voice, and gone in the Providential way, whatever there is on the road—Marsh or place of sand, or great river, or greater sea—God will find a way through all. Wherefore comfort one another with these words."

The foregoing is an extract from the second volume of the People's Bible, by Dr. Joseph Parker, the first volume of which was noticed in these columns on February 4th. The extract given is a fair specimen of its style and of the author's power to draw practical lessons for every-day life from historical narrative. This second volume is occupied with the Book of Exodus, and the author gives the key to his idea of the book in his introduction, where he says: "There is in it the protoplasm of the whole action of God in the complete sphere of human history; in other words, I have not met with any phase of divine revelation or ministry which is not to be traced in at least a dawning outline in this second Book of Moses." Readers of this book, though they may be so familiar with the inspired volume and with this part of it as almost to know it by heart, will be surprised to find under Dr. Parker's guidance how much more may be learned from it than they ever supposed. The "Handfuls of Purpose" for ministers and Sunday-school teachers are in this volume, as in the first, a very valuable assistance. Pp. 328; price $1.50. Published by Funk & Wagnalls, New York.

OCEANA,

by James Anthony Froude, is the narrative of a journey that great man and brilliant writer recently undertook through the English Colonies south of the Equator. Mr. Froude has long been of the opinion that the English Government does not value the Colonies as it ought, and that it is pursuing toward them a policy which will alienate them as the United States were alienated more than a century ago. He took the journey to see for himself the state of feeling in the Colonies, to find out by actual observation what the Colonies needed, and how they might be more firmly attached to the mother country. This volume is a record of his journey, and contains the inferences he drew from what he saw. Mr. Froude does not hesitate to tell his countrymen some home truths about the folly of their Government, and our Canadian friends will be pleased to see how clearly he has seen the mistakes England is making in neglecting the interests of a noble and loyal people; for England is as negligent of Canadian interests as she is of Oceana, and a reform affecting Oceana would surely help Canada too.

Gen. Gordon Reading to the Incurables in Gravesend Hospital.

Among the facts of general interest in the volume, of which there are many, Mr. Froude tells us of "a bishop who lately arrived in one of these colonies, that he was requested during a drought to issue a circular prayer for rain. He replied that an average sufficiency of rain fell every year, and that he declined to petition God to work a miracle until the colonists had done all that lay in themselves to preserve it by constructing reservoirs."

In the course of his journey Mr. Froude had for a time a missionary as a travelling companion. The missionary was not a great man intellectually, but Mr. Froude compares him, much to his advantage, with another passenger on the same ship who had become very rich by trade, and whose "theory of existence evidently was that in such a world as this the only wisdom was to get as much enjoyment out of it as could possibly be had. All else was illusion. He was excellent company; intellectually, the best that we had—a cleverer man beyond all comparison than my poor missionary; but a belief in something—some object outside one's self, brings a grace into the character that is not to be had without it." Like all Mr. Froude's writings, this volume is full of thought, and is intensely interesting. Pp. 396; price $2.50. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons.

A LETTER FROM MRS. BAXTER.

As we mentioned in our issue of February 11th, Mrs. M. Baxter left for England sooner than she expected, owing to a cablegram that the Rev. W. E. Boardman, of Bethshan, London, had been stricken with paralysis. Mrs. Baxter was therefore unable to be present at the Boston Convention. She sends the following communication from Queenstown:

"To my Correspondents in America and Canada who have sent Requests for Prayer or asked Counsel:

"DEAR FRIENDS: During my journeys, eight thousand miles in all, on your side the Atlantic, and while taking part in meetings several times each day, while at the same time continuing my writings, you will readily understand it has been impossible to answer your letters. But let me assure you that every case which you have placed before me has been faithfully placed in the hands of God.

"Some communications which I have received have led me to fear that some who have written asking prayer have looked rather to the prayer than to the God who answers prayer. There is no more virtue in the prayers of Dr. Cullis, Mr. Simpson, Miss Judd, or in mine, than in your own. God's promise is to our faith—'He that believeth hath.' 'What things soever ye desire, when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them' (Mark 11:24).

"God is as real in your own houses as He is in a meeting where many of His people are gathered. Elijah alone on Mount Carmel prayed to God about half a minute, and fire came down from heaven because Elijah counted on his God. The prophets of Baal, eight hundred and fifty in number, made a great aggregate of prayer, six hours long, but while their God was powerless the prayer did nothing. Look, beloved friends, to God alone; build on what He can, and what He wills, and what He promises to do for you, and do not build on some fallible human creature, so dealing with God second-hand. With deepest joy have I joined you in presenting you to the Lord; according to our united faith it will be unto you.

"Yours affectionately in Christ,
"L. BAXTER."

GENERAL GORDON IN THE HOSPITAL.

THE Christian hero, whose life was sacrificed last year in Khartoum, was a man whose piety was of an eminently practical type. The picture given herewith shows him in an occupation to which he gave much of his leisure time, and in which he put all his heart. When he returned from China, after suppressing the Taeping rebellion, he accepted the appointment of Commanding Royal Engineer at Gravesend, and settled there in 1865. He remained at that post six years, superintending the erection of fortifications and government works.

Those six years were years of unrelenting activity. His service to the Government was faithfully rendered. There was never any reason to complain of General Gordon's neglect of any duty he undertook. But when his duty for the day was performed, he had still several hours at his own disposal. A man so distinguished, and with so varied an experience in strange countries, was a welcome guest at a hundred tables; but General Gordon declined all invitations. Neither did he give his time to the study of art or science or to innocent amusements. His delight was to serve his divine Master, and to that service he consecrated his labor, time, and money.

He was one among the very few Christians whose ideal of the Christian life is not limited by attending meetings and preaching. He could not forget that people have bodies as well as souls, and that neither should be neglected. He had classes at his own home for ignorant boys, whom he helped to gain knowledge that fitted them for earning an honorable livelihood, instead of fulfilling their apparent destiny of swelling the ranks of the criminal population. The large garden surrounding his official residence was full of vegetables and fruits, but when a visitor complimented him on his crop he said it was not his. It turned out that he had handed the garden over to some poor families, who tilled it, and used or sold its products. The hospitals were his especial care. Many a poor sufferer, many a despairing incurable, has had the dreary monotony of the day lightened by a visit from the Christian general, who would sympathize with them, tell them of the love of the Saviour, and teach them to look to Him for peace and salvation.

Pity it is that a life so noble, so consecrated, should have been lost to the world! It is inexpressibly sad to think how it was lost. The guilt and shame of his death rest on the head of the statesman who sent him out on his dangerous mission, was notified of his peril, turned a deaf ear to his piteous appeals for help, and was so dilatory in obeying the indignant demand of the people that the expedition he at last sent to his relief arrived too late to save him.

AUNT NANCY'S BIBLE.

"ARE you going out this morning?" asked Mrs. Ely of her husband, as he entered the breakfast-room of the old parsonage one winter's morning in the year 1872. "There has been a fire, Martha tells me, and her mother and several other colored families have been burned out."

"I am very sorry to hear it," said Dr. Ely. "Yes, I will go down and see what can be done."

Breakfast over, and family worship concluded, the good clergyman went out and walked toward the district where most of the colored people lived in their poor frame houses that they called their homes. Some years before Dr. Ely would have gone on his errand of mercy with a stronger step and a more hopeful spirit. Money is very scarce at the parsonage now. The help he was wont to extend whenever misfortune came upon any one, about him can no longer be afforded; and though his heart is just as responsive to the cry of distress as it used to be, he cannot give the relief he once gave lavishly. His congregation is a small circle, most of its members being scattered by the war, and not a few of them are dead on the battle-field. His own two sons are buried in unknown graves near the place where they fell with their company under the storm of Union bullets. His eldest daughter, a widow now, is in the old parsonage again after a short year of happy married life, the only relic of which is a sword, over which she weeps even now after eight years of peace. The church is only half filled, and of those who worship there the majority have lost their all by the war, and can give their pastor little but their love and esteem. He has that in unstinted quantity, but it does not pay the family expenses, and it is all he can give again when he visits those who need more substantial help. Dr. Ely, therefore, generous, benevolent man as he is, goes empty-handed to the sufferers by the fire, and bemoans his incapacity to relieve the distress he expects to find.

As he approaches the smoking ruins, an old negress meets him, bearing a large book and some charred boards. "You burnt out, too, Aunt Nancy?" asks the clergyman.

"Yass, seh; de fiah done burn ev'ything up—ev'ything but de ole Bible."

"Did not you have time to save any clothes or anything?"

"Nuthin' 'tall, seh. The fiah wuz a-blazin' 'fore we know, and I jess seed de smoke and de light, and I meck a dash for de ole book, and toted it right out, and Sam he was kind o' skeered, too, and he come away with nuthin'. It's all done burnt up now, suah."

"What made you take care of the Bible, Nancy?"

"Well, seh, I'se al'ays set a heap o' store by de ole book. Ole mistis done give it me 'fore de wah. She foun' out I'd larn to read, coz Miss Charlotte she teach'd me, and she 'lowed I knew, and when ole marster died, an' I wuz in thyah an' seed her a-crying an' a-praying, I jess tole her she'd see him ag'in whar der wuz no moh pahtin'. An' she sed, 'How yo know that, Nancy?' and I sed it wuz in de Bible, an' I read it o'fen. An' she sed had I de Bible. I done tole her no, but I read it in ole marster's Bible down in de parlor. Well, she sed, Nancy, thet's yo' own Bible, den, an' she done give it me torectly. An' I done got 'ligion, and 'longst to de Church, and I read de Bible constant. I don' mine de house things a mite, coz de Bible wuz saved."

"But where shall you live, Nancy? What are you going to do?"

"I don' know dat, sah. I 'low I'll manage somehow. De good Lawd 'll take keer o' me till my time comes. I kin trust Him."

Dr. Ely sent the faithful old woman to the parsonage while he went to see what could be done to help the sufferers, and to find shelter for them temporarily until they could get other homes. He was busy in his work of mercy all morning, and one and another were told to go to the parsonage for their dinner. As he wended his way homeward that night, with the good news that arrangements had been made for the accommodation of every one for that night, at any rate, old Nancy's words recurred to him. "I can trust Him," she had said, and the clergyman, looking back over a long experience, said with a look upward, in which gratitude and confidence were mingled: "And so can I."

A FATAL FRAUD.
AN ORIGINAL SERIAL STORY. BY LEW VAN-DERPOOLE.
In the Storm.

THE pearl, silver and amber tints went out of the sky, and a heavy, sombre, ashen pallor shut out the sunlight. Ominous masses of dark vapor covered the peaks and overhung the ridges. The trees and bushes looked wet and black. The roar, rumble and hiss of the rushing water in the ravines and cañons was twice as loud as it was in the morning. The air seemed thick and heavy.

The pass leading through the foothills up to Red Dog's camp was gloomy with the shadows of premature night. It still lacked three hours of sunset.

Aunt Nancy's Bible.

There was a crackle in the underbrush near the spot where Leon and Crance had met in the morning.

After a moment's silence the noise was repeated, and then a panther sprang out into the open space and looked toward the western mountains.

The air in that direction was also dense and humid, and the smoke from the chimneys of Santa Fé was no longer visible.

Either the near presence of some unseen person, or dread of the coming storm, startled the panther, for he suddenly sniffed the air which came down the mountain-side, lifted his head, lashed his tail nervously, and with a faint growl leaped into the underbrush on the lower side of the pass and disappeared.

Black, ugly, wind-swept clouds came up over the summits from the other side of the mountains, and sent great, drenching, blinding sheets of rain down the pass.

All the valleys were full of the noise and tumult of the storm. The whole landscape was alternately black with the rain and vivid with the lightning.

Nowhere else does one ever witness such fierce, resistless, overpowering storms. There is no time for preparation or for anything else but—death. They come without warning, excepting the few slight signs which even the experienced frontiersmen can hardly distinguish. Sometimes they last for days, and sometimes only for a few minutes. When they are at their worst, whether they are of long or short duration, everything which is not as fixed and immovable as the mountains themselves perishes and is swept away.

The short storms, strangely enough, are generally the fiercest, and so it was in the present instance. As the tempest increased in wrathful power, birds and animals, disturbed and alarmed, began flitting and flying down the pass. A dirty-looking, dun-colored serpent went wriggling and writhing across the narrow, rocky defile, hissing and striking at the pelting rain as he went. Several conies came, squealing and terrified, down from the heights above; a young and frightened raven went rushing and whirling through the valley at the mercy of the wind, and presently the panther reappeared. He stood glaring at the rain, in the defenseless opening, for several minutes, and then, with his eyes fixed on a man who was striving to force his way up the valley against the wind, the half-crazed beast crouched beside the same boulder where Crance and Leon had met, awaiting the new-comer.

The man was clearly unused to those scenes. He wore the clothes of the Eastern cities, and though alert and active in manner and movement, he had not the step peculiar to dwellers in the West. He appeared to be awaiting the arrival of some one, and to be at a loss as to his bearings. Several times he looked around as if trying to make out some object that would indicate his road, and then again in the direction of the city. "What can be keeping him?" he muttered once. "He did not look the man to play me false. He said he was a half-breed, but that was no reason to distrust him. Perhaps his friend Crance is keeping him. I guess I'll wait, anyhow."

Slowly the man came, one step at a time, and was frequently blown back half a dozen steps at once. Most of the time he walked backward to keep the wind from blowing his breath away. Often he would clutch a tree or a vine as if fearful of being whirled down the pass like the birds, dead sticks of wood and the great limbs which the tempest was constantly wrenching from the living trees. At last, thoroughly exhausted and almost discouraged, he sank to the ground under the very boulder where the panther was crouching. The brute thrust his graceful neck forward till his nose was less than a yard from the man's face.

Just then a woman leaned over the boulder, unperceived by either the man or the panther, and peered cautiously around. Her clothing was torn, her hair was dishevelled, and she was the very picture of despair. Like her, the man had lost his hat, and his long hair was also lashing in the wind. For a moment there came a lull in the storm. The panther had arisen and was looking at the woman whom he had just discovered. Before she saw him he slunk back to his hiding-place behind the boulder. His movements were so noiseless that they did not attract her attention, but her piercing gaze fell on the prostrate man, and instantly she crouched down, and gliding before the storm, fled rather than walked down the mountain, and the panther stealthily followed her. Anxious as she apparently was to get away from the place, it was impossible to proceed far in such a storm. Panting and trembling in every limb, she stopped for a minute, and then in sheer despair threw herself down on the bank beside the path.

She lay but for a few moments when her quick ears recognized the sound of breathing, and a soft, cautious movement. She was too weak to move, but her nerves were fully strung, and her whole being seemed concentrated in anxious attention. What was the danger, and in what way did it menace her? For a few minutes there was absolute silence, save the suppressed rumble of the storm in the valleys and glens below, and the beating of her own heart.

She was lying flat on the wet ground, and her head was partly supported by her elbow.

Just as she imagined that the unseen intruder, whoever he was, had crawled away again unheard, she felt something breathing in her face.

It was pitch dark. Then there came a glare of lightning that made the whole landscape as bright as day.

She looked straight before her into the eyes of the panther! His face was less than a foot from her's. Curiosity had induced him to inspect her closely.

Each took a single glance; each emptied their lungs in a single scream; and then, each fled.

The scream of the woman aroused the man who was lying higher up by the boulder. Some one must be in peril, he knew, for there was terror in that wild cry. He rose, shook himself, and walked in the direction from which it proceeded. With the lull in the storm it had become a little lighter, and he was just able to distinguish objects at a short distance. Nothing that could utter such a cry, however, could he discover, and once more he betook himself to the shelter of the boulder. But he could not rest, for the cry had thoroughly thrilled him, and he resolved to examine the path more carefully and farther away while there was yet light enough for the search.

It was nearly two hundred yards from the place where he had been resting that he saw something lying on the ground which seemed an unusual thing in that place. It might be a fallen tree; but, as he drew nearer, he saw it was not that, and as he came still closer he saw what it really was—the prostrate form of a woman. Bending over, he found that it was Myrtie Vane and that she had swooned. The light motion with which he turned her face to the light brought her to consciousness, and as she opened her eyes she recognized in him the detective, Smith, whom she had seen in her mother's house.

"Do not be alarmed, my child," he said, gently. "I will protect you. Was it you who screamed just now?"

Myrtie's voice was very faint, and she was violently agitated, but Smith's kindly face and reassuring tones soothed her. "Yes, it was I; a dreadful creature—a panther, I think, was close to me."

"Do you feel able to stand now? Let me help you to some shelter," Smith said, raising her from the wet ground. "We can walk now that the storm has abated, and though I am lost myself I am sure this way must bring us to Santa Fé."

Supporting Myrtie's trembling steps, Smith succeeded in getting her a little distance on the way, and was pleased to find that as her agitation subsided her strength increased. As her steps grew firmer, he ventured to ask her a question.

"Do you know me?"

"Are you not the man with whom mamma consulted in Virginia on the day before I was carried away?"

"I am, and I left there the next day in search of you, and have been seeking you ever since. How came you out on the mountain in such a storm?"

"It was treachery that caused me to come. A good and generous man, a rough but sterling fellow, saved me from the man who carried me away and took me to a place of safety. The next day a man whom I take to be a Spaniard came to the house where I was, and told me that Señor Crance—that was the man who rescued me—had met with an accident and desired me to come to him without delay. I was distressed, and did not take time to think. The man was so polite and so very urgent that I went with him when he offered to take me to the place where my good friend was lying. I ought to have consulted the people of the house, but I did not. He led me into a dreadful place where men were drinking, and then I knew that I was deceived and I ran for my life, not caring where I went. I came to the mountain, and, after wandering here in the storm I saw you lying under the rock, and in the darkness I mistook you for the Spaniard and I fled. When I rested again the panther came, and then I screamed and ran away. I knew no more until you aroused me just now."

"What a terrible series of adventures you have had, Miss Vane. I sincerely hope you are safe now. You will be if all that I can do will insure your safety."

"How came you here?" Myrtie asked, after thanking him for his kindness.

Smith feared the agitation which might unnerve her again if he told her of his struggle with Vane and all that had happened in Red Dog's camp, so he withheld that portion of his narrative for a more suitable opportunity. "I met a stranger," he said, "from whom I gleaned some news of you. He went away to find this man, Crance, and I promised to wait for him. But I grew strangely restless. He was a long time gone, and at last I turned out to walk about until he returned. In some way I lost my bearings and could not find our rendezvous. Then, while I was still seeking it, the storm came on and I thought of nothing but shelter."

By this time they were nearing Santa Fé, and as they looked toward the city they saw a man hurriedly approaching. Myrtie trembled, and would have avoided the meeting had not Smith held her firmly and reassured her. He recognized Leon, the half-breed.

"Why did you not wait for me?" were his first words.

"I have found the lady," said Smith, quietly. "I do not need the help of your friend, Crance, now."

"Is this the lady Crance took care of?" Leon asked, looking narrowly at Myrtie.

"The same."

"Then, stranger, if you want to keep a whole skin I'd advise you to part company with her. Crance is mad, and he's dangerous to meet like that. He is searching for her everywhere. Some miscreant decoyed her away while he was at the camp. If he was to come on you along o' her he might think it was you done it, and it might be too late to explain things afore you got your tale grooved."

"I am not afraid of him," said Smith; "and I have had too much trouble to find the lady to lose sight of her again."

"As you please, stranger; but I wouldn't like to be in your place. Crance is mighty handy with his shooting-iron."

"Well, if you feel any concern you might go and explain, yourself. You say Crance is your friend. You don't want him to make a fatal mistake. Why don't you go and find him, and tell him the lady is safe and coming to Santa Fé under good care?"

Leon hesitated a minute, but reflecting that the man could not spirit the lady away, and, moreover, seemed to be "a square man," he agreed, and with the speed of his Indian brothers was soon hurrying on toward the city.

At its outskirts Smith and Myrtie met the two eagerly coming toward them.

"I don't understand this," said Crance, when they met. "Are you the varmint that inveigled this lady away from her friends, where I put her?"

"Better ask the lady herself," said Smith, quietly.

"Oh, no," said Myrtie, laying her hand gently on Crance's arm. "This man is a good friend who found me on the mountain in the storm. He has been seeking me since I left my home."

"What like was the fellow who got you away with him?" Crance asked.

Myrtie told him, and Crance seemed to be registering the description in his memory with a resolution that was ominous for the guilty party. Then he turned again with them, and still keeping Myrtie's hand within his arm, retraced his steps toward Santa Fé.

Leon came to his side as they entered the city and whispered. Crance grasped his hand vigorously. "You have done me good service to-day, Leon," he said. "I'll never forget it. You are a good friend, and if I can do anything for you at any time Crance is your man. Good-by."

Crance led the way to the adobe house to which he had taken Myrtie before. As they came to the entrance he said: "Miss Vane, I'm goin' to leave you here again. You will be safe here, and I'll take care no harm comes nigh you. We start for your home in the morning. Good-night."

Smith would have followed Myrtie, but Crance laid a powerful grasp on his shoulder. "No, stranger, that's not the hotel. That's a private friend of my own that lives there. If you want a bed, yonder's the hotel. This lady's in my charge. I'm pledged to see her safe to her mother in Virginia, and Bob Crance never went back on his word yet."

"Will you walk to the hotel with me?" said Smith.

"No, sir, I'm on sentinel duty to-night. I'm goin' to walk about here till it's time to start in the morning. There's been a sight too much monkeying about this business already. I'll see there's no more of it. If you want to talk, you can stay here with me a spell. I'll listen; but I don't leave sight of this place while the lady's in it."

The invitation was accepted. For more than two hours the men so different in habits and pursuits so strangely brought together patrolled the circuit of the house, talking earnestly; Crance telling his companion of his adventures, of his eccentric mode of rescuing Myrtie, and questioning him about the life of Eastern cities. Smith, too, liking Crance's rough gallantry respecting his valuable service, imparted a confidence which made Crance stop in his walk, uncover his head and grasp him by the hand. After that Smith went to the hotel and left Crance still marching up and down on guard.

Within, Myrtie was sleeping peacefully after the fatigue and agitation of the day, with a heart full of gratitude to God for the marvellous way in which in her extremity He had brought friends to her aid and delivered her out of her danger.

ESTHER'S PETITION.

S. S. Lesson for March 14, Esth. 4:15-17, 5: Golden Text, 4:16. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Why Ahasuerus Has a Place in the Bible—Esther a Candidate for the Harem—An Indication of Spiritual Degeneracy—Sympathy with Vashti—True Womanliness—Esther Chosen—Her Nationality Concealed—The Incensed Courtier—A Diabolical Plot—Mordecai's Grief—Esther's Intervention Demanded—No Accident With God—Petition and Deliverance.

ALL which touches His people is of importance to God. He says regarding them, "He that toucheth you, toucheth the apple of His eye" (Zech. 2:8). "For the Lord's portion is His people; Jacob is the lot of His inheritance. He found him in a desert land, and in the waste howling wilderness; He led him about, He instructed him, He kept him as the apple of His eye" (Deut. 32:9, 10). "In all their affliction He was afflicted, and the angel of His presence saved them: in His love and in His pity He redeemed them; and He bare them, and carried them all the days of old" (Isa. 63:9). Thus it came to pass that, through the relation in which he stood to the Jews, the licentious, effeminate despot, Ahasuerus, is mentioned in the Word of God. The Jews which had not gone up to Jerusalem in accordance with the decree of Cyrus, and who clung to the land of their captivity, must have sunk to a terribly low level, that one of the chief among them, Mordecai, should have encouraged his beautiful niece Esther to vie with other maidens who entered the harem of the king as candidates for the position of queen royal.

One can sympathize with Vashti, the former queen, when her royal husband, under the influence of wine, sent for her in order that the princes, intoxicated like him, and the people, should look upon her beauty.

A TRUE WOMAN

shrinks from the gaze of the multitude. It is always a sign of the declension of true womanhood when female attire is directed rather to attract the eye than to make her pass unnoticed. There is something inexpressibly repulsive to a true woman in being dragged out to the view of those whom she cannot esteem. Vashti lost the throne through her womanly shrinking, and then King Ahasuerus sought to fill her place from among a number of maidens who were brought one by one into his harem. Esther was his choice. She had acted unlike any of the other maidens, and obtained favor in the eye of Hegai, the king's chamberlain, and she required of him nothing when she went into the king's house royal but what Hegai himself appointed. She gave no trouble, but was considerate of others, a true mark of the life of God within; and she "obtained favor in the sight of all them that looked upon her" (Esth. 2:15). The king was among the number, and he set the crown royal on her head.

How far Esther was acquainted with the law of her God, which had been so forgotten and so neglected for many generations, we know not; how far Mordecai was acquainted with it does not appear. Had both of them known how God had forbidden that daughters of Israel should be given as wives to the Gentiles (Deut. 7:3, 4), it would have been sin in both of them to form the alliance with the Gentile king of Persia. Mordecai instructed Esther to withhold from the king and all others her Jewish origin, and thus the Israelitish maiden must have passed as a Gentile in the court. Her uncle was unknown at court, although he had once saved the king's life when two of the king's chamberlains had formed a conspiracy against him, and Mordecai had discovered it, and signified it to the king through Esther, the queen. Yet, although the fact was recorded in the chronicles of his reign, Ahasuerus did not in any way manifest his appreciation of the loyalty of Mordecai,

THE WILY COURTIER.

The king was intensely selfish—he lived for self; the very atmosphere he breathed was self-indulgence; and thus the man who most ministered to self in him was naturally his favorite minister. Such was Haman, the Agagite, the last of the race of Amalek, of whom the Lord had said, "I will have war with Amalek from generation to generation" (Ex. 17:16; see also 1 Sam. 15). No doubt this man was a wily flatterer, a very parasite, just living upon the weakness of the king, who, because he just suited him, advanced him to a place of honor and influence beyond even the princes, the true nobility of Persia. A man raised thus suddenly to power, possessing no true refinement or superiority, always assumes airs which are insulting and repelling to his real superiors. But Haman had so ingratiated himself with the king that, by royal command, all the king's servants and—because it was "the thing"—all who were in the "gate" bowed down to this man—all but Mordecai. How could a Jew bow before an Amalekite, the race against which the Lord had sworn to have war? Some of the king's servants busied themselves to draw Haman's attention to the one man who did not go with the stream, and who failed to do him reverence. Haman, on learning he was a Jew, conceived the horrible idea of a general massacre of the Jews, and by dint of misrepresentation and slander he obtained his desire, and a proclamation was issued and sent into all the provinces of the mighty empire commanding the destruction of all the Jews on the thirteenth day of the twelfth month.

The murderous Haman, having got his desire, sat down with the king

TO DRINK WINE!

On such occasions wine is a necessity! Wherever there is murder, adultery, theft, there is wine and strong drink! But Mordecai, when he heard the grievous tidings, "rent his clothes, and put on sackcloth with ashes, and went out into the midst of the city, and cried with a loud and a bitter cry. Esther's maids came and told her, and the queen was exceedingly grieved, and sent out raiment to Mordecai; but it was not raiment that he wanted. Then Hatach, one of the king's chamberlains, went at Esther's command and learned the sad truth from her uncle, who bid him charge Esther that she should go in before the king and make request for her people. Esther was in a strait; difficulties stared her in the face; she knew the king's imperious temper, and sent word to Mordecai what a risk it would be to go uncalled into his presence—that it was death to any one to whom he did not hold out the golden sceptre, and for thirty days past (all the time that Haman had been plotting against the Jews) she had not been called into the king's presence. But Mordecai, in the spirit of prophecy, returned answer: "Think not with thyself that thou shalt escape in the king's house, more than all the Jews. For if thou altogether holdest thy peace at this time, then shall there enlargement and deliverance arise to the Jews from another place; but thou and thy father's house shall be destroyed: and who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom

FOR SUCH A TIME AS THIS?

It was enough: this appeal conquered. Esther, who stood in every one's good graces, who did nothing and said nothing offensive or out of season, rose to the occasion; she woke up to her personal responsibility, instead of leaning, as before, upon her uncle, and she took the initiative, and sent word to gather all the Jews in Shushan to fast and pray three days, and she and her maidens would do the same; "and," she said, "so will I go in unto the king, which is not according to the law: and if I perish, I perish." There is a time in the life of most of us when tremendous issues hang upon the next few hours or the next few days. Is it accidental? There is no accident with God. He makes all things work together for good to them that love Him. "For this cause came I unto this hour," said our Lord (John 12:27). Who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this?

Who knoweth whether thou art come into the work, the business, the family, where the strain of trial is, for such a time as this? It is just when all seems against us that God makes the most to depend upon us. Mordecai knew, for he had prayed in faith (Mak 11:24; 1 John 5:14, 15), that deliverance would arise, but he longed that Esther should be the honored instrument.

On the third day the queen put on her royal apparel, and went into the inner court of the king's house. It was the first time she had been so bold; but the king held out the golden sceptre, inquired what was her petition, and twice declared it should be granted, even to the half of his kingdom. Her only request was that the king and Haman should come to a banquet which she should prepare for them, and then, on the morrow, she would make known her petition. Meanwhile

GOD WAS AT WORK.

He kept the king from sleeping, and so ordered it that the chronicles of the kingdom should be read to him in his sleepless hours; and thus, for the first time, he fully realized the faithfulness and devotion of Mordecai. This led to the strange subversion of things which, to the great astonishment of the gossips of Shushan, found Mordecai on the morrow seated on the king's horse, clothed in his apparel, led by Haman, who proclaimed before him, "Thus shall it be done unto the man whom the king delighteth to honor." Haman was forced to this service as though in mockery, but really by the righteous retribution of God, who had put the enemy whom He hated, and for whose execution he had already prepared a gallows, into the very position of honor which he had flattered himself the king could give to no other. So quickly can a man fall whose trust is only in man.

At Esther's banquet the king again urged Esther to make her and, to her royal husband's surprise and dismay, she said: "If I have found favor in thy sight, O king, and if it please the king, let my life be given me at my petition, and my people at my request: For we are sold, I and my people, to be destroyed, to be slain, and to perish. But if we had been sold for bondmen and bondwomen, I had held my tongue, although the enemy could not countervail the king's damage." When the king inquired, "Who is he, and where is he, that durst presume in his heart to do so?" the queen replied, "The adversary and enemy is this wicked Haman." God had undertaken. It was not in vain that Esther had risked her life. The same day Haman was hanged on the gallows he had made for Mordecai. The tide was turned. Confident in her God, Esther went in a second time to the king, and boldly asked for the reversal of all the letters written by Haman to command the destruction of the Jews; and she gained her point, so that not only were the Jews spared from the intended massacre, but they were given power over their enemies, and "the fear of the Jews came upon them," and "many of the people of the land became Jews;" probably the knowledge of God was spread abroad. Mordecai took the place of Haman, and became a good counsellor to the king; and thus God overruled even the unpromising circumstances, and when His children did turn to Him in the time of their trouble He was, as always, "found of them." The Lord teach us all, in every circumstance of our lives, to know by the light of His Holy Spirit the reason we are come into these circumstances, and how in them we may best serve the Lord.

The Rt. Hon. H. C. CHILDERS, the British Home Secretary—Scene in the London Riots of February 8.

THE RT. HON. H. C. E. CHILDERS, M.P.

THE statesman whose portrait appears on the first page is the member of the British Administration whose duty it is to investigate the troubles out of which grew the London riot of Monday, February 8th, a scene in which is depicted also on the first page. Mr. Childers is at the head of the Home Department, or, as we should denominate the office, Secretary of the Interior. He is one of the useful men about Parliament who can be relied upon to conduct the affairs of any of the Government departments in a respectable, creditable manner. There is nothing brilliant about him, he is not a genius, but a plain, honest business man, with plenty of shrewdness and administrative capacity.

It is remarkable that the office to which he was assigned, and which seemed the one in the present crisis least likely to be disturbed from its routine work, should have been the one first confronted with a problem most difficult of solution and most painful in character. An immense number of workmen in London are out of employment; many of them are actually starving, and the riot in which they engaged on February 8th, was in part an outcome of their distress. In punishing the perpetrators that fact cannot be ignored, and it may be hoped that Mr. Childers will develop the sagacity needed to deal with the case firmly, yet mercifully, and will devise remedial measures for the relief of the prevailing misery. He has a difficult task, and, if he succeeds, the honor to which he will be entitled will be proportionate to the difficulty. He has the opportunity; we have yet to see whether he has the skill to use it.

Hugh Culling Eardley Childers was born in London June 25th, 1827; he is consequently in his fifty-ninth year. His father was an Episcopal clergyman who held the vicarage of Cantley, Yorkshire. The old school of Cheam, in Surrey, very famous in former years, has the honor of being the place where the future statesman gained the rudiments of his education. Thence he proceeded to Trinity College, Cambridge University. His university course was honorable, and at his graduation he occupied the creditable place of "fourteenth Senior Optime" on the list. He had originally intended to devote himself to the legal profession, but he had fallen in love and was desirous of finding some less tedious way to wealth and power. He married in 1850, the year in which he left college, and immediately quitted his native country for Australia.

AUSTRALIAN EXPERIENCE.

It was in that colony that Mr. Childers entered public life. He was elected to the local Parliament by the township of Portland, and shortly afterward was appointed Commissioner of Trade and Customs. He remained seven years in Australia, and in that time made himself thoroughly familiar with colonial affairs. The colony of Victoria in 1857 needed a representative in England to manage its home interests and to stimulate immigration. The post was offered to Mr. Childers, who accepted it, and returned to London.

The fascination of public life seldom leaves a man who once tastes its sweets. Mr. Childers was under its influence, and soon after his return to England he sought a seat in Parliament. He offered himself to the borough of Pontefract, but was defeated at the poll. His successful opponent, however, had been guilty of bribery, and an investigation was ordered. The case was proved, he was declared wrongfully elected, and a new election was ordered. Mr. Childers ran again and was elected. That was in 1860, and he has been in Parliament ever since.

Early in his Parliamentary career Mr. Childers was enabled to do the colony which he represented valuable service. It had long been a grievance severely felt by the colonists that England made their land a penal settlement. Burglars, forgers and other criminals sentenced to seven or more years of "penal servitude" were sent to Victoria to work out their sentence, and when their terms expired they generally elected to remain in the colony rather than return to England. Few of them reformed during their terms, and the result was that the colonists were constantly liable to depredations and violence at the hands of these abandoned men. This grievance was one of those committed to the hands of Mr. Childers for presentation to the Imperial Government. So vigorously did he take it up with tongue and pen, so persistently did he protest against it in Parliament and out, that at last a commission was appointed to examine the question, and he was appointed its chairman. He succeeded in convincing the Commission that it was unjust as well as impolitic to flood a new and flourishing colony with English criminals. The report of the Commission was adopted by Parliament in 1863, and since that time England has kept her convicted criminals at home.

IN THE CABINET.

Mr. Childers' success brought him into prominence. Earl Russell in 1864 gave him a small office, which he could hold while retaining his seat in Parliament. In 1868, when Mr. Gladstone first became Premier, that statesman made Mr. Childers Secretary of the Navy, or, as it is called in England, "First Lord of the Admiralty." While he held that office the great sorrow of his life fell upon him. His eldest son was a midshipman on board the Captain, and he with other young men, some of whom were sons of earls, perished when that vessel foundered in the Bay of Biscay, on September 7th, 1870. Mr. Childers was heartbroken, and for a long time was unable to attend to business. He finally resigned his office, and spent some months in retirement.

When Mr. Gladstone formed his second Cabinet, in 1880, Mr. Childers was made Secretary of War. The position was, and still is, an embarrassing one. The Secretary is frequently in collision with the Commander-in-chief, the Duke of Cambridge, who is the Queen's cousin, an incapable official, with an inveterate hatred of reform. It was therefore an agreeable change when Mr. Gladstone offered to transfer Mr. Childers to another post. Mr. Childers then became Chancellor of the Exchequer, or, as we call the office, Secretary of the Treasury. He held that office until last year, when Mr. Gladstone and his Cabinet resigned. As we have already stated, his place in this, Mr. Gladstone's third Cabinet, is that of Secretary of the Interior. Mr. Childers married a second time in 1879, his first wife having died in 1875.

THE RIOTS IN LONDON.

As students of prophecy have for some time been warning the world, we are now entering upon a period in which one of the most characteristic features will be the predominance of a spirit of lawlessness. Secular writers, ignoring prophecy and basing their opinions on their observation of social movements and the condition of society, have arrived at the same conclusion. There is a clearly defined movement infecting more or less workmen of irreligious character in the direction of an organized attempt to remove the anomalies of society by force. From a blatant, howling demagogue like Herr Most to a workman discontented with his hard lot, there is, of course, still a long stride. But the hard-hearted selfishness of some employers, and the indifference of the wealthy to the sufferings of the poor are bringing the two nearer together. From Most and his gang the workman gets sympathy. That is something which his employer seldom gives him. He gets more; he is offered a plan to relieve his necessities. He does not believe in the plan, and he is inclined to regard the sympathy as part of a scheme to entrap him; but hunger is a powerful persuader, and he is liable to accept that scheme because it is the only one which is offered to him. As we look around we see the causes at work which naturally lead to violence; as we look into the Word of God we see that anarchy is to be expected in the last days. Thus from the two standpoints the lines converge. The London riots, paltry as they were in intrinsic importance, are, when regarded in this light, deeply significant as signs and portents.

THE GATHERING.

The riot originated in a mass-meeting of starving mechanics in response to a call convening a meeting in Trafalgar Square, in the very centre of London, and which, as Englishmen are fond of declaring, is the finest site in Europe. The northern side of the square is occupied by the National Gallery and St. George's Barracks, and on the other sides are magnificent hotels, insurance buildings, the Royal College of Physicians and other public buildings. A conspicuous object in the square is the Nelson column, which towers high above all the surrounding buildings, surmounted by a statue of the hero of Trafalgar, and having at its base the four huge bronze lions, the work of Sir Edwin Landseer. In this open space some ten thousand men assembled in response to the call on Monday, February 8th. For the most part they were orderly workmen, intent only on devising means for ameliorating their miserable condition. But the Socialists had recognized in the meeting an opportunity for disseminating their doctrines, and had sent a considerable deputation to assist in the proceedings.

The mechanics held their meeting, and a large number of them then went quietly home, having manifested their repugnance to the Socialists, whose programme they repudiated. Their places, however, were quickly taken by crowds of the criminal classes, who scented plunder. The Socialists were then masters of the gathering, and their leaders, Burns and Hyndman, made violent speeches from the base of the Nelson column. Burns is a well-known Socialist who ran in that interest as candidate for Parliament in the recent election. Hyndman is a gentleman who has had a university education, but has devoted his life and fortune to the propagation of Socialist doctrines.

Burns failing to make himself heard, climbed up the pedestal of the Nelson column to deliver a harangue. He was well aware that this would not be tolerated, and the police politely ordered him to get down. This he refused to do, appealing to the crowd to resist "interference with the exercise of popular rights." The officers, however, were determined, and they pushed their way through the excited and resisting mass of humanity, and by force removed Burns from the pedestal. By this time the crowd had enormously increased, and the adjacent streets were packed with people.

A FIGHT WITH POLICE.

Burns had been removed some distance from the position he had attempted to occupy. He became emboldened by the cries of the throng, and made a desperate effort to recover his lost ground. He was so effectively helped by the mob that the officers on the spot were brushed out of the way, and the orator was soon pressed up against the monument. He quickly reascended the pedestal, accompanied by a number of other Socialist leaders. Burns bore a red flag, and he waved it to the assemblage as a signal of his triumph over the authorities. He was greeted with deafening shouts, repeated again and again.

FIERCE RESOLUTIONS.

Burns then read some fiercely-worded resolutions. These denounced the "authors of the present distress in England;" demanded that Parliament should start public works to give employment and bread to the tens of thousands of deserving men who were out of work through no fault of their own, but because of bad government.

The reading of the resolutions was accompanied by fierce comment and short explanatory speeches by the various orators who stood with Burns. Some of the speakers went so far as to warn the Government that, although the "starving mechanics" of London were now attempting to draw attention to their needs by quiet and peaceful agitation, they were bound to get bread, and would get it by attacking the bakers' shops next if the Government did not come to their relief. Burns himself, in one of these side speeches, denounced the present House of Commons as a body of landlords and capitalists, for whom hanging was too good. He also declared that the people had assembled to summon Parliament to immediately relieve the distress of the British workingmen; that the people wanted the question settled at once, and peaceably, if possible, otherwise revolution was inevitable.

THE MOB DRIVEN OUT.

The police had at length, after culpable delay, been reinforced, and succeeded in driving the mob away from the column and out of the square. They made no attempt to return, but at once left the scene and marched up Pall Mall to the Reform Club (Liberal). They mounted the steps of the building, pointed to the doors and windows, and bitterly denounced the members. This looked like an attempt to set the mob on the building. The mob was excited, but not up to the point of violence yet. Burns and his colleagues, seeing this, left the Reform Club steps and proceeded to the Carlton Club (Conservative) next door, where they repeated their tactics. The pressure of the crowd from Trafalgar Square forced them onward, and they proceeded, hooting, howling and challenging the authorities. The invaded streets were at once abandoned to the rioters, who, finding themselves no longer opposed, vented their ill-will against well-housed people and against the clubs by stoning the dwellings and club-houses along the way. They were bound for Hyde Park, where another meeting was to be held.

IN THE PARK

Burns again addressed them. This speech was even more violent than the others he had made. The language was exciting, and the whole address was well calculated to set the crowd loose upon the town. Burns was followed by several other Socialist speakers, who did all in their power to stir up strife. When the speaking was over the mob broke up into sections and disappeared from the scene. The main body went back east along Oxford Street again. The affrighted residents along this thoroughfare were not yet recovered from their panic, and the mob had the street to themselves. They smashed every sound window they noticed. The wine shops were broken into and their contents distributed freely to whoever wished drink. The beer saloons were similarly treated. Tailor-shops were broken into and the clothes and rolls of cloth were thrown out into the street, to be taken by those strongest, in the fight which resulted.

WRECKING A HOTEL.

Another part of the mob went through Pall Mall and St. James Street to Piccadilly. They attempted to enter the War Office in Pall Mall, but desisted when the sentry threatened to bayonet the leaders. On reaching the top of St. James Street the mob attacked the Devonshire Club (Liberal) in a savage manner. On their way down Piccadilly they passed Hatchett's Hotel, a large hostelry famous in coaching days. When the mob passed this place many of the rank and file were hungry, and these made a rush for the hotel. They had it in their possession in a moment, and they sacked it of food and drink, and left the building badly wrecked. As the men were leaving the hotel they saw a carriage which had been pressed up against the curb by the passing procession and abandoned by its frightened occupants. It was seized and in an instant broken up, and the wheel-spokes, shafts and other good pieces were carried away for clubs. The most violent acts were committed on North and South Audley Streets and Oxford Street. Probably two hundred shops and a dozen club-houses were seriously damaged, and about fifty shops were pillaged, including bakers', butchers' and wine-shops. Jewelry-shops were broken into and their contents carried off by the mob. Carriages containing ladies were stopped on the streets and the occupants forced to alight. Some of the rioters entered the vehicles and drove at the head of the crowd. The mob swept through the streets, shouting, "Smash the windows! Let's get inside the shops!"

While these events were taking place another section of the mob regained possession of Trafalgar Square, making rushes at the constables and other obnoxious persons. In one of these rushes the mob overthrew two heavy granite pillars. These fell across Charing Cross and blocked the track to and from the Charing Cross Railway Station. The police made several most desperate exertions to clear away this obstruction, but were easily resisted every time by the mob. This mob held their ground so well at Trafalgar Square that until they voluntarily abandoned the scene the entire power of the police proved insufficient to clear a way to one of the most important railway stations in the world large enough to permit even a single carriage line to pass to or from the depot. Some time after dark the mob gradually left Trafalgar Square.

A state of panic prevailed that night and during the next two days, during which there were minor disturbances but no repetition of the more serious outrages. The events of the day proved two things. They showed that the chief of police was an incapable man—he has since resigned—and that the Socialists and criminal classes united were more powerful than was imagined. It may be hoped that another lesson also was learned. The disturbance proved that the genuine workman is loyal and law-abiding at present, and that if timely measures are taken to relieve his present distress and protect him from the rapacity of the capitalists in future, he will remain loyal. If those measures are postponed, and he is driven to make the blunder of regarding the Socialists as his only friends, and Socialism as his only hope, there will be trouble beside which the riot of February 8th will be like child's-play.

CHRISTIAN WORK IN CHINA.

AN interesting incident related by the Rev. Frank V. Mills in the Foreign Missionary shows a humiliating contrast between the ways of "the heathen Chinese" and those of our countrymen in Wyoming. After describing a riot at Hangchow in which the Mission hospital was attacked, he says: "The next morning several officials called to investigate the matter. The eight men were punished, a proclamation was issued granting protection, not only to the hospital, but to the preaching chapel connected with it; and last, but by no means the least important, one hundred dollars, the estimated amount of damage, was sent to the hospital early yesterday morning."

"We all feel that we have great cause for thankfulness that so little real damage was done. The hospital was not touched, and only the windows and furniture in the outbuildings were destroyed. Then, too, the action of the officials was prompt and effective. Just after the row there was considerable talk on the streets about destroying all the foreign houses, and driving out the Christians. But that has for the most part ceased, and we hear nothing more than usual."

CHURCH DISCIPLINE.

"Our Session here recently demonstrated that all Chinese Christians are not mercenary. The richest man in the church has been excommunicated. This action was taken by the natives without any pressure from the foreign missionary. They worked up the case, investigated the evidence, and reported the result to the missionary. I have no reason to believe that the Session would have acted otherwise if there had been no foreigners at the station. The pastor draws no salary from the Board. He also knows that the Mission Applies to the Board for help only in the last extremity; that if there is a deficiency at the end of the year, there is no certainty that it will be made up. But I have not yet heard a word about the delinquent member's contribution. In fact, some months ago, the question was raised, would it be right to accept his money, as he was then suspended. It will be no easy matter to make up the few dollars which the loss of this man implies. Still the Session gave no uncertain voice in the matter. The man's conduct was an injury to the church. They had tried him with suspension and he had not improved, so they proceeded to excommunicate him."

A REMARKABLE CONVERSION.

Rev. Charles R. Mills, D.D., writing from Tungchow, says: "I write this from an inn at a country village among the hills, sixty miles south-east of Tungchow. Five years ago this spring I visited this place for the first time. I spent several days visiting the surrounding villages and preaching the Gospel. I stopped at this same inn and occupied the very room I do now."

"One morning I was having prayers with my assistant, Mr. Lan, when a man about sixty-five entered the room, and, greeting us very cordially, expressed his great satisfaction at meeting a minister of the Gospel, and stating that he had long desired it above all things. I asked him to join us in our reading and prayer, which he did, after which he told us his story."

"He said his name was Sun Hyoa Yang; he lived in this village, which is called Tong Kin Puh, and had a vegetable garden. Several years before (I think eight) a man passed through the district, selling Christian books. For a few cash less than a cent, he had bought a little tract of a few pages. I think it must have been Dr. Martin's 'Paul's Discourse at Mars' Hill.' He was led to buy it by the unusual clearness of the type. He read it and was interested. Others in the region had bought larger books, and from them he got, I think, the Gospel by Matthew, the Gospel by Luke, the Acts and Romans."

"He read the Gospel history as far as the crucifixion, and threw aside the book in disgust. 'I will read no more,' said he, 'of a man who could work miracles, but who hadn't spirit enough to defend himself when spit on and abused.' But the story had a strange charm for him. He read it again carefully. At last he got to understand the vicarious nature of Christ's suffering. And then his admiration and gratitude knew no bounds. He resolved to serve this Saviour who for our salvation was buffeted and spit upon and nailed to the cross. Presently he discovered that his character was very far from Christlike. One by one he mentioned to me his faults, and how he turned from them that he might imitate Christ."

"I learned afterward from the villagers that his story was strictly true. He had been fond of gambling, given to lawsuits, and was grasping, unjust and revengeful. In all these respects he had changed entirely. Moreover, he tried to be actively useful. The villagers said he was a perfect saint; they had never seen anything like it. All this time he had never seen a preacher, and but two Christians, and then only transiently as they passed through his village. I was delighted with the man, and so was Mr. Lan. I gave him a New Testament and asked him to come to Tungchow the next time we had a class of inquirers. He came the following autumn, and was baptized. The following spring I left for a visit to the United States. During my absence Dr. Martin set him to work as a colporteur. He was faithful and zealous, and eminently unworldly."

BEARING FRUIT.

"This spring, at his earnest request, we started a boys' school in his village. He entered into this enterprise with characteristic enthusiasm, giving a room for the school in his own house, getting a teacher, securing pupils, etc."

"After I had started on my spring tour, Mrs. Martin made a visit to his village. He was not very well, but no one supposed his illness serious. He was delighted with the opportunity the women of the place had of hearing the Gospel from one of their own sex. When Mrs. Martin returned, he rose, dressed himself and attended her a little distance on her way. He only lived four days from that time. His neighbors and the man who lived in his house and cultivated his vegetable garden have just been telling me about those days. He did not suffer much. He prayed almost constantly. He wished to talk of nothing but religion. He was absolutely joyful. He walked with God like Enoch, and was not, for God took him."

THE DOMESTIC CIRCLE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached Last Sunday Morning, March 7, 1886. *

"Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee." Mark 5: 19.

THERE are a great many people longing for some grand sphere in which to serve God. They admire Luther at the Diet of Worms, and only wish that they had some such great opportunity in which to display their Christian prowess. They admire Paul making Felix tremble, and they only wish that they had some such grand occasion in which to preach righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come; all they want is only an opportunity to exhibit their Christian heroism. Now the evangelist comes to us, and he "practically says: 'I will show you a place where you can exhibit all that is grand, and beautiful, and glorious in Christian character, and that is the domestic circle.'"

EVERY MAN'S OPPORTUNITY.

If one is not faithful in an insignificant sphere he will not be faithful in a resounding sphere. If Peter will not help the cripple at the gate of the temple, he will never be able to preach three thousand souls into the kingdom at the Pentecost. If Paul will not take pains to instruct in the way of salvation the jailer of the Philippian dungeon, he will never make Felix tremble. He who is not faithful in a skirmish would not be faithful in an Armageddon. The fact is, we are all placed in just the position in which we can most grandly serve God; and we ought not to be chiefly thoughtful about some sphere of usefulness which we may after a while gain, but the all-absorbing question with you and with me ought to be: "Lord, what wilt thou have me now and here to do?"

WHAT A HOME IS.

There is one word in my text around which the most of our thoughts will this morning revolve. That word is "Home." Ask ten different men the meaning of that word, and they will give you ten different definitions. To one it means love at the hearth, it means plenty at the table, industry at the workstand, intelligence at the books, devotion at the altar. To him it means a greeting at the door and a smile at the chair. Peace hovering like wings. Joy clapping its hands with laughter. Life a tranquil lake. Pillowed on the ripples sleep the shadows.

Ask another man what home is, and he will tell you it is want, looking out of a cheerless fire-grate, kneading hunger in an empty bread tray. The damp air shivering with curses. No Bible on the shelf. Children robbers and murderers in embryo. Obscene songs their lullaby. Every face a picture of ruin. Want in the background and sin staring from the front. No Sabbath wave rolling over that door-sill. Vestibule of the pit. Shadow of infernal walls. Furnace for forging everlasting chains. Faggots for an unending funeral pile. Awful word! It is spelled with curses, it weeps with ruin, it chokes with woe, it sweats with the death agony of despair.

The word "Home" in the one case means everything bright. The word "Home" in the other case means everything terrific.

I shall speak to you this morning of home as a test of character, home as a refuge, home as a political safeguard, home as a school, and home as a type of heaven.

And in the first place I remark, that home is a powerful test of character. The disposition in public may be in gay costume, while in private it is in dishabille. As play actors may appear in one way on the stage, and may appear in another way behind the scenes, so private character may be very different from public character. Private character is often public character turned wrong side out. A man may receive you into his parlor as though he were a distillation of smiles, and yet his heart may be a swamp of nettles. There are business men who all day long are mild, and courteous, and genial, and good-natured in commercial life, damning back their irritability, and their petulance, and their discontent; but at nightfall the dam breaks, and scolding pours forth in floods and freshets.

HOME MANNERS.

Reputation is only the shadow of character, and a very small house sometimes will cast a very long shadow. The lips may seem to drop with myrrh and cassia, and the disposition to be as bright and warm as a sheaf of sunbeams, and yet they may only be a magnificent show window to a wretched stock of goods. There is many a man who is affable in public life and amid commercial spheres who, in a cowardly way, takes his anger and his petulance home, and drops them on the domestic circle.

The reason men do not display their bad temper in public is because they do not want to be knocked down. There are men who hide their petulance and their irritability just for the same reason that they do not let their notes go to protest. It does not pay. Or for the same reason that they do not want a man in their stock company to sell his stock at less than the right price, lest it depreciate the value. As at sometimes the wind rises, so after a sunshiny day there may be a tempestuous night. There are people who in public act the philanthropist, who at home act the Nero, with respect to their slippers and their gown.

AUDUBON'S GREATNESS.

Audubon, the great ornithologist, with gun and pencil, went through the forests of America to bring down and to sketch the beautiful birds, and after years of toil and exposure completed his manuscript, and put it in a trunk in Philadelphia for a few days of recreation and rest, and came back and found that the rats had utterly destroyed the manuscript; but without any discomposure and without any fret or bad temper, he again picked up his gun and pencil, and visited again all the great forests of America, and reproduced his immortal work. And yet there are people with the ten thousandth part of that loss who are utterly unreconcilable, who, at the loss of a pencil or an article of raiment will blow as long and sharp as a north-east storm.

Now, that man who is affable in public and who is irritable in private is making a fraudulent over-issue of stock, and he is as bad as a bank that might have four or five hundred thousand dollars of bills in circulation with no specie in the vault. Let us learn to show piety at home. If we have it not there, we have it not anywhere. If we have not genuine grace in the family circle, all our outward and public plausibility merely springs from a fear of the world or from the slimy, putrid pool of our own selfishness. I tell you the home is a mighty test of character! What you are at home you are everywhere, whether you demonstrate it or not.

HOME A REFUGE.

Again, I remark that home is a refuge. Life is the United States army on the national road to Mexico, a long march, with ever and anon a skirmish and a battle. At eventide we pitch our tent and stack the arms, we hang up the war cap and lay our head on the knapsack, we sleep until the morning bugle calls us to marching and action. How pleasant it is to rehearse the victories, and the surprises, and the attacks of the day, seated by the still camp-fire of the home circle!

Yea, life is a stormy sea. With shivered masts, and torn sails, and hulk aleak, we put in at the harbor of home. Blessed harbor! There we go for repairs in the dry dock of quiet life. The candle in the window is to the toiling man the lighthouse guiding him into port. Children go forth to meet their fathers as pilots at the "Narrows" take the hand of ships. The door-sill of the home is the wharf where heavy life is unladen.

There is the place where we may talk of what we have done without being charged with self-adulation. There is the place where we may lounge without being thought ungraceful. There is the place where we may express affection without being thought silly. There is the place where we may forget our annoyances, and exasperations, and troubles. Forlorn earth pilgrim! no home? Then die. That is better. The grave is brighter, and grander, and more glorious than this world with no tent for marchings, with no harbor from the storm, with no place of rest from this scene of greed, and gouge, and loss, and gain. God pity the man or the woman who has no home!

A POLITICAL SAFEGUARD.

Further, I remark, that home is a political safeguard. The safety of the State must be built on the safety of the home. Why cannot France come to a placid republic? Ever and anon there is a threat of national capsize. France as a nation has not the right kind of a Christian home. The Christian hearthstone is the only corner-stone for a republic. The virtues cultured in the family circle are an absolute necessity for the State. If there be not enough moral principle to make the family adhere, there will not be enough political principle to make the State adhere. "No home" means the Goths and Vandals, means the Nomads of Asia, means the Numideans of Africa, changing from place to place, according as the pasture happens to change. Confounded be all those Babels of iniquity which would overthrow and destroy the home. The same storm that upsets the ship in which the family sails will sink the frigate of the constitution. Jails and penitentiaries and armies and navies are not our best defence. The door of the home is the best fortress. Household utensils are the best artillery, and the chimneys of our dwelling houses are the grandest monuments of safety and triumph. No home; no republic.

AS A SCHOOL.

Further, I remark, that home is a school. Old ground must be turned up with subsoil plough, and it must be harrowed and re-harrowed, and then the crop will not be as large as that of the new ground with less culture. Now, youth and childhood are new ground, and all the influences thrown over their heart and life will come up in after life luxuriantly. Every time you have given a smile of approbation, all the good cheer of your life will come up again in the geniality of your children. And every ebullition of anger and every uncontrollable display of indignation will be fuel to their disposition twenty, or thirty, or forty years from now—fuel for a bad fire a quarter of a century from this.

You praise the intelligence of your child too much sometimes when you think he is not aware of it, and you will see the result of it before ten years of age in his annoying affectations. You praise his beauty, supposing he is not large enough to understand what you say, and you will find him standing on a high chair before a flattering mirror. Words and deeds and example are the seed of character, and children are very apt to be the second edition of their parents: Abraham begat Isaac, so virtue is apt to go down in the ancestral line; but Herod begat Archelaus, so iniquity is transmitted. What vast responsibility comes upon parents in view of this subject!

Oh, make your home the brightest place on earth, if you would charm your children to the high path of virtue, and rectitude, and religion! Do not always turn the blinds the wrong way. Let the light which puts gold on the gentian and spots the pansy pour into your dwellings. Do not expect the little feet to keep step to a dead march. Do not cover up your walls with such pictures as West's "Death on a Pale Horse," or Tintoretto's "Massacre of the Innocents."

* Before the sermon Dr. Talmage gave the right hand of fellowship to thirty-one new members, making the present membership of the Tabernacle Church over thirty-three hundred and fifty.

rather cover them, if you have pictures, with "The Hawking Party," and "The Mill by the Mountain Stream," and "The Fox Hunt," and "The Children Amid Flowers," and "The Harvest Scene," and "The Saturday Night Marketing."

CHEERFUL HOMES.

Get you no hint of cheerfulness from grass-opper's leap, and lamb's frisk, and quail's whistle, and garrulous streamlet, which from the rock at the mountain-top clear down to the meadow ferns under the shadow of the steep, comes looking for the steepest place to leap off to, and talking just to hear itself talk? If all the skies hurtled with tempest and everlasting storm wandered over the sea, and every mountain stream went raving mad, frothing at the mouth with mud foam, and there were nothing but simooms blowing among the hills, and there were neither lark's carol nor humming-bird's fill, nor waterfall's dash, but only a bear's bark, and panther's scream, and wolf's howl, then you might well gather into your homes only the shadows. But when God has strewn the earth and the heavens with beauty and with gladness, let us take into our home circles all innocent hilarity, all brightness, and all good cheer. A dark home makes bad boys and bad girls in preparation for bad men and bad women.

Above all, my friends, take into your homes Christian principle. Can it be that in any of the comfortable homes of my congregation the voice of prayer is never lifted? What! No supplication at night for protection? What! No thanksgiving in the morning for care? How, my brother, my sister, will you answer God in the Day of Judgment, with reference to your children? It is a plain question, and therefore ask it. In the tenth chapter of Jeremiah God says He will pour out His fury upon the families that call not upon His name. O parents! when you are dead and gone, and the moss is covering the inscription of the tombstone, will your children look back and think of father and mother at family prayer? Will they take the old family Bible and open it and see the mark of tears of contrition and tears of consoling promise kept by eyes long before gone out into darkness?

CHILDREN'S CURSES.

Oh, if you do not inculcate Christian principle in the hearts of your children, and you do not warn them against evil, and you do not invite them to holiness and to God, and they wander off into dissipation and into infidelity, and at last make shipwreck of their immortal soul, on their death-bed and in their Day of Judgment they will curse you! Seated by the register or the stove, what if on the wall should come out the history of your children? What a history—the mortal and immortal life of your loved ones! Every parent is writing the history of his child. He is writing it, composing it into a song or turning it into a groan.

My mind runs back to one of the best of early homes. Prayer, like a roof, over it. Peace, like an atmosphere, in it. Parents, personifications of faith in trial and comfort in darkness. The two pillars of that earthly home long ago crumbled to dust. But shall I ever forget that early home? Yes, when the flower forgets the sun that warms it. Yes, when the mariner forgets the star that guided him. Yes, when love has gone out on the heart's altar and memory has emptied its urn into forgetfulness. Then, the home of my childhood, I will forget thee! the family altar of a father's importunity and a mother's tenderness, the voices of affection, the minerals of our dead father and mother, with interlocked arms like intertwining branches of trees making a perpetual arbor of love, and peace, and kindness—then I will forget them—then and only then. You know, my brother, that a hundred times you have been kept out of the memory of such a scene as I have been describing. You have often had raging temptations, but you know what has held you with supernatural grasp. I tell you a man who has had such a good home as that never gets over it, and a man who has had a bad early home never gets over it.

Again, I remark, that home is a type of heaven. To bring us to that home Christ left His home. Far up and far back in the history of heaven there came a period when its most illustrious citizen was about to absent Himself. He was not going to sail from beach to beach; we have often done that. He was not going to put out from one hemisphere to another hemisphere; many of us have done that. But he was to sail from world to world, the spaces unexplored and the immensities untravelled. No world had ever hailed heaven, and so far as we know heaven had never hailed any other world. I think that the windows and the balconies were thronged, and that the pearline beach was crowded with those who had come to see Him sail out the harbor of light into the oceans beyond.

THE EXILE.

Out, and out, and out, and on, and on, and on, and down, and down, and down He sped, until one night, with only one to greet Him, He arrived, His disembarkation so unpretending, so quiet, that it was not known on earth until the excitement in the cloud gave intimation that something grand and glorious had happened. Who comes there? From what port did He sail? Why was this the place of His destination? I question the shepherds, I question the camel drivers, I question the angels. I have found out. He was an exile. But the world has had plenty of exiles—Abraham an exile from Ur of the Chaldees; John an exile from Ephesus; Kosciusko an exile from Poland; Mazzini an exile from Rome; Emmett an exile from Ireland; Victor Hugo an exile from France; Kossuth an exile from Hungary. But this one of whom I speak to-day had such resounding farewell and came into such chilling reception—for not even an hostler went out with his lantern to help Him in—that He is more to be celebrated than any other expatriated one of earth or heaven.

HOMESICKNESS.

It is ninety-five million miles from here to the sun, and all astronomers agree in saying that our solar system is only one of the small wheels of the great machinery of the universe, turning round some one great centre, the centre so far distant it is beyond all imagination and calculation; and if, as some think, that great centre in the distance is heaven, Christ came far from home when He came here. Have you ever thought of the homesickness of Christ? Some of you know what homesickness is, when you have been only a few weeks absent from the domestic circle. Christ was thirty-three years away from home. Some of you feel homesickness when you are a hundred or a thousand miles away from the domestic circle. Christ was more millions of miles away from home than you could calculate if all your life you did nothing but calculate. You know what it is to be homesick even amid pleasurable surroundings; but Christ slept in huts, and He was athirst, and He was a-hungered, and He was on the way from being born in another man's barn to being buried in another man's grave. I have read how the Swiss, when they are far away from their native country, at the sound of their national air get so homesick that they fall into melancholy, and sometimes they die under the homesickness. But oh, the homesickness of Christ! Poverty homesick for celestial riches! Persecution homesick for hosanna! Weariness homesick for rest! Homesick for angelic and archangelic companionship. Homesick to go out of the night, and the storm, and the world's execration, and all that homesickness suffered to get us home!

THE HOME-GATHERING.

At our best estate we are only pilgrims and strangers here. "Heaven is our home." Death will never knock at the door of that mansion, and in all that country there is not a single grave. How glad parents are in holiday times to gather their children home again! But I have noticed that there is almost always a son or a daughter absent—absent from home, perhaps absent from the country, perhaps absent from the world. Oh, how glad our Heavenly Father will be when He gets all His children home with Him in heaven! And how delightful it will be for brothers and sisters to meet after long separation! Once they parted at the door of the tomb; now they meet at the door of immortality. Once they saw only through a glass darkly; now it is face to face; corruption, incorruption; mortality, immortality. Where are now all their sins and sorrows and troubles? Overwhelmed in the Red Sea of Death while they passed through dry shod.

Gates of pearl, capstones of amethyst, thrones of dominion, do not stir my soul so much as the thought of home. Once there let earthly sorrows howl like storms and roll like seas. Home! Let thrones rot and empires wither. Home! Let the world die in earthquake struggle, and be buried amid procession of planets and dirge of spheres. Home! Let everlasting ages roll irresistible sweep. Home! No sorrow, no crying, no tears, no death. But home, sweet home, home, beautiful home, everlasting home, home with each other, home with God.

A DREAM.

One night lying on my lounge, when very tired, my children all around about me in full romp, and hilarity, and laughter—on the lounge, half awake and half asleep, I dreamed this dream: I was in a far country. It was not Persia, although more than Oriental luxuriance crowned the cities. It was not the tropics, although more than tropical fruitfulness filled the gardens. It was not Italy, although more than Italian softness filled the air. And I wandered around looking for thorns and nettles, but I found that none of them grew there, and I saw the sun rise, and I watched to see it set, but it sank not. And I saw the people in holiday attire, and I said: "When will they put off this and put on workmen's garb, and again delve in the mine or swelter at the forge?" but they never put off the holiday attire.

And I wandered in the suburbs of the city to find the place where the dead sleep, and I looked all along the line of the beautiful hills, the place where the dead might most blissfully sleep, and I saw towers and castles, but not a mausoleum or a monument or a white slab could I see. And I went into the chapel of the great town, and I said: "Where do the poor worship, and where are the hard benches on which they sit?" And the answer was made me:

"WE HAVE NO POOR

in this country." And then I wandered out to find the hovels of the destitute, and I found mansions of amber and ivory and gold; but not a tear could I see, not a sigh could I hear, and I was bewildered, and I sat down under the branches of a great tree, and I said: "Where am I? And whence comes all this scene?"

And then out from among the leaves, and up the flowery paths, and across the bright streams there came a beautiful group, thronging all about me, and as I saw them come I thought I knew their step, and as they shouted I thought I knew their voices; but then they were so gloriously arrayed in apparel such as I had never before witnessed that I bowed as stranger to stranger. But when again they clapped their hands and shouted "Welcome, welcome!" the mystery all vanished, and I found that time had gone and eternity had come, and we were all together again in our new home in heaven. And I looked around, and I said: "Are we all here?" and the voices of many generations responded "All here!" And while tears of gladness were raining down our cheeks, and the branches of the Lebanon cedars were clapping their hands, and the towers of the great city were chiming their welcome, we all together began to leap and shout and sing: "Home, home, home, home!"

PROTESTANTISM IN SYRIA. By Prof. H. W. Hulbert, of Beirut.

THE law concerning schools in the Turkish Empire is that each must have a firman from the Sultan. The fact is, that not a school in Syria, native or foreign, has such a firman, with the single exception of those schools under the management of Mrs. Mott, an English lady. This firman was obtained at the special request of the Prince of Wales, at a time when it was almost impossible for the Porte to refuse to grant a personal favor. All the other schools in Syria are at the mercy of the Turkish officials. From the Syrian Protestant College at Beirut down to the humblest common school no educational institution established by the Americans is safe. The College and the Medical School have repeatedly tried in vain to obtain firmans.

During the past year the Turkish officials, at the instigation of the Constantinople authorities, and under the orders from Damascus, have gone to work on a larger scale. Within twelve months fifteen schools have been closed, thus debarring about five hundred children from instruction. The Tripoli field has suffered the most, having lost nine schools. Sidon comes next. The decree has gone forth against a number of schools still at work, but local influences have caused a delay in the action. The total results of this government hostility are that the common schools have diminished in number, and that only 4823 pupils are receiving instruction in them, as compared with 5180 last year.

The weight of the disaster comes on the interior districts. Foreign influence is so great along the seaboard that the schools in Tripoli (city), Beirut, and Sidon remain intact. Besides this, it is to be remembered that the Lebanon district is under the special protection of the foreign Powers, and has a Christian governor, a local militia, and a Christian and Druze population. The Turkish Government cannot easily attack the American missions in this section. The Abieh station and a considerable part of the Zahleh station are untouched by Moslem opposition.

One result of these persecutions has been to show the necessity of concentration; and the probability is that the schools at the central stations will be all the larger for these troubles. The local feeling in favor of the American mission has been perceptibly increased in several sections. The people see the need of education, and are awake to the necessity of having good schools. Another result has been that, for the time at least, unusual emphasis will be placed on evangelical as distinct from educational work. The Gospel will be preached as it has never been preached before.

The annual meeting which has just closed has been one of rare concord and full of earnest consecration. The vigorous life of the younger missionaries mingles appropriately with the experience of the veterans on the field. Despite the presence of so many discouragements, there has been no hint of anything but manly advance along the lines pointed out by the hand of Providence. There are 40 American missionaries in Syria, an increase of 2 on last year. There are 187 native laborers, 3 of whom are ordained pastors, and 35 are licensed preachers. During the year 130 have been received into the churches on profession of faith, and 8 by letter. Eleven were excommunicated. During the first thirty years of its existence the Beirut church received into its membership only 42. During this past year it has had an accession of 42. The total membership of all the churches is now 1287, as compared with 1207 of last year. In 1876 the membership was 573. The number of members from the first in this field has been 1808. There are 87 preaching (19 churches) places, with congregations averaging 3891, and with 3805 in the Sunday-schools. The whole number of Protestant adherents amounts to 3977. The whole number of pupils in college, high and common schools is 6773. The total benevolent and education contributions for the year amounted to $5821. There is a strenuous call from every section of the field for more girls' schools.

The press at Beirut has never been busier: twenty-seven million pages have been printed, 87,900 volumes bound, 21,000 copies of the Scriptures sold, and $5000 is the handsome surplus in the bank. Ten new books have been printed and 10 reprinted. The revised hymn-book is just out. Professor Porter's "Ancient History" is nearly ready. A fine large reference Bible is coming out under Dr. Van Dyck's supervision. Dr. Dennis is making progress on the second volume of his "Theology," and Dr. Eddy is at work on a much-needed commentary on the Gospels. Bibles have been exported to Algiers, Tunis, Egypt, Bagdad, Morocco, and the United States.

Thus the work moves slowly on. The communion service last Sunday evening at the close of the annual meeting in Dr. Eddy's parlors was very impressive. It was not only the passover to which the tribes had come up; it was the seal and emblem of a new covenant which shall never pass away.

THE DUTY OF THE HOUR.

By Rev. Richard Chester, A.B.

Watchfulness Enjoined—Illustrations of what it Implies—Incompatibility of Watchfulness for Christ's Return and the Expectation of Intervening Events—Stages in the Second Advent as in the First—Christ's Coming "for" and "with" His Saints—Danger of Deception.

THERE is no position, with regard to His Second Advent, more strongly inculcated by our blessed Lord and His inspired apostles, than that of watchfulness. Matt. 24:42-44; 25:13; Mark 13:33-37; Luke 12:35-40; 21:36; 1 Thess. 5:6; 1 Peter 4:7, etc.

It is, therefore, very needful that we should clearly understand what it is rightly and fully to occupy and to maintain this position of watchfulness, lest we deceive ourselves, or be deceived by others, upon a subject so important. The figures and illustrations chosen and employed by the Lord Himself, and the language used by Him, are surely the best guides to us in this matter.

Is our position at all, and, if so, how far is it, analogous to and correspondent with such?

In the Gospel we find that our Lord bids His disciples (Luke 12:35-37) to be like men who, with girded loins and burning lights, are spending the night-time of their Master's absence at a wedding, in utter uncertainty as to the hour of His return, and, therefore, in

of at any moment hearing His knock at the door, in order that when they do hear it they may "open to Him immediately."

He compares His disciples (Matt. 25:1-13)—such of them as, when He comes, shall go in with Him to the marriage—or whom, as it is expressed (John 14:3). He will "receive unto Himself"—to "wise virgins" who with trimmed and burning lamps have gone forth to meet the coming Bridegroom on His way—while those whom at His Coming He will exclude from His presence, and to whom His words shall be, "I know you not," are compared to "foolish virgins" who—absent at the moment of His arrival from the company of watchers—shall, upon their subsequent effort to join it, find the Bridegroom come—the wise virgins already gone in—the door shut—and the effort to get it reopened for their admission altogether vain.

Now if these illustrations are to be understood really to mean what beyond question they seem to imply, is it not evident that we are not fully occupying this position of watchfulness in the sense in which our Lord has thus enjoined it if—aware as so many are at present that

THE SECOND ADVENT IS APPROACHING

—that the close of the present dispensation is at hand—we are nevertheless putting, as many of such are doing, either the Restoration of the Jews, or the Revelation of the last Antichrist, or any other event, or series of events, the occurrence of which must necessarily occupy some not very inconsiderable portion of time, between us and this approaching Advent?

In so doing are we not saying to ourselves and to others "It is true, solemnly, blessedly true, that the day is approaching, but there are some dark hours as yet between us and the dawn. If, therefore, any be disposed toward a little more slumber, a little more folding of the hands to sleep, there is still some short time for so doing, only they must be careful not to sleep too long." "It is true that the Master is on His return from the wedding, but He is some way off at present. It is not, therefore, positively needful to gird the loins, and light the lamps, and listen for the knock for a half-hour or so longer." "It is true that the cry has gone forth, 'Behold the Bridegroom cometh,' but He cannot be actually here for a little while as yet; there is therefore time for those who have any other pressing matter in hand to be absent for a few minutes more upon their business or their pleasure from among the number of those who are engaged in looking out for Him."

That such is far from being the actual meaning or intention of many of those who are thus regarding events as yet future, as necessarily between us and the Advent, we may rest perfectly assured. But that such is the tendency of their views, and that there is, therefore, in the maintenance of such views a very manifest divergence from and expectation which our Lord enjoins in the passages to which I have referred, seems to me almost, if not altogether, incontrovertible.

The servants were not to watch for the passing footsteps of some other guests who had been at the wedding, and whose going by might prove to them that the entertainment was at an end, and their Master, consequently, near at hand. It was for the Master Himself, His own actual presence, His own knock at the door, that they were to be in momentary expectation. Even so, it seems evident to me that it is not for preceding events, however significant or conclusive as to the actual nearness of the Advent, that we are to watch, but for the Lord Himself.

I am not aware of any passage of Scripture enjoining watchfulness for events; however, as certain predicted events do occur, they, like buds upon the fig-tree, may be, and are to be regarded by those who witness them, as betokening that "He (margin) is nigh, even at the doors" (Matt. 24:32, 33).

THE TWO STAGES.

But it will of course be asked, Are not the restoration of the Jews, the revelation of the last Antichrist, and several other most important and significant events distinctly foretold as necessarily to occur before the Second Advent? I answer, "Yes, assuredly," if by the Second Advent we mean the event foretold, Zech. 14:1-5; 11 Thess. 1:7, 11, 1-8; Rev. 19:11-21, etc., etc. But if we mean the event foretold, Matt. 24:36-44; 25:1-13; John 14:3; 1 Thess. 4:15-17, etc., etc., I venture to reply, "Most decidedly, No!"

Then it will be said, you make out two distinct Second Advents, or rather a Second and a Third Advent, of our blessed Lord. To this I reply again in the negative. No more than I make two distinct Advents out of His First Advent, which nevertheless included in it a Coming as an infant to the manger-cradle at Bethlehem, and a Coming as a full grown man to Jerusalem, to suffer and to die. There was, be it remembered, an interval, nowhere foretold, of thirty-three years between these two Comings.

There seems to me to be no reason whatsoever why the Second Advent—foretold in many passages of Scripture as one event—should not, nevertheless, consist of two or more separate, and very distinct and different acts or parts, with an interval or intervals between them, any more than there was why the First Advent—spoken of in Holy Scripture before it took place—and still continually spoken of by us in like manner as one event, should not have consisted, as we know that it did consist, of or parts such as I have mentioned with intervals, unforgettably both as to existence and duration, between. The Lord will come for His saints "to receive them to Himself" (John 14:3; 1 Thess. 4:15-17; 1 Cor. 15:51, 52). He will come subsequently with His saints (Zech. 14:1-5; Jude 14, 15; Rev. 19:11-15). Why may there not be an interval between these? The harmony of Holy Scripture, or rather of the mind and purposes of God as revealed in Holy Scripture, required this in the one instance in order to its fulfilment. Does it not seem to do so equally in the other?

Why may not many, we know not how many, events predicted to occur before His descent upon the Mount of Olives with His saints, occur during an interval between His so doing, and His previous descent for them to the air? May we not be wrong if we suppose that the Lord cannot come again until the Jews shall have been restored, and the "Man of Sin" revealed? May God, the Holy Spirit, guide us into all truth.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Message on a Post-card.—At a recent meeting the Rev. J. B. Figgis observed: "A gentleman who had charge of a Bible-class went away for his holidays, and after he had been gone for some time he received word from his class. It was not a long letter, but it was something which pleased him far better. On a post-card were written these words: 'Kept by the power of God.' How these simple words cheered that teacher's heart! My dear friends, can you send such a message to your divine Teacher? Can you say you are kept by the power of God? If you can happy are you."

A Soldier's Noble Wife.—"Speaking with an old soldier who was dying in the Vauxhall Hospital, I said to his wife, who was then easing the dying soldier's bed, 'God has blessed you with a good wife, Robert.' He put his arms around her neck, and raised himself slightly on his pillow, and looking up into her face with ineffable tenderness, he said, 'No one ever had a better, sir. No one knows what she has been to me. Once when I was in the trenches she braved all the bullets of the Russians to bring me a little water. She has often—but here death finished the poor fellow's story, and as long as his soul was in his body his eyes were never turned aside from his wife's face. That look of love he carried with him into the presence of his Saviour, and she will know him by it when they meet again on a brighter shore.'"

A Reminiscence of Inkerman.—"One day an old soldier was seen weeping by a comrade's grave. Having a little leisure I stepped up to him, and asked him why he was so downcast. 'Ah, sir,' he said, 'I weep 'cause I feel so glad that ere long I will again grip my comrade's hand, for,' continued the old soldier, pointing to the grave, 'he gave his life for me. In his arm was the strength of ten men. At the battle of Inkerman he climbed a wall as we were charging up the hill, and stood on the top till he had passed the last man of our company up, and then—and then he fell down dead, with several bullets in his body.' No wonder that the old man wept. Sinner, have you ever wept over One who gave His life for you, suffering the terrible agony of the cross that you might be a partaker of His glory?"

Sudden Death of a Wealthy Worldling.—"I knew a young man who, after he was brought to the Lord, went about telling others of His love and what He had found in Christ. His father was displeased with him, and told him if he did not give up this practice he would cut him off from all hereditary rights. But the young man was faithful to his God, and would not give up speaking of God's love, preferring to be rich toward God to possessing the wealth of the world. The father was fully resolved in carrying out his threat, and one night arranged with two friends to come in the morning and witness the signing of his property away from his son. But, in the morning, the father was found dead in bed, so the son inherited all. Now, I do not say that the Lord always works in this way, but I do know that there is nothing too hard for the Lord. Jeremiah says: 'Ah, Lord God! Behold Thou hast made the heaven and the earth by Thy great power and stretched-out arm, and there is nothing too hard for Thee.'"

A Good Confession by a Chinese Boy.—"Hudson Taylor, the founder of the China Inland Mission, used to tell an interesting incident of a little fellow in China who was brought to love the Lord Jesus. His grandfather was not at all pleased at this, and tried to keep the boy from the missionary meeting, sending him away to watch the sheep on the hill. 'I will go, grandfather,' said the boy, with a merry twinkle in his eyes, 'for God is just as much there with the cattle and the sheep upon the hill as He is down there with the missionaries.' Some time after this, when he was joining the church, he was asked where the Lord had come from and what He had done for him. 'He came down from heaven and died for me,' was the boy's reply. Again he was asked, 'And where is He now?' Laying his hand upon his heart, and looking up into his questioner's face, he said: 'Why, He is here.'"

A Minister's Death-Bed Confession.—Mr. Fraser related: "I heard of an Edinburgh minister, the Rev. Mr. Davidson, who had done a great deal of good in his lifetime, but at last that godly man was called to die. On his death-bed he sent for one whom he heard went from death-bed to death-bed, taking down the last expressions of the dying. He lay calmly waiting the arrival of his guest, and that individual, after some necessary delay, entered the chamber of the dying man, who by that time had almost expired. In feeble accents the minister said: 'I hear you take down the last expressions of the dying; I will give you mine. I have taken my good deeds and all my bad deeds to the Lord Jesus Christ, and He has washed me and cleansed me in His own precious blood, which alone atones for all my sins.' Thus the minister passed into glory, to be forever with the Lord. 'Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord.'"

THE DISCOURSE.

[Then may be read the following, or any other short discourse. The reader may enlarge upon any sentence, or introduce other matter. The paragraph divisions and italics will assist.]

Text: "Because that your faith groweth exceedingly." (II Thess. 1:3).

Paul never flattered, but he praised.

It is right to acknowledge the graces of our friends, and thank God for them.

No grace like faith. It is the root grace. The others spring therefrom.

Without faith there can be no hope, no charity, no fidelity, no courage.

In all parts a Christian must grow, not only in trunk, branches, and fruit, but also in the root. How can the other graces grow if faith stop? An oak would perish if the growth of the root did not keep pace with the growth of the upper portions?

The disciples prayed, "Lord, increase our faith."

Faith must grow or diminish. It will not stand still.

We should seek to grow in grace exceedingly; for then:

1. Our other graces grow. See how Paul recognizes the other accompanying growth of their charity and the patience of the Thessalonians. Have you less love for the brethren? Has not, then, your faith weakened? Are you more impatient under persecutions and tribulations? Has not your faith slackened? Do not try to increase your charity and patience, but labor for the growth of your faith, and all the other things will come richly.

2. The more peace of soul. "Peace in believing." The Christian more and more commits his ways to God, more and more trusts a gracious Providence, which he cannot understand. He does not make haste.

3. The more courage. He does not meet his spiritual foes in his own strength, but resting on all the resources of Omnipotence. More and more he believes that all there is in Christ stands pledged to bring him off more than conqueror.

4. The more fit for Heaven. His faith wraps the spiritual world more closely about his spirit. He lives as seeing Him that is invisible. While he has growing faith in the things which are unseen and eternal, more and more his light affliction, which is but for a moment, is working out for him a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, and is fitting him therefor.

[The Lord's Prayer should be used somewhere in each service, and the service may be closed with the "Gloria" or other Doxology.]

AFTERNOON TALK.

[A service may be held, and the following discourse read:]

SEASON OF PRAYER.

By Bishop McTear,

"My voice shalt thou hear in the morning, O Lord; in the morning will I direct my prayer unto Thee, and will look up" (Ps. 5:3).

If it were so that you could pray only once in the day, that one time should be "in the morning." Then the mind is freest from thought, the soul from sorrow, and the flesh from weariness. Then the feelings of devotion spring up with most freshness as the lark rises upon the wing with a song.

We ought to pray often. The Psalmist agrees with the common estimate that food for the spirit is needed as often as food for the body: "Evening, and morning, and at noon, will I pray, and cry aloud; and He shall hear my voice." Beyond that he was sometimes carried by a grateful sense of divine goodness: "Seven times a day do I praise Thee, because of Thy righteous judgments."

In the press of business there are those who excuse themselves from family prayers, and even from private devotion. They hurry out to undertake the labor that waits for them, or to begin the long journey. But they hold prayers at night, when they have leisure. Then, too, perhaps, they have a sense of danger and the need of protection; for most grown people, like children, are afraid of darkness.

But, think of it! How many dangers beset you in a day's work, or pleasure, or travel? You return in the evening too often, alas! burdened with a sense of remissness, if not of guilt, and your prayer is for forgiveness. In the morning, before crossing the threshold, it had been better to seek grace for trials, temptations and duties. Who can tell what a day will bring forth! How can you venture upon it without the guard and the girding of prayer to Him who sees the end from the beginning? In the morning the day's history is unwritten; at night, the record is made up, and the error of a moment may be the grief of a lifetime.

Begin every day by looking up. Look up, to give thanks for the care of Providence under which you slept safely. Look up, to obtain grace to help you and to keep you through all your waking hours. Look up, for guidance, and all the good gifts that come down from above. Look up, and morally maintain this attitude all the day long.

VISIONS OF FAITH.

The child-like faith that asks not sight,
Waits not for wonder or for sign,
Believes, because it loves aright,
Shall see things greater, things divine,
Heaven to that gaze shall open wide,
And brightest angels, to and fro,
On messages of love shall glide

"Twixt God above and Christ below.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President's Message on the Question of suspensions, which was sent to the Senate last week, defines his attitude in the dispute. Mr. Edmunds denounced the message in strong language, so that it is probable we shall soon have an opportunity of learning the exact truth about the issue, and precisely on what grounds the Senate is opposed to the President. Mr. Cleveland's message shows no prospect of his yielding. He contends that the Constitution gives to him and him alone the sole right of removal or suspension of an official, and that as to the papers demanded, he is ready to send to the Senate all papers that are undoubtedly official, but as to the large body of papers communicated voluntarily by private citizens beyond the control of the Government, and intended to aid the President in the discharge of the function of suspension, he does not feel at liberty to send them. Many of them, he says, were confidential; many were entirely disregarded. To submit them to the Senate would be misleading, even if it had a right to them, which the President denies. This statement indicates that certain suspicions generally entertained are correct. Officials removed for party reasons are submitting quietly, but where an official has been removed "for cause" he is anxious to know for what cause, and also to ascertain whether he has been discharged because an enemy has traduced him. The President seems little likely to give up the papers. If he did, some curious exposures would probably be made, showing the kind of influence to which he has been subjected.

The Claim of the Chinese Government for Indemnity for the Wyoming massacres was submitted to Congress by the President on March 2d. It appears that the Government is not technically liable to make good the losses sustained by the Chinese. The treaty between this country and China binds the Chinese Government to indemnify American citizens suffering by riot in China, but the clause defining the obligations of the Washington Government says only that it shall "exert all its power to devise measures for the protection" of Chinese settlers, "and to secure to them the same rights, privileges, immunities, and exemptions as may be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation." But this agreement does not explicitly stipulate for indemnity being paid, and it seems that Mr. Evarts and Mr. Blaine, when they were respectively Secretaries of State, availed themselves of the vagueness of the clause. The President reviews the circumstances of the recent riots, and commends to the favorable consideration of Congress a suggestion of Secretary Bayard that, considering "the entire absence of provocation or contribution on the part of the victims, the Executive may be induced to bring the matter to the benevolent consideration of the Congress, in order that the body, in its high discretion, may direct the bounty of the Government in aid of innocent and peaceful strangers whose maltreatment has brought discredit upon the country." It may be hoped that Congress will act upon the suggestion, even though we are not bound by treaty. The claim for indemnity is just, and should be discharged. The tricks of the smart legal practitioner, which characterized the policy of Mr. Evarts while in office, are a stain on our national honor. It is righteousness that exalts a nation (Prov. 14 : 34).

Labor Troubles in New York Culminated on Thursday in a riotous demonstration that for some hours threatened to be serious. The car-drivers and conductors in the employ of the Dry Dock Company, which operates three lines of surface cars, agitated some time ago for a reduction in their hours of work. They were required to work sixteen hours a day, which they naturally regarded as unreasonable. Some concessions were made, but it was found that the company was preparing to discharge the leaders of the agitation. A strike was therefore ordered, and on Wednesday the men obeyed. The failure to run the cars, however, would invalidate the company's charter, and therefore on Thursday an effort was made by the company to send one car over the line. The attempt was resisted by the men and sympathizers with them in a variety of ingenious ways. Cartloads of coal were dumped across the tracks, logs of wood were laid in the way, the car itself was lifted off the rails, and finally cars belonging to other companies were lifted up bodily and laid carefully on their sides across the tracks. The mob increased until it became dangerous. Then the reserves of police were called out and twelve hundred policemen were in Grand Street at once, trying to get that car through. There was general sympathy on the part of the citizens with the men and against the company. Some rough work was done, but the police, with their formidable night-clubs, eventually piloted the car across town and back again to save the charter.

A General Strike of all Car Conductors and drivers was ordered by the Union on the following day (Friday) on all surface lines, to continue until the demands of the Dry Dock men were granted. For ten hours there was not a surface car running on any of the thirty-one roads in the city. Sixteen thousand men were on strike, but there was no disorder. More than that, lest the horses should suffer, the men voluntarily sent a force to every stable to feed and water them. The pressure of the union was too strong for the company, and at two o'clock it yielded. The men had been kept together, were perfectly sober, and went on duty promptly. Twelve hours are in future to constitute a day's work, and the men, some of whom have children whom they have never seen awake for years, will have an opportunity of becoming acquainted with their wives and families. There was also a strike in Brooklyn, as the man known as "Deacon" Richardson, who controls the Dry Dock Company in New York also controls companies operating seven roads in Brooklyn, and he had made himself as obnoxious to his employes there as in New York. The concessions made apply to both cities.

A Remarkable Interview with Mr. Froude, the eminent historian, was cabled to the New York Herald on Friday last. It was on the subject of Ireland, in which Mr. Froude takes great interest. His views have not changed materially from those he expressed in New York fourteen years ago. He still believes that home rule would be a misfortune for both England and Ireland. Nevertheless he thinks home rule is inevitable. He believes, that when once it is established the Irish will quarrel among themselves, and England will have to prevent anarchy by a re-conquest. These views will be unpopular on this side, but some other views expressed by Mr. Froude in the same interview will be accepted. Asked what, in his opinion, was the cause of the misery of Ireland, he said: "All the sufferings of Ireland are due to Government jobberies and exasperation of one section of the people against another. And it has been said that though Ireland were inhabited by a legion of angels, yet even these would lose their tempers if treated as the Irish have been." He appears to think that a remodelling of the British Constitution on the American pattern would prevent the Empire falling to pieces.

Mr. Gladstone Scored a Victory in the British House of Commons on Thursday last. He proposed a vote of appropriations for Ireland, when an Irish member opposed the vote on the ground that the House was unwilling to "entertain estimates for civil establishments in Ireland before being placed in possession of the policy which Her Majesty's Government intend to pursue for the restoration and maintenance of social order in the country." The object of the motion was to force the Premier's hand and to test the loyalty of the Parnellites and discontented Liberals. Mr. Gladstone refused to disclose his policy until he was ready, and a vote was taken. Mr. Gladstone's course was approved by a majority of one hundred and sixty in a full house.

A Constitutional Change that a Few Years ago would have been greeted with ridicule only was debated and voted upon in the British House of Commons last week. Mr. Labouchère, who is himself the next heir to a peerage, moved a resolution "that a hereditary chamber of legislation is inconsistent with the principle of representative government." He was supported by the extreme Liberals and the Parnellites. His opponents were members of the Liberal Administration and the Conservatives. His motion was rejected by a majority of fifty-six. Two heirs of peerages voted with him. When the numbers were announced one Member of Parliament audibly expressed an opinion that must have been in the minds of others by saying: "The handwriting on the wall."

Sentence upon Eight Rioters Convicted of participating in the disturbances in London on February 8th was pronounced on Friday last. They were tried at the Middlesex Sessions. All were condemned to penal servitude for terms ranging from one to five years. The judge defended the severity of his sentences by denouncing the "so-called popular demonstrations of workingmen." "It is well known," said his Honor, "that these demonstrations naturally tend to tumult and disorder." He would doubtless approve of an act of Parliament to suppress hunger. He has much to learn yet.

The Prospects of Republican Institutions in France assumed a more hopeful phase last week. A combined attack was made on the Government of M. de Freycinet by the Extreme Right and the Extreme Left on the Legislature. It was realized that the test of M. de Freycinet's capacity as a leader would be a severe one, and the political prophets confidently predicted his downfall. He made a brilliant speech so skilfully defending his attitude and policy that he disarmed his assailants and drew adherents from both wings of their forces. It seems possible that the great statesman for whom France has been waiting since the death of Gambetta has been found in M. de Freycinet. He will deserve the good opinion of the world if he proves able to maintain the Republic against the assaults of the anarchists on the one hand and the monarchists on the other. The question on which the vote was taken was the expulsion of the Princes. M. de Freycinet opposed their expulsion as unnecessary, and he carried his point by a majority of one hundred and fifty in a House of five hundred and forty members.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying Colored ministers with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have been received since our last acknowledgment to the amount of $14. They are as follows: From Chicago, Ill., $1; Church's Corners, Mich., $1; Rockdale, Tex., $1; Rock City, Ill., $1; Friend, $2; Denbigh, Ontario, Can., $2; Providence, R. I., $1; Brooklyn, N. An Interesting Letter from Ruthven, Essex County, Ont., has come to hand. The writer describes himself as a terrible blackguard, and from the lengthy sketch of his habits he gives he does not appear to have exaggerated. A friend who felt an interest in him urged him to subscribe for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, but he declined, having no use for a religious paper. He was, however, induced to read a few copies lent to him by his friend. Certain paragraphs attracted his notice, and he gradually began to take an interest in its pages. He tried to quit swearing and drinking, but the struggle was too hard for him. But God blessed a sermon by Dr. Talmage to his conversion, and he is now a new man. By God's grace he is now a free man of clean life. The tobacco habit was the last to be overcome, but he writes that that is now conquered, and even the desire for the weed has left him. This is only one of many letters of similar purport that we receive. We publish this because our correspondent rightly thinks that his case may encourage subscribers to lend their copies to irreligious acquaintances. He is indebted to his Christian friend's persistence in forcing the paper upon him, by God's blessing, for the salvation of his soul.

Messrs. Mateer and Parker's Labors at Sterling, Ill., have been much blessed. The work of grace had been commenced before their arrival through the labors of the pastor, Rev. A. J. Brown, who held daily services for four weeks, speaking on Saturday afternoons in the open air, when from four to six hundred men came to hear the Gospel. When the evangelists arrived the work received a further impetus. Twenty-five baptisms took place on one Sunday. Others are waiting the ordinance, and the work is still going forward. Messrs. Mateer and Parker are now at Kewanee, Ill.

The Congo Mission Recently Transferred by Mr. Grattan Guinness to the Temperance Baptist Missionary Union is threatened with abandonment. A delegation consisting of Rev. Drs. Edward Judson and Loughridge was appointed to visit and investigate the Congo Mission. It is understood that in their report they advise the discontinuance of the mission from the unhealthiness of the climate and other reasons. Rev. Dr. A. J. Gordon, of Boston, one of the Executive Committee of the Union, protests in an open letter against this course. He reminds his readers that missionary and commercial authorities concede that their seven stations hold the very key to the interior of Africa; that they were given to the Union without cost, though planted at an immense expenditure of labor, life, and money; that the field is the most needy occupied by the Union, and that twenty-one missionaries are already there.

About Twenty New Missionaries will Sail from New York on March 20th to reinforce Bishop Taylor's band in Africa. Prior to their departure special services will be held in the Central Methodist-Episcopal Church, Seventh Avenue near Fourteenth Street, New York, commencing on Sabbath 14th and continuing until Friday 19th. Services at 10.30, 2.30, and 7.30 o'clock. The missionaries and others will participate. All Christian people who are interested are cordially invited.

The Medical Missionary Society Organized by the noble and devoted Christian laborer, Dr. Dowkontt, held a public meeting on March 2d in the Broadway Tabernacle, New York. It was stated that $1400 of the $5000 needed by the mission for this year's work has already been raised. Dr. C. R. Agnew, who presided, strongly advocated the claims of the mission, and warmly praised the work accomplished and in progress.

The Rev Jacob Chamberlain, M.D., who recently returned from India, spoke of the aid he had derived in his Gospel work by his medical training, which had brought him opportunities for preaching he could have gained in no other way. Professor Long, of Roberts College, Constantinople, gave similar testimony about his work in Turkey. Dr. Dowkontt fully expects that the Lord will supply the money, for the young men who are waiting to be educated are consecrated, earnest men of good natural ability, whose labors in the foreign field would be valuable to the cause of Christ.

A Baptism in a Jail took Place on Monday, March 1st, at Atlanta, Ga. A woman who is a prisoner there became soon after her committal the mother of a female child, which was adopted by the entire prison crew. At noon on March 1st a minister, accompanied by eight women, repaired to the jail, where they were met in the jailer's office by the prisoner and her infant. The preacher asked: "What do you name this child?" "Atlanta; Miss Atlanta," was the mother's answer. The ceremony was performed, and after a few moments of talk, in which all joined, the prisoner and her babe were marched back into the cell, and the church people dispersed. So the unfortunate babe was made a nominal Christian as far as baptism could do it. The scene of the ceremony and the adoption by the prison crew are not encouraging omens for the child's future, but if, as she grows older, she realizes the meaning of the ceremony, and seeks the blessing of which it was typical, she will be preserved from the evils that threaten her (Rom. 6:4).

An Absent-minded Lady Caused some Amusement in a Washington church on February 28th. The Washington correspondent of the Inter-Ocean states that on that day the congregation of the Church of the Epiphany were astonished to see a well-known lady walk up the aisle with a pair of opera-glasses in her hand, which she carried in a most conspicuous manner. As soon as the services commenced she discovered her mistake, and her devotions were somewhat disturbed by the consciousness that other people had noticed it. She explained afterward that she usually kept her prayer-book and opera-glasses together, and in a fit of abstraction she picked up the wrong article and started for church. This incident should be a warning to people who are trying to lead double lives. The effort is a difficult one, and unless they are constantly on the alert they will fail to impose on the world. They cannot hope, however careful they are, to impose on God, whose omniscient eye detects the hypocritical pretence of sanctity (Isa. 29:15).

An Illustrious Tramp, Ninety-five Years Old, was picked up by the police of Joliet, Ill., on March 4th. He was sober, but destitute. Papers on his person showed him to be a Polish count named Lanaski. He was born in 1791, entered the French army in 1805, and took part in the battle of Austerlitz. He was in the memorable march to Moscow, and witnessed the burning of that city by the Russians. He was one of the forty-five thousand out of half a million men that returned to Poland and thence through Germany to France with Napoleon. Lanaski left the army on the abdication of Napoleon, but when the latter returned from Elba he again joined the army and fought at Waterloo. After the overthrow of Napoleon Lanaski fled to Germany, thence to Austria, where in 1831 he joined Louis Kossuth. He was captured by the Russians, exiled to Siberia, escaped, and came to the United States at the beginning of the late rebellion. Though seventy years old, he enlisted in 1861 in the Union army, and fought under Sigel until the close of the war, soon after which he obtained admission to the Milwaukee Soldiers' Home. He got tired of the Home, and wanted to go to the National Soldiers' Home in Washington, and was making his way there when arrested. The Joliet people took pity on him and sent him forward. A life of service and danger and hardship such as his should have had a more happy and glorious eventide. The old man may be excused for thinking his lot a hard one. The soldier of the Cross will never have ground for complaint. He may be poor until he dies, but he has had his joys all through his course, and an immortal crown awaits him (1 Timothy 4:7, 8).

An Attempt to Row Through Niagara Rapids is to be made this summer by two oarsmen. One of them, who has been to the falls recently to look at the place and take measurements, said: "I do not think it dangerous. The boat will have plenty of beam, a grating for a floor, and no bottom. If we fill with water we can't sink, because we will have air-tight compartments around the boat, and the water we take in will quickly disappear through the grating. One point about it is that we row with our faces toward the danger, instead of rowing in the ordinary way." They will probably be drowned in their foolhardy enterprise. Yet if there were need for them, to go over the falls, we could admire their confidence and courage. If timorous souls, dreading the time when they must cross the river of death, would exercise such faith in the Almighty Saviour as these men have in their boat, they would be saved (John 18:9).

A Child's Life was Saved by a Dog at Birmingham, Ala., recently. The Age of that city states that a little two-year-old girl, the daughter of the train-master at the railroad depot, is very fond of her father's Newfoundland dog, an affection which the animal is evidently aware of and reciprocates by constant devotion. The two are playmates, and the attachment between them is most interesting. A few days ago the dog was observed to be acting strangely. He went from one room to another until he found the mother of the child, when he rubbed himself against her hand and pulled at her dress. The lady took no notice of him, and the dog persisted in his efforts to draw her toward the door. "Go away," said the lady; "go and find Nellie." The dog went away whining. A few minutes afterward the mother went to look for her little daughter and found her lying asleep so close to a large fire that her clothes were scorched. They would have blazed had it not been for the dog, who had crouched down between her and the fire, taking care to protect her well. Marks on the child's clothing showed that the dog had tried to drag her out of danger. When he failed he interposed his own body, and the mother found him in that position whining, while the hair was being singed from his back. The child was still sleeping peacefully. We can admire such a proof of love and self-sacrifice in a dog, but we listen unmoved to the story of the Cross on which the Son of God suffered to save the world (1 Peter 2:24).

A Carpeted Ceiling in a New York Mansion is another added to the many evidences that this is an age of luxury. The owner of the mansion purchased the carpet without consulting the professional decorator who was engaged on the house. When the carpet was unrolled before him he promptly declared it to be utterly unsuitable for the room for which it was intended. The bright floral pattern was, he said, not in harmony with the predominant color in the furniture coverings, and the blue ground was pronounced a still worse defect, for it would give people the impression that the floor was flying up at them. "But what shall be done with the carpet?" asked the owner. The decorator considered until the blue ground suggested a novel idea. "Poot heem up zare," he said, pointing to the ceiling. And there the carpet, which was in one square, was put accordingly, and connoisseurs pronounce the effect "very æsthetic." The Carpet Trade Review, which narrates the incident, thinks the example is likely to be followed extensively, and rejoices in the impulse it may give to trade. Perhaps there are some wealthy people who will follow the craze, but Christians will be apt to think that rather than spend money in carpeting their ceilings it would be well to spend it in putting food on some starving family's table (1 John 3:17).

THE INVIOLEABLE LEAGUE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Nevertheless he regarded their affliction, when he heard their cry: And he remembered for them his covenant, and repented according to the multitude of his mercies."—PSALM 106: 44, 45.

Affliction the Result of Sin—Why Punishment is Withheld—The Covenant Observed—I. The Covenant Exists—Everlasting in its Nature—Deliberately Made—Ratified in Blood—Involves the Divine Glory—II. The Covenant Forgotten—In Carelessness—In Wanton Sin—In Sorrow—III. God Remembers It—IV. Let us Remember It.

THIS Psalm deserves to be read very carefully. It mentions many of the afflictions of God's ancient people, but it clearly sets forth that their afflictions were the distinct result of their rebellions and sins. It is not so with all the afflictions of God's people. It is written, "As many as I love I rebuke and chasten;" and again, "Every branch in Me that beareth fruit, He purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit." Yet it is often so to this day, that the servants of God smart because of disobedience. They are chastened for their sin; as it is written, "You only have I known of all the people of the earth; therefore I will punish you for your iniquities." Sin in a child of God cannot go unchastened.

THE ROD OF CHASTISEMENT

is included in the covenant; and if we are in the covenant, the Lord will keep His promise. "If his children forsake My law, and walk not in My judgments, then will I visit their transgression with the rod, and their iniquity with stripes."

The miseries of Israel of old were distinctly the result of their sins. They lived under a dispensation in which there was a visible reward for obedience, and a prompt temporal punishment for disobedience. Therefore one might suppose that if the people fell into affliction wilfully, and through their own fault, the Lord might see fit to leave them in it. Did they not procure it unto themselves? Yet such is the abundant compassion of our God, that as soon as ever these people, smarting under the result of their sin, began to cry to Him, "He regarded their affliction when He heard their cry." There is something very powerful about to its own parent; and God, the tenderest of all fathers, cannot bear to hear His children cry. If there be any here who are brought low and sore distressed through their own wrong-doing, let them nevertheless cry unto the Lord. Though it be because of your transgressions and your iniquities that you are afflicted, yet you may cry unto the Lord in your trouble, and He will save you out of your distresses. Turn unto the hand that wounds you, and that hand will bind you up. Turn unto the Lord in repentance, and He will turn unto you in loving-kindness.

What was the secret reason why God thus dealt with His people, and heard their cry when they were in affliction through their sin? The secret reason was, that "He remembered for them His covenant." If He looked upon His people in their sin and their sorrow, He could not see anything in them why He should have pity upon them. One divine reason prevented the infliction of justice—this, and this alone, sufficed: "He remembered for them His covenant." If He could not see anything in the erring people, or hope for anything from them, He looked to another source for a motive and an argument for mercy: He looked to the covenant which He had made of old with their father Abraham, when He said: "Surely, blessing I will bless thee, and in thee and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." Though there is nothing in the creature, there is everything in the covenant.

Now, observe, that in the text it does not say "He remembered their covenant." They stood at the foot of Sinai and said, "All these things which Thou hast commanded we will do": they willingly, eagerly, hastily, loudly entered into a covenant with God, before whose terrible thunders they trembled. But that covenant they soon broke. Within a few days they had departed from the living God, and fallen down before the image of an ox which eateth grass. The Lord doth not dwell upon the matter, since it would be to their destruction. He forgets their falseness and treachery, and casts them behind His back. But what He does remember is His covenant: "Nevertheless He remembered for them His covenant."

Dear brethren, I want to show this morning how this remembrance of the covenant on God's part is the great ground of hope to all of us who are in covenant with God. Indeed the Lord's mindfulness of His covenant is the ground of hope to every one of you, whether as yet you have embraced the Gospel promise or not. Inasmuch as God must, according to His law, look upon you with anger, on account of your sin, He hath devised a way by which He can have regard unto the voice of your cry. Remembering His covenant, He can pass by your transgressions, and receive you, as His returning children, into the bosom of His love.

I. The first head of our discourse will be this: Then

THE COVENANT EXISTS.

God cannot remember, to any practical purpose, that which does not exist. Had the covenant been repealed or abrogated, it could not have availed for God to remember it, except to strike the people into a more complete and settled despair. In love He remembered the covenant as an abiding thing, according to the word, "My covenant will I not break, nor alter the thing that is gone out of My lips."

Beloved, the covenant is in its own nature everlasting. By everything that is permanent in the universe, and by everything that is permanent in the Godhead, we are made to know that the covenant of grace is a fixed and settled thing, and abides to-day as it ever has done; for there is no variableness nor turning with Him from whom every good gift comes down. The promises in Christ Jesus are Yea and Amen, to the glory of God by us. Heaven and earth shall pass away; but not one jot or tittle of the law shall fail, much less shall the covenant of divine grace be disannulled. Thus saith the Lord: "The mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed; but my kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord that hath mercy on thee." God in remembering His covenant falls back upon everlasting and immutable things.

DELIBERATELY MADE.

Well may the covenant of grace be everlasting, for it was made with deliberation and foresight. If two persons enter into a contract, and one afterward wishes to escape from it, he may plead that he made the agreement in great haste, or under compulsion, or through being misinformed and over-persuaded; on either of these grounds he may make demurs to the fulfilment of the covenant, and thus may attempt to justify his failure to keep his word. Now, on God's part, nothing of the kind can ever be urged; for He made the covenant Himself, on His own suggestion, according to the good pleasure of His will. It was a free covenant, entered into through the love of His own heart, according to the wise counsel of His infinite mind. He made it knowing all that would happen in time or in eternity. When He made the promise that, whosoever believeth in Christ Jesus shall have everlasting life, He knew that those who believed in Christ Jesus would, nevertheless, be fallible creatures, and would commit mistakes and sins: He made the promise well knowing what believers would be.

Dear friends, every promise in the Bible is a part of the covenant. The covenant that now stands between the believer and his God is on this wise, that you take Him to be your God, and He takes you to be His people; He gives His promises to you, and you rely upon them; He will bless you in this life and perfect you in the world to come. The tenor of the covenant is not according to your deservings, but according to the greatness of the Lord's love. This covenant was made with such judicious deliberation and infallible foresight, that there is no conceivable reason why it should be revoked. God is not a man that He should lie or repent.

SOLENNLY RATIFIED.

Moreover—and this is a point to which every child of God delights to turn his eye—that covenant was sealed and ratified in the most solemn manner. Paul speaks of "the blood of the everlasting covenant;" and when we come to the communion-table we hear our Lord say, "This cup is the new covenant in my blood." Jesus has gone into heaven bearing with Him the blood of sprinkling. Can God deny His promise to His bleeding Son? Can He run back from the promise which He has made to the Only-begotten in His death? "By his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many; for He shall bear their iniquities." Can these promises fail? Impossible! The very thought would be blasphemous. A covenant which has been made in so solemn a manner, by the death of our great Surety and Sacrifice, can never be repealed, neglected, or changed.

Brethren, there has been nothing in the past to cast suspicion upon the veracity of Jehovah. Wherefore, then, should we doubt Him or distrust His covenant? "If we believe not, yet He abideth faithful: He cannot deny Himself." They that trust in the Lord, notwithstanding all the enormous weight of their sin, shall find Him faithful to His word of pardon. He will keep His word to sinners who put their trust in Him, and they shall be saved. Oh, glorious fact, the covenant still exists!

II. But, secondly, this covenant is by us. The children of Israel had quite forgotten the covenant of their God. Elijah said, "They have forsaken Thy covenant." Starting aside like a deceitful bow which fails the archer in the day of battle, they had been false to their God, and useless for those great purposes for which He had chosen and ordained them.

Are not God's people at this day chargeable with forgetting the covenant by their unspiritual carelessness? Hast thou thought of thyself, my brother, as a covenanted one, as one with whom God has entered into solemn compact, saying, "I am thy shield and thy exceeding great reward: I am God Almighty: walk before Me, and be thou perfect"? Have you realized your position as in covenant with God? When you have been staggered with its wonderful condescension and blessedness, as I have often been, have you not soon forgotten your great obligation, and thought only of earthly things? Have you not doubted your God because you have forgotten His covenant? Let it be realized by us, and not passed over in a wicked carelessness, that as many as believe in Christ Jesus are in covenant with God, and He has promised not to turn away from doing them good.

WANTON SIN.

Sometimes, too—and in the case of Israel it was so—we get away from that covenant by wanton sin, or by negligent omission of most delightful duty. I need not go into the story of Israel again. You see in this Psalm how they transgressed. They took no notice of the covenant they had made with God; but violated all His precepts. May I ask whether we have not been guilty of this same sin? May not each man bury his face in his hands as he confesses, "My God, Thou knowest how often I have acted as if I were not in covenant with Thee. I have lived as if I were my own master, instead of yielding myself wholly to Thy service. I have sometimes acted as a man of the world would have done, and not as one that belonged to Christ"? Be ashamed and be confounded for all this; and then wonder and admire that still that covenant stands, and the Lord has not recalled His gracious promises.

These people had forgotten their God for another reason, namely, in the depth of their sorrow. A great sorrow stuns men, and makes them forget the best sources of consolation. A little blow will cause great pain; but I have frequently heard in reports of assaults that far more serious blows have occasioned no pain whatever, because they have destroyed consciousness. So do extreme distresses rob men of their wits, and cause them to forget the means of relief. Under the chastening rod, the smart is remembered, and the healing promise is forgotten. According to the covenant, God is to be everything to you. The covenant does not stipulate that you shall not lose your friends, nor does it promise that you shall not lose your property, nor that you shall have no sickness; the covenant is that God will be everything to you; take care that you use Him as such.

III. Though we forget the covenant, yet

GOD REMEMBERS

His covenant. He remembers it practically, that is, He puts it into effect; and in this case He did so by repenting "according to the multitude of His mercies." He had formerly smitten them, but now He puts the rod away. He made His people to be pitied of all them that carried them away captive. He came to their relief and succor. And this is just what God will do with you, my afflicted friend, if you turn to Him with cries and tears, and a humble, penitent faith. He will remember for you His covenant by acting in a covenant way toward you, according to that word in the book of Zechariah, "As for thee also, by the blood of thy covenant, I have sent forth thy prisoners out of the pit wherein is no water."

See how readily God turns to this covenant. You can be sure that He delights in it; for no sooner do His children cry than He at once remembers for them His covenant. It was only a cry forced from them by misery; but instead of upbraiding them for the past, and shutting out their cry, He straightway remembered His covenant. When a man is easily reminded of a thing, it shows that it is agreeable to him to think of it. We are sure that God's heart is much wrapped up in the covenant of grace, since the feeble cries of His children remind Him of it.

A WAYWARD BOY.

I think, however, the reason why God remembers His covenant most of all is because He remembers with whom He made it. A certain man had lived abroad for a while, and there he found a friend with whom for years he enjoyed delightful fellowship. In due time he returned to England, to carry on a business; but he never forgot his friend. He had promised, and entered into brotherly covenant, that he would help his friend's family, and so, in due season, he received into his employment the young son of his old friend; and he was minded to instruct him, and help him, and promote his interests. He had given his friend his right hand, and said, "Trust your boy with me; I will see him through." The youth comes to London, and enters the service of his father's friend, with every prospect bright before him; but, alas! he proves unworthy; he falls into all sorts of vices and follies, and grieves his friend—his father's friend. His employer says: "I shall be glad to get rid of this fellow; he is a burden to me. I cannot advance him, he is unworthy of my favor."

See how loath he is to deal severely with him, for his father's sake! He calls him into his private room, and pleads and reasons with him. He says: "I have borne more with you than with any one else upon my establishment. Remember, it is for your father's sake. Had it not been for my promise to your father, I should have dismissed you long ago." One day he cries: "I really must dismiss him; he must go." But he thinks of the father, and of their days of fond familiarity with each other, and he cannot bear to deal hardly with the son of such a man, and therefore he says: "I will try him again; I will still bear with him, for my promise's sake, which I made to his father." Now I am sure it was so with God and the seed of Abraham.

These people had revolted and rebelled continually; but the Lord remembered Abraham, His friend. A memory rose before the divine mind of the faithful man lifting the knife to slay his only son, Isaac, in obedience to the Most High. As the Lord saw that act of believing obedience he seemed to say: "I will have pity on his offspring still; they are the most undeserving and provoking people that ever breathed; but I have entered into a covenant with Abraham, my friend, and therefore I will have pity upon them." The fact is, with regard to the great God and you and me, that He would often say, "I must destroy them;" but then He thinks of His dear Son upon the cross, He hears ringing through the midnight of that great day of sorrow, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" and the great heart of God is moved to pity us because of the death of His Son. There is merit enough in Jesus to remove all the demerit of our sins.

IV. I will finish with this last point, which I am sure you will feel to be of the utmost importance. If God remembers for us His covenant,

LET US REMEMBER IT.

You that are the Lord's covenanted ones, think of the sacred promise, and begin to enjoy it, and live upon it practically. What is the covenant? Here is one form of it: "I am God Almighty; walk before Me, and be thou perfect." That is an early and condensed shape of it; that is to say, the Lord God Almighty gives Himself up to be our portion, and we are to yield ourselves to Him, to walk before Him in perfect obedience.

This also is the covenant: "I will be their God, and they shall be My people." Come, beloved, make God your God. This meaneth—make God your everything. Say not, "I am poor." Not so, for God is yours, and so all things are yours. Say not, "I am weak." Not so, God Almighty is yours; when you are weak, then you are strong. "But I have no wisdom." Is not the Lord Jesus made of God unto us wisdom, righteousness, and sanctification? He that hath God hath everything. Wilt thou belittle thy God and limit the Holy One of Israel? Come, find thine all in God. This is thy part of the covenant, to accept God as being to thee what He says He is.

In this covenant it is incumbent that we rest alone in our God. You have not taken God to be your God, if you cannot be content with Him alone. Abraham forsook everything for God. He went to a country he had never seen, followed a path that had never been mapped out, and God said to him: "Fear not, Abram; I am thy shield," and so He was. Abraham once lamented that he had no seed, and that the steward of his house was his only heir; but the Lord who had promised him a seed yet said to him, "I am thy exceeding great reward." Not the seed, but his God, must be his joy and crown; and Abraham felt it was so, and therefore stood ready to surrender that seed, if the Lord commanded.

THE SECRET.

That is what the Lord would have you do, beloved. Look not to what is seen with the eye; listen not to what is heard with the ear; live thou in the secret place of the tabernacle of the Most High, in the place where faith takes the place of sense. Endure as seeing Him who is invisible. Penetrate into the substance which is unseen, and pass by the shadow which is all that sense can discern. Live on the living God; and then thou knowest the secret of the covenant; thy soul shall dwell at ease, and thy seed shall inherit the earth. Thy soul shalt be satisfied as with marrow and fatness, and thou shalt praise the Lord with joyful lips.

Remember, lastly, in order to look to this covenant well, that you must give yourselves wholly up to God. "Seek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness." Live only to glorify God. Have no other aim or object but your God. Brother, if God give thee much, glorify Him with it by thy generous consecration; if He take it away, glorify Him by thy patience under loss. Wherever thou art, be thou ever aiming to love thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and thy neighbor as thyself, and verily it shall be well with thee, and blessed shalt thou be, for God will remember for thee His covenant.

I wish that the unconverted here would desire to be concerned in this covenant. If you do so, the very desire is the gift of divine grace. Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou hast entered into covenant with God. He that hath faith in the Lord Jesus is a child of the father of the faithful, and therefore he is concerned in the covenant which God made with Abraham and his spiritual seed. O Lord, of these poor stony hearts raise up children unto Abraham, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

EVOLUTION:

A Scotch Verdict, by the Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D. A very useful privilege is enjoyed by Scotch juries which we are not aware that the juries of any other land enjoy. In America and England a jury has only two alternatives in deciding the fate of a prisoner. It must pronounce him "Guilty" or "Not Guilty." In Scotland the jury is allowed to bring in a verdict of "Not Proven" when it has reason to doubt the innocence of the accused man but has not heard conclusive evidence of his guilt. Its effect is practically the same as a verdict of "Not Guilty" so far as it saves the accused from punishment, but it does not vindicate his character as a declaration of "Not Guilty" would do. Dr. Deems avails himself of this verdict in considering the claims on behalf of evolution. Having honestly and carefully studied the arguments advanced by the evolutionists, he dismisses them, so far as he is concerned, with the Scotch verdict. He declares that in his judgment they have failed to convince him that evolution is true. That is a very fair and honest attitude to take. He does not, as so many have done, undertake to prove a negative; but he shows that the evidence submitted in proof of the theory is insufficient for the purpose. He points out the flaws in it, shows that much of it is mere conjecture; that there are contradictions in it; that much of it is in opposition to known facts, and also that there are phenomena for which if it were true it ought to account, but for which it furnishes no explanation whatever. The quotations cited by Dr. Deems prove that he has not arrived at this conclusion without a careful examination of the evidence in favor of evolution. He has evidently studied it attentively and with a sincere desire to form an impartial opinion. There is the stamp of honesty on every one of his ably-written pages which will commend them to the respect of every intelligent reader. The little volume is a masterly analysis of the case which will do more good than ten times the quantity of empty declamation and silly jokes, which impose only on superficial minds. Pp. 108; price 20 cents. Published by John W. Lovell & Company, New York.

THE CHURCH

is the title of one of two lectures by John Stuart Blackie, contained in a small volume entitled "What does History Teach?" The first lecture is upon the State, in which Professor Blackie has some vigorous criticism on our own form of government, toward which he apparently fears the public opinion of his own country is tending. He is, however, an honest critic, and therefore his criticism is valuable as the words of a faithful friend. The evils at which he points the finger of warning do undoubtedly exist among us, but we cannot accept the inference the author rather implies than states, that they would be cured by the adoption of a constitution similar to the British. The United States being free from the burden of king and aristocracy, are little likely to retrograde to so low a condition of mental capacity as to adopt such a remedy for their troubles. In his second lecture on the Church Professor Blackie is more sensible. He is upon his own ground, and understands the case without British prejudice. What does history teach us about the Church? There are many valuable lessons about it which the author points out with lucidity and power. Principal among them is the evil of the Church drawing money and prestige from the State. Mr. Blackie realizes that such a league must demoralize the Church, and he cites historical facts in proof of his assertion. The evil of intolerance is another warning illustrated repeatedly in history. Professor Blackie mentions several others which are inimical to the progress of the Church, and which history clearly shows are to be avoided. The two lectures are full of earnest practical thought, and will be read with interest and profit. Pp. 123; price 75c. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons.

MR. C. H. SPURGEON ON PREACHING.

BEFORE leaving for Mentone Mr. Spurgeon, in a racy address, warned his students against indulging in long sermons. A few extracts from the address, which has been published, will be found interesting. "Very seldom," says Mr. Spurgeon, "do we hear any complaint as to the undue shortness of discourses; the tendency is all the other way. Why do ministers preach long sermons? Is it for their own pleasure; or is it for the pleasure of the people? If it is the latter, they certainly are grievously mistaken; and if it is the former, they might practise a little self-denial. Sermons ought never to be measured by the yard-stick or the clock; but they ought to be measured by this

ONE SIMPLE RULE,

'have done when you have done.' Don't be particular about how you come to a close, but be a great deal more concerned not to keep on till your discourse dies like a candle which cannot give another flicker. If you multiply words, you will spoil what you have done. Strike while the iron is hot, but do not keep on striking till the iron grows cold; though that is what many do. They hit the nail on the head, and drive it in; and then go on hammering till they split the board, and the nail drops out. They preach their people into a good frame of mind, and then preach them out of it."

After enjoining his students not to attempt to say all they know every time they preach, but to "reserve a potato for the next meal," Mr. Spurgeon goes on:

"I would recommend my young brethren, as much as possible, to compress and condense. When you have obtained a quantity of good thoughts, boil them down. Enough is as good as a feast, whether the diet be for the body or for the soul. It may tend to brevity if we carefully exclude every syllable which ministers to display.

If the finery and the fireworks are thrown overboard, there will be the more room in the vessel for valuable freight.

"Once more let me hint to you that to make your hearers hope that you are about to close, and then go on again. I have suffered this wrong from brethren at the prayer-meeting. A certain divine, who is still in the body, is never very lively, but he has great gifts of holding on. When you think he has done, he issues a supplement, which is almost always headed, 'Another blessed thought!' His hearers are apt to have thoughts which are not 'blessed'; and would often agree with the American who said, 'Oh, that the man would quit!'"

A BOYCOTTER'S COURT.

THE practice of boycotting obnoxious persons is one of the most remarkable developments of these days, and is doubtless with us to stay, for good and evil. It has been tried in this country with varying success on firms who, acting within the letter of the law, acted unjustly to their employes. In some cases it has brought about a better state of things; in others, where the boycotted persons have been determined men, it has only aggravated the ill-feeling.

In Ireland it has been carried to its extreme limits. The boycott there is applied directly and indirectly. When a person is boycotted no one must have dealings of any kind with him, on pain of sharing in his punishment.

The scene depicted in the illustration is a common one in Ireland. The boycotter's court, presided over by the Roman Catholic priest of the parish, is assembled in the sacristy of the church, at Grane, Kilkenny County. There is the accused—a widow who keeps a small store, and has found it all too small to keep her. She is charged with having sold goods to boycotted persons, certain emergency men who have brought the boycott upon themselves by working for a boycotted landlord. The widow protests that she did not know that her customers were under the interdict when she supplied them with the goods. She makes out her case, and after exacting from her solemn promises for the future, she is dismissed with a caution, and after her narrow escape is little likely to offend again.

A LEARNED INEBRIATE'S WARNING.

AN old man was plodding along a country road one bright summer day. His steps were uncertain, and he made little excursions out of the path, and sometimes two or three quick steps would follow one slow, dignified stride. Yes, the old man was drunk, and not too drunk to be aware of it. There is a stage of intoxication in which the man believes himself sober, and resents the imputation of drunkenness as an insult. But Will Joyce had not reached that stage. He knew what the unsteady gait meant, even if he had forgotten how many glasses of whiskey he had drunk. It was toilsome work walking in that condition, and Joyce knew that if any one was there to see him they, too, would know that he was drunk. And some people were coming, too—Joyce heard them behind him—boys, apparently, by their voices and merry laughter. Joyce saw a tree near, and steered for it as steadily as he could. He braced himself up against it till the boys should pass.

"Holding the tree up, old boy?" asked one of the party, as they came up. They were some young men from college out on a summer ramble. Joyce could see that easily, and a vivid recollection of days long gone by, when he was just such a youth, flitted across his muddled brain. Then he was a young man of promise. The principal said so when he graduated, and predicted that he would do honor to the college. So he might have done if he had not contracted the love of whiskey. Joyce knew that, too. Old as he was, degraded as he was, he was a better scholar to-day than hundreds of men holding responsible positions in the Church and the State.

"Don't you be making jokes, young man," said Joyce. "You may be glad to hold on by something yourself some day. You ought to be ashamed to laugh at an old man's misfortune."

"Oh, it is a misfortune, is it? Sunstroke, eh? Seen the sun shine through a bottle, I suppose. Well, mind you keep in the shade. You are old enough to know better than get misfortunes like yours."

"Don't you preach," said Joyce, testily. "I know more drunk than you do sober. Book knowledge don't keep a man. Look here, you're fresh from college, but I'll bet I could beat you now in an examination. You say I ought to know; you just give me one of your college books, and I'll show you whether I know."

"Give him your Homer, Herbert. Let us see what the old fellow can do with Greek type."

There was a general smile around the group as the young man addressed produced the volume.

"That's a little poem about Troy. You've heard of Troy in New York State, I suppose? Well, that is a different Troy. Now, read us a stave or two out of my friend's book."

"What do you take me for, young man?" Joyce said, fixing a stern gaze on his flippant tormentor. "I read Homer, and almost worshipped him, before you were born. No, I don't need the book;" and in a voice husky but unflinching he recited passage after passage with an accuracy that amazed the students.

It was a scene never to be forgotten by any of the young men. With his old patched clothes and dilapidated hat, the old man, still clinging with one arm to the tree to steady himself, and gesticulating with the other, recited the grand old lines with an earnestness and depth of feeling strange to them, accustomed as they were to regard such work as drudgery.

"Thank you," said the owner of the Homer, as the old man paused. "It is a pleasure to hear you. May I ask how it is that so excellent a classical scholar as you are is—is—"

"How is it that the classical scholar is drunk and poor? Don't mind me. That is what you want to know, isn't it? I'll tell you. I am a slave. Drink has me in its grasp, and it holds me. I said just now it is my misfortune, and it is. I was weak, and I played with the demon till it had its chains around me. Now I am helpless as a child. You don't need to tell me that it is wrong. I know it is wrong. I am a fool. I have had good opportunities, and have lost them. I have been rich, and I lost it all. I had a good wife and children. My wife died broken-hearted, and my children don't acknowledge me. I am not a man. I am the possession of a fiend. Quit the liquor? No, I never shall till I die. Know? Yes, I know; I know, but I've lost the will power. I'm a wreck. Take warning by me, young men. It is the most insidious foe you have. You may be bound hand and foot before you know it. Don't touch it. Don't taste it. There's no other safe way. You may have all the learning in the world, you may have brilliant genius, but they won't save you. They did not save me. I'm lost for this world and the next, too."

The old man's voice broke, and genuine tears rolled down his cheeks. There were tears, too, in the eyes of his listeners. The young men were moved by his despair, and pitied him sincerely. They took him to his wretched home, and as they left him there they heard him calling out for more liquor to drown his misery.

A FATAL FRAUD.

AN ORIGINAL SERIAL STORY. BY LEW VANDERPOOLE.

Reunion.

THE anxiety about Myrtie told seriously upon Mrs. Vane. Day after day passed and brought no tidings from Smith the detective. Since he left St. Louis, from which he telegraphed that he was on the right track, he had been silent. It seemed to the anxious mother that she had lived years since then instead of days. She sat listlessly in her room, wearily waiting, seldom speaking to any one.

Alice Vane was thinking during those days over her past life. She could lay her finger on the precise spot at which her life had diverged from the path of rectitude; but her memory travelled farther back, and she saw that years before that day her feet had been set on slippery paths, where a slight impulse of temptation would cause her to fall.

One night long after all her household had retired to rest she sat up alone, reluctant to give up hope of receiving good news from the West. She wondered where Myrtie was, and what she was doing or suffering. Could it be possible, she asked herself, that it was through her daughter that she must endure punishment? She remembered reading of God's visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children. That would be the hardest of all to bear. Her heart was rebellious as she thought of it. She knelt and prayed that this might not be. She confessed her sins, and begged for pardon through Christ. After that there was a mental struggle lasting a long time, in the vain effort to submit herself to God's will, whatever it might be. It was useless then; but as she retired to rest she was fully resolved, in Christ's strength, to commence a new life.

Mrs. Vane astonished her son the next morning by requesting him to call upon a broker immediately after breakfast, and ask him to come and see her with the object of arranging for the sale of all her furniture. She also wrote a note to a real estate agent, directing him to sell the pretty cottage she owned in Richmond.

"Where are you going, mother?" Merton asked in amazement.

"I do not know at present, my boy," Alice said, mournfully. "I have decided to leave this place, and the future must be guided by events. I cannot see farther now than this one step, but this is clear to me."

The distress on his mother's face was plainly visible to the young man. Besides distress there was, too, a look of distraction which alarmed him. He feared that her reason was tottering. The calm, quiet, easy woman who was willing to let her life be guided by those about her, who had never, in his recollection, initiated any decided step, but had always looked to some one else for guidance, was the last person in the world that he would have expected to take so important a step without advice or consultation.

"Mother, are you not acting hastily?" he said. "You have no one to advise with now; will you not take me into your confidence?"

"Perhaps I may do so later, Merton, indeed I fully intend to do so; but for the present I must act for myself. I want you to obey me without question and afterward when I can recover my equanimity I will consult you. This thing must be done at once. I cannot bear to live in this place any longer. I must cut myself loose from all associations with the past or I shall become demented."

"Well, I will do your bidding, mother," Merton said sadly. "I think I am old enough to be trusted now, though, and it hurts me to be treated as if I were a mere child."

Alice kissed his forehead tenderly, and said: "Poor boy, I see it hurts you, but you will bear it patiently for my sake. You will understand it by and by. This decision to leave Richmond is fixed, I cannot argue that nor reconsider it. I must go and you must help me."

Merton sighed. His fears for his mother's reason were confirmed. She must be nearly insane to talk so. It would be useless as well as unkind to oppose her, however, and so he put on his hat, and went to do her bidding without further protest.

When she was alone, Alice pushed the hair back from her face, pressed her hands firmly against her throbbing temples, and prayed for help. The spiritual struggle of the night was over now, but she was weak, and needed strength for her duty. She was acting wisely at last, and she besought wisdom and strength to go forward.

It was well for her that there were active duties that must be performed, otherwise her anxiety about Myrtie would have overpowered her. She put it from her with a vigorous mental effort, and rising went through the house from room to room, noting what must be done to effect a speedy removal. When Merton returned he found her busily occupied with an energy he had never seen her display before. All hands were at work packing clothing, books, and personal belongings under Mrs. Vane's superintendence, while all articles of furniture were being arranged in readiness for the broker's arrival. The domestics seemed as much astonished at the change in Mrs. Vane as Merton had been. The indulgent, careless, but somewhat querulous mistress had suddenly become calm and firm, but they made no remark and quietly executed her orders.

"Merton," she said, as he entered, "please go to your room and pack up everything you would like to save, so that we may have no delay. I should like to be ready to leave to-morrow."

Merton obeyed silently. His treasures were not many, and were soon stowed away. Then he accompanied his mother to Myrtie's room to assist her in deciding what Myrtie would be likely to value and wish to keep. This was a harder task, for, beside the difficulty of selection, the thought of the missing girl which could be kept in abeyance in other parts of the house came back here with irresistible force on the suffering mother's heart. She sat down in the rocking-chair by her daughter's bedside and wept bitterly. It was the first sign of weakness she had displayed that day. She struggled against it ineffectually. To Merton the sight of her tears was welcome. She seemed to him more herself in that distress than before. That hard, inflexible energy was unnatural, and he was glad to see it break down.

The fit of weeping was brief, and as Alice dried her tears she felt that they had been a relief to her overburdened heart. She rose and went through her task with a softened but not less persistent firmness. Before night the cottage was scarcely recognizable; it had a cold, unoccupied look, so different from its former home-like appearance. All business connected with the sale of house and furniture was arranged, and Alice was free to go whither she would. She and Merton sat together in the room they usually occupied in the evening, and Myrtie's vacant chair alone reminded them of their one great cause for anxiety.

"You have had a busy, tiring day, mother," Merton said. "You will like to retire at once, will you not, and rest?"

"Not yet, my boy," Alice said. "I am tired physically, but I am less weary mentally than I have been in a long time. I feel that I have begun a new life, and I have hope now that it is many years since I had before. I have been content to drift along idly, taking my pleasure as I could get it, shutting my eyes to serious things, and putting aside disagreeable duties. Now, I hope I am going to live, and if Myrtie is restored to us I hope to do a mother's duty to you both as far as it can be done at this late time. Yes, it is a new life that is beginning, and I should like to begin it rightly as my dear father and mother did. Merton, I have left your grandfather's Bible out of the packing. It is to go with us, but I left it out for this night. Please get it, and read a chapter, and I will ask God to bless us."

Merton was amazed, but, as before, obeyed in silence.

"What shall I read, mother?" he said, as he returned with the volume which had been his grandfather's dearest treasure.

Alice would have liked to select something appropriate to the occasion, but she had too long been a stranger to the sacred volume to know where to find such a passage. Merton opened the book, and the leaves fell apart at a place which had evidently been a favorite one with James Gray, for the pages were discolored and worn. Alice looked at it, and for her father's sake, chose that passage. "Read there," she said, "your grandfather seems to have gained comfort from it. It may help us, too."

It was the fifty-first Psalm, and as Merton read it, Alice felt, as many another backslider has felt, that no words could ever have been written so appropriate to the case of one who, after long travelling on the hard ways of transgression, has at length returned, bruised and wounded and travel-stained to the presence of God. She could not speak for a few moments after Merton had finished reading, but at last she said: "Let us pray." And kneeling there she prayed earnestly for them both, and for the loved lost one far away in deadly peril. It was a simple, unadorned prayer, calm in its trustfulness, and subdued by the sense of unworthiness, and wonder that God would still hear one so sinful as herself.

As they were about to retire a telegram arrived. Alice opened it eagerly, for, in spite of her faith and confidence in God, the protracted suspense about Myrtie was becoming almost intolerable. The telegram was from Smith, and was very brief. "Myrtie is safe, we start for Richmond to-morrow." A fervent "Thank God" broke from Alice's lips, as she read it and there was no irreverence in the expression so often thoughtlessly uttered. In her changed state it was to God that she attributed the fulfillment of her longing.

Smith had dated from the hotel in Santa Fé, and thither a telegram was sent by Merton at Alice's request, saying that he and his mother would start for St. Louis by an early train, and meet them there. Alice cared not whither she went, and this direction would be toward Myrtie, whom she passionately longed to clasp once more to her breast. So the last night in the Richmond home was turned from a night of weeping to a night of joy.

As Merton looked at his mother the next morning as they were being whirled westward to the rendezvous, all fear of her reason failing vanished from his mind. He had never seen her look so bright and gentle and happy before. A softened, subdued air was about her that gave her mature beauty a radiance new to her then, but which would have reminded her father, could he have seen it, of the Alice of old days on the Vermont farm.

No moment in the whole of Alice Vane's eventful life could compare in happiness, she thought, with that supreme moment when her daughter was once more folded in her arms. She looked forward to it as the train approached St. Louis with feverish eagerness, and when, at last, it came, and Myrtie's kisses were rained on her face, she seemed to have realized a joy intensified by the agony of suspense that had gone before.

The faithful Crance had seen Myrtie rush into her mother's arms, had seen the first loving embrace, and then turning to Smith who also stood by, said: "I presume we ain't required here. She's safe." He and Smith left the mother and daughter together, and as the two men faced each other in the hotel corridor each man charged the other with having tears in his eyes. They were not left alone for long. Myrtie had no sooner liberated herself from her mother's clinging embrace and saluted Merton with sisterly affection than she ran eagerly down-stairs to seek Crance, who must be introduced to Mrs. Vane, and receive a mother's glad thanks for the service he had rendered. Crance was difficult to manage. He begged to be excused. Saw no need of thanks. Was unused to ladies' society. Was better where he was. Must be thinking of getting back to Santa Fé, and other objections, all of which Myrtie cut short by taking his hand and leading him to her mother, and presenting him as the man to whom she owed her deliverance.

That same night Alice insisted on making the disclosure which, she said, had weighed long enough on her heart. It was in vain that Smith and Merton, who feared that agitation might be dangerous to her after so exciting a meeting, advised her to postpone it. She would hear of no delay, and, accordingly, Myrtie and Merton and Smith, at Alice's special desire, were gathered around her. She related the story of her marriage, and her journey to Italy with her husband as has already been told in these pages, but there she paused. The strangest and saddest part of the story was known only to herself.

"I will make my confession," she said, "and I hope both you, Merton and Myrtie, will be able to forgive me. I sinned deeply, but I have suffered much. I was prostrated in Italy with a fever. Myrtie was a baby of only a few weeks old. My husband waited upon me with a woman's tenderness. I saw him failing, too, and at last he became too ill with the fever to attend me. I lost consciousness soon afterward, and was delirious for a long time. How long I do not know. When I slowly regained my power to think, my husband's cousin came to me. His name, too, was Stephen Vane. Stephen was a venerated name in the Vane family, being the name of its founder two hundred years back. We had met him in Italy soon after our arrival, but there was some estrangement between the two branches of the family, and we saw but little of him. He was sent for while I was delirious, and came to my bedside as soon as I was able to converse. He told me of my husband's death. He had died while I was delirious, and was buried, and I knew nothing of it. I could hear no more then. I had a relapse, and for many days my life was despaired of.

Gradually, with a desolate heart I crawled back to life, and then Stephen Vane came to me again. He inquired into my circumstances, found that my father had disinherited me, and that I was penniless. My husband being dead I was alone in the world with my little daughter, and without even enough money to carry us back to America. Then he proposed to me the fraud which has desolated my life. He was a widower with one child, a boy, the same age as Myrtie, and he wanted me to marry him, conceal my husband's death, and assist him to personate my husband. I was weak, ill, penniless in a strange land, and without a friend in the world. Think of my situation. It does not excuse, though it may extenuate my fault. I consented, and from that day forward the wicked, desperate man with whom I had linked myself in sin was the terror of my life. You know the rest."

"Did you visit your first husband's grave, Mrs. Vane?" Smith asked, in his quiet monotone.

"No, I was moved away from the place before I was able to walk. Stephen said it was necessary, and he would never allow me to return."

"Did it ever occur to you that he might be deceiving you?"

"Never. He could not have done so, because if my husband had lived, no one could have prevented his coming to me."

"He might have been prevented," Smith said, turning his eyes full upon Mrs. Vane's face. "I told you something about a man sane, yet shut up for years in an English lunatic asylum, whose escape so agitated Stephen Vane when he heard of it. Did you never suspect?"

"Oh, what do you mean?" said Alice, throwing up her arms with a wild cry. "Speak! Who are you?"

Smith lowered his head, and passed his hand quickly over it and his face. A wig and a large beard fell to the ground, and he rose with outstretched arms. Alice gave one swift look of recognition, and rushed into his arms, burying her face in his bosom. "My husband, my long lost husband!" was all she could say.

Many years have passed since that day of confession and forgiveness. Stephen and Alice have white hair, and their grandchildren play around their knees. Merton is a middle-age man with a wife and children of his own, and he has never developed the evil nature of his father. Myrtie has succeeded, as Crance thought she might, in civilizing him, and under her influence he has forsworn cards and liquor, and vows that no man who has such a wife as Myrtie need seek any pleasure outside his home. Alice mourns the years that were lost out of her life by her sinful acquiescence in a bad man's villainy, and laments the fraud that cost her father's life. But her husband kisses away her tears, and together they thank God that in His infinite mercy He has forgiven all, and permitted them to spend the evening of their lives in the glorious sunshine of His countenance.

THE END.

MESSIAH'S MESSENGER.

S. S. Lesson for March 21, Mal. 3: 1-6; 4: 1-6. Golden Text, 3: 1. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Message of Malachi—Direct to the Priests—Their Perfunctory Services—A Curse Threatened—God's Longsuffering to His People—The Predicted Messenger—The Prophecy of the Tribulation—The Burning and Cleansing—Signs of the Approaching End—What Tithes are Required.

MALACHI is the last of the Lord's prophets in the Old Testament. God laid upon him "The burden of the Word of the Lord to Israel:" and that burden was the universal declension of His people. They had ceased to honor God as a Father, or to fear Him as a Master. They had gone away from His ordinances; they had robbed God in tithes and offerings; their words had been stout against the Lord, insomuch that the prevailing conviction among them was: "It is vain to serve God." Yet the unwearied patience of God sent them yet this messenger, His last prophet before Messiah's coming. His chief word of was addressed to "the priests that despise My name." ~~Devotion~~ had reached such a pass among the priests that the love of money and self-interest pervaded their religion. It is true that the worship of idols had ceased; there was an outward worship of God's service at the altar; but they offered polluted bread, and offered the lame and the blind for sacrifice, contrary to the express command of God, "Whatsoever hath a blemish, that shall ye not offer; for it shall not be acceptable for you. And whosoever offereth a sacrifice of peace offerings unto the Lord. . . it shall be perfect to be accepted; there shall be no blemish therein" (Lev. 22: 20, 21). They would not so much as kindle fire on God's altar for naught, there must be some return made to them! Is this so unlike the religion of a large number in the present day? Is not often the worst part of time, strength, talent and money given to the Lord after the chief part has been devoted to self and to the world? The priests said of the table of the Lord, "What a weariness it is!" Do we never hear of ministers in our day who are quite exhausted on Monday after twice preaching on Sunday, while Salvation Army, and other such evangelists, are at work out of doors and in seven days in every week, who, instead of saying, "What a weariness it is!" would gladly do even more if time and strength admitted?

The prophet speaks solemn words in the name of the Lord to the priests and Levites who will not lay it to heart to give glory to His name, "I will curse your blessings." The priests were commissioned to bless in the name of the Lord (Num. 6: 22-27; Deut. 10: 8; 21: 5): to curse their blessings was to withhold His signature, His witness to the blessings, so that it became like "sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal" (1 Cor. 13: 1). Most touchingly Malachi says for God, "For the priests lips should keep knowledge, and they should seek the law at his mouth, for he is the messenger of the Lord of hosts. But ye are departed out of the way, ye have caused many to stumble at the law: ye have corrupted the covenant of Levi (life and peace, Mal. 2: 5) saith the Lord of hosts. Therefore have I also made you contemptible and base before all the people, according as ye have not kept My ways, but have been partial in the law." What then? Shall God abandon His people? Oh what long suffering! Behold, I will send My messenger, and he shall prepare the way before Me. There should be one satisfactory messenger yet; one who would indeed prepare His way, one of whom Jesus Himself testified, "This is he of whom it is written. Behold I send My messenger before Thy face, which shall prepare Thy way before Thee. For I say unto you, Among those that are born of women there is not a greater prophet than John the Baptist" (Luke 7: 27, 28).*

But John the Baptist was but to prepare the way for another Messenger: "And the Lord whom ye seek shall suddenly come to His temple, even whom ye delight in, behold, He shall come, saith the Lord of hosts." As in many other prophecies of the Messiah such as Isa. 63: 3; Dan. 9: 24; Micah 5: 2, 3, so here there seems to be no break made between the first and the second comings of Christ; they are spoken of as though no time had elapsed between for the period in which we are now living—the history of the Church. Undoubtedly the words which follow here refer to the coming time of the tribulation. "But who may abide the day of His coming, and who shall stand when He appeareth? for He is like a refiner's fire, and like fullers' soap." Only when Jesus comes again shall He purify the sons of Levi, the Jewish priesthood and priestly tribe, only then shall they offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness, and their offering shall be pleasant unto the Lord as in the days of old; only then will the Lord Himself be Witness, Judge and Jury against adulterers, so that social purity shall be universally established; only then shall false-swearing and all the iniquity in trade which prevails everywhere be purged; only then shall those who oppress or defraud the hireling, the widow, the fatherless and the stranger become just and upright. For then "a King shall reign in righteousness, and princes shall rule in judgment" (Isa. 32: 1).

THE BURNING AND CLEANSING.

Meanwhile the Lord has a kingdom of His own which is within us. He does now make us His temples, He does now purify the sons of Levi, for He, dwelling in our hearts, is like a refiner's fire and like fullers' soap. Where the fire is there the dross is burned, where the soap is there the uncleanness is cleansed. The dross which is burned is not there to be burned again, the uncleanness which such soap has cleansed is gone away. If it remains it has not been subjected to the fire; it has not been yielded to "the operation of God" through the Spirit who reveals Jesus to us. When He was revealed to Isaiah, the prophet became aware of his unclean lips, and he must be purified (Isa. 6: 1-7). Ezekiel saw Him, and though He was the prophet to whom the Lord's own title, "son of man," is given, yet "he fell upon his face" (Ezek. 1: 28); Daniel saw Him, and his comeliness (greatly beloved as he was) was turned in him into corruption, and he was only strengthened by the life-giving words of the Lord Himself (Dan. 10: 5-8, 19). The presence of Jesus, who is Light, reveals evil: "whatsoever doth make manifest is light" (Eph. 5: 13). There is no possibility of hiding things away from such light as the Sun of Righteousness shining in our hearts. But thank God He not only reveals but purifies those who yield themselves to be an habitation of God through the Spirit.

But this prophecy has special reference to the time of the Lord's coming, "Behold the day cometh that shall burn as an oven; and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be as

* One of whom He said (Matt. 21: 24) "If ye will receive it, this is Elias which was for to come," and of whom the angel said to Zacharias, his father, "He shall go before Him (the Lord) in the spirit and power of Elias, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just; to make ready a people prepared for the Lord" (Luke 1: 17).

stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch." Without doubt this passage refers to "The revelations of the Lord Jesus from heaven, with all angels of His power, in flaming fire, rendering vengeance to them that know not God, and to them that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus: who shall suffer punishment, even eternal destruction from the face of the Lord, and from the glory of His might, when He shall come to be glorified in His saints, and to be marvelled at in all them that believed (because our testimony unto you was believed) in that day" (II Thess. 1: 7-10, Revised Version). We have descriptions of the same event in the following Scriptures, as well as many others: Isa. 2: 10-21; 13: 9-13; 24; Jer. 25: 31-33; Zech. 38, 39; Joel 2: 1-11; 30-32; 3: 1-15; Zech. 14; Matt. 24; Mark 13; Luke 21, and a great part of the book of Revelation.

All around us we see signs of the APPROACH OF THE END.

There are signs in the heavens, there are yet more upon the earth. The Jewish people, which have been God's witnesses often, in spite of themselves, from the time of Abraham, are rising more and more into power; the Gospel is being preached as a witness among all nations. Those whose hearts are set on the things of this world may well tremble; those whose inward thought is that their houses shall continue forever, and their dwelling-places to all generations; they call their lands after their own names, are doomed to disappointment. "But unto you that fear My name shall the Sun of Righteousness arise with healing in His wings; and ye shall go forth and grow [Revised Version, gambol] as calves of the stall." "When these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh" (Luke 21: 28). The state of the Christian Church now is in many respects very similar to that of the Jews before the first coming of Christ; much outward form, much talking, many divisions; but oh how little laying to heart the state of things! But then, as now, there were those that feared the Lord, who spake often one to another, and the Lord hearkened and heard it, and a book of remembrance was written before Him for them that feared the Lord, and that thought upon His name. They were a little flock, and, in spite of all the evangelistic work, all missionary enterprise, in spite of the great increase in the number of converted people, the work does not keep pace with the increase of the population, and still the flock is a little flock.

There is one word spoken to Israel which we may nevertheless take home to us: "Bring ye all the tithes into the store-house that there may be meat in Mine house, and prove Me now herewith, saith the Lord of hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing that there shall not be room enough to receive it." What is the tithe which it is becoming for Christians to bring? A tenth? a fifth? a third? No; all we are and all we have, and all the empty vessels of unlimited faith in all His promises, for God is waiting to give us even now, even where all is so unsatisfactory, a blessing which exceeds our capacity, and runs over to others. If we give God His due, and give Him all the place in our lives, in our hearts and in our possessions, He will turn all we are and have into blessing beyond that we can ask or think, and not for ourselves only, but for others also.

THE PEACE OF GOD.

There is a peace Thy people know,
And all the world despise,
Yet sweeter 'tis than aught below,
'Tis pure and satisfies.

It comes from Thee, dear bounteous Lord,
Calm, blessed like Thine own,
It comes to those who trust Thy word,
And lean on Christ alone.

It comes to those Thy Spirit loves,
Whose sins He shows forgiven;
Whose hearts to faith and love He moves,
And seals them heirs of heaven.

It comes, free as the sunbeam's light,
When o'er the world it flies;
Calm, as the summer morning bright,
When earth in beauty lies.

O teach me, Lord, to trust in Thee,
And on Thy Christ to rest;
And give that perfect peace to me,
Shed sweetly through my breast.

NEW LIGHT ON MORMONISM.

By Mrs. ELLEN E. DICKINSON.

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY THE LATE THURLOW WEED.

"The book contains," says Mr. Joseph Cook, "much original matter, the publication and presentation of which appear to me to be highly important. Mrs. Dickinson is a relative of Solomon Spaulding, from whose stolen manuscript 'THE BOOK OF MORMON' was constructed. She has availed herself of family papers and other sources of information not heretofore used in histories of Mormonism, and produced a narrative of fascinating interest and great historical value. The facts she narrates cut up by the roots both the Josephite and the Mormonite form of the 'LATTER-DAY SAINTS.' It discusses one of the most burning topics in American current reform. It will aid essentially in eradicating a giant mischief and delusion."

It is a succinct history of this most wonderful, social, political and religious development of modern times, from its inception to the present time. One of its marked features is the particular and trustworthy account of its origin and early history, never before so accurately given. Another is the interviews had with some of the chief actors concerned in the fraudulent obtaining of Spaulding's M.S., from which Joe Smith made the Mormon Bible. These interviews are intensely interesting, and serve to illustrate the spirit of Mormonism in a most vivid light. The author's brief, graphic history does in truth fling "New Light" on this cunningly devised and stupendous system of deception, fraud and iniquity, which, in the full glare of the nineteenth century and in spite of all that legal enactment and Christian protest and influence have done, has firmly entrenched itself in our land, and is gathering proselytes by the thousand from every part of the civilized world, and is spreading its blighting influence into several States and Territories of the Union. The book will be sure to attract many readers and deepen the disgust and horror already existing in the public mind in respect to Mormonism.

THE DOVE OF PEACE.

A GEM OF BEAUTY. An Exquisitely Engraved and Colored Dove floating on the wing, upon a deep, blue sky, which forms the background, and with every feather so carefully drawn as almost to deceive the eye into the belief that it is a THING OF LIFE. Upon this background, in choice lettering is the text, "MY PEACE I GIVE UNTO YOU" etc. Upon the coming light of the morning dawn, which brightens up the background of the picture, in similar letters, is the text, "THE PEACE OF GOD WHICH PASSETH ALL UNDERSTANDING," the whole forming a perfect gem of art. Like all fine works its value consists not so much in its size 8x10, as in its beauty of detail, and it possesses the great advantage of needing no frame, being printed with a gold border upon a heavy card plate, so that it can be placed upon the table or mantel if preferred. If you want a choice ornament for your home, or a remembrance to a friend, especially to one who is sick, or troubled, cannot be equalled, either in beauty or price. REMEMBER IT CAN BE FRAMED OR NOT AS YOU PLEASE. Safely packed, we send it postage paid on receipt of Twenty-Five Cents.

Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde.

By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON, author of "The New Arabian Nights," etc. Cloth, fine library edition, gilt top, $1.00; paper, 25 cents.

"It is a work of incontestable genius. Nothing, in my judgment, by Edgar Allan Poe, to be generous, is to be compared to it; it has all his weird and eerie power, but combined with a graphic realism that immensely heightens the effect. I read it in a four-wheeled cab the other night, by the help of a reading lamp, as I travelled through miles of snow-bound streets, quite unconscious of the external circumstances of that melancholy journey. What is worth mentioning, because otherwise a good many people will miss it, is that a noble moral underlies the marvellous tale."—JAMES PAYN, in the Independent.

The Rt. Rev. SAMUEL D. FERGUSON, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Cape Palmas, Liberia.

THE intelligence now received of the hearty welcome tendered by Christians of all denominations to Bishop Ferguson on his arrival in his diocese confirms the good feeling and happy auguries called forth during his stay in America. Doubtless there were some members of the Protestant Episcopal Church who were not delighted to hear of a colored man becoming a member of the House of Bishops. There had been missionary bishops before of the colored race, as Bishop Holly, of Hayti, consecrated in 1874, but this was a different matter, as it gave Bishop Ferguson a seat in the House which Bishop Holly has not. But whatever opposition there may have been it was set aside by the consideration that the Church had need of just such a man in that place, that he was well adapted for the work, and that there was a singular fitness in placing in the hands of a colored man the Episcopal charge of the diocese. If any doubt remained as to the wisdom of the proceeding it is removed by the reception of the bishop on his landing in Liberia.

PERSONAL DETAILS.

Samuel David Ferguson was born in Charleston, S. C., in 1842. He is therefore now forty-four years old. In 1848, when he was only six years of age, he went with his parents to Liberia, on the west coast of Africa, little more than four degrees from the equator. It is a remarkable evidence of his intelligence and his spirituality that the poor and comparatively unknown lad who landed thirty-eight years ago an immigrant among strangers, should now, at the desire of the colony and with the concurrence of the prelates and Church of America, return there a consecrated bishop.

A few years—we think only two—before the arrival of the Fergusons in Africa the Protestant Episcopal Church in America had been deeply moved on the subject of foreign missionary work, and had commenced operations at Liberia. There it opened its first foreign mission. Young Ferguson was sent to the Mission to be educated. Thus his education from its first rudiments was a religious education, and in that important matter he enjoyed an advantage denied to those who are trained in the public schools of his own land. His progress was remarkable both in secular and religious knowledge. In 1862 Bishop Payne, who had oversight of the mission school, appointed him a teacher. His conduct during the three years he held that position was exemplary, and as he continued his theological studies and gave evidence of piety, he was ordained a deacon on December 28th, 1865.

His first sphere of labor was at Harper, where he was assistant to Rev. J. W. C. Duerr. Three years of earnest work in that capacity followed, at the end of which he assumed the position of rector of the parish, being ordained priest on March 15th, 1868. In addition to the ordinary duties of the rectorship he undertook the superintendence of the Cape Palmas School and Orphan Asylum, and also became business agent of the Mission. Thus he has been familiar with the field almost from the commencement of its occupation, and feels for it the intense love of the Christian for his spiritual birthplace. Having grown up there from childhood to youth, and from youth to manhood, he knows by practical experience the need of every department of labor and can feel as no stranger, however eminent, can feel the sympathy born of personal experience, which is one of the prime essentials of successful work.

RESCUE OF A CHILD.

The character of the work of a clergyman in that part of the world may be inferred from an incident which occurred at the Mission under Mr. Ferguson's charge. He related it to a friend here, who sent the account to the Church Mission News. It relates to a young girl, now in one of our schools in Africa. She is quite young, an orphan, and her life was saved from a dreadful death by a woman travelling all night with her to a Mission station, and begging the Missionary to save the poor girl.

The father of the little girl had died; the family called in the devil-doctor to find out why the man died. After some of his heathen ceremonies were performed, he announced the name of one of the man's wives, and said she had by witchcraft caused the man's death. That involved her own death.

The tribe had collected in force to witness the funeral and heathen rites of the devil-doctor. So he prepared a large bowl of strong tea, made from a native wood that was very poisonous. The poor woman was forced to drink the dreadful medicine, and, of course, soon died. Then the people wanted more of the ceremonies. So the devil-doctor said her only child, this little girl, should the next morning drink a bowl of the poison.

They went to sleep expecting the ceremonies to be renewed the next day; but in the night a woman who was very sorry for the child, knowing she was innocent, took her, and, stealing quietly through the woods took her to the Mission station. She was admitted and cared for, and, as the months passed by, the teachers found her very gentle and good in disposition. She has been baptized, and is being taught about our God. The bishop feels great interest in her, and thinks she will be one of the future mission helpers.

Mr. Ferguson's earnestness and zeal in mission work commended him both to the pastors and people; so that when, in 1884, it became necessary to elect a bishop for the see there was no man found possessing in so remarkable degree the confidence of all, as well as necessary qualifications for the office, as the Rector of St. Mark's Parish, Harper. The American House of Bishops recognized the fact, and while fully aware of the innovation they were making, they decided upon electing him to the bishopric. He was elected at the session held in Grace Church on April 24th, 1884, and soon afterward came to America.

How acceptable the action of the bishops was to the Christian laborers in the field over whom he has been given oversight is manifest from the following voluntary testimony rendered by one of them, the Rev. M. P. Keda Valentine, of Cape Palmas:

"We have cause to be thankful above measure as we see the kingdom of God taking root downward, and beginning to bear fruit upward. The election of our dear brother to the Episcopate is one of the Church's upward fruits. No fitter choice of a better qualified man could have been made, nor, in my estimation, was ever made, both in regard to his qualifications in [the management of] pecuniary matters, as well as in his faithfulness in the work which he has been called by the Church and Spirit to do—that of preaching the Cross of Christ among the heathen. In this work he has proved himself a pattern to all his brethren in the ministry, as well as to the catechists and teachers."

During the interval between his arrival in this country and his consecration, Bishop Ferguson was very fully employed in presenting the cause of his Mission before congregations in New York and elsewhere. Besides this, a missionary reception was given him at St. John's School, where there was a great gathering of the friends of the institution and of Africa, whom the bishop-elect and others addressed. One of the appointments met was for the Morning Service at St. John's Clifton, Staten Island, on the Second Sunday after Trinity. The rector, the Rev. Dr. John C. Eccleston, writes of this service: "You will be gratified to hear of the very favorable impression made by the bishop-elect of Liberia this morning, upon a rather critical congregation at my church. A large proportion of the male members are Southern gentlemen, many of them formerly slave-holders, and not altogether, as yet, 'reconstructed.' There was but one feeling, viz., that the preacher was a thoroughly earnest, godly man, peculiarly fitted for the difficult work to which he has been called. The modesty of his manner, joined with his effective style and natural eloquence, quite won the hearts of all who heard him.

"It is a pity that Dr. Ferguson could not remain six months after his consecration to canvass the churches. I answer for it there would be large results."

The wish expressed by Dr. Eccleston had been urged by members of the Foreign Committee and their secretary; but Bishop Ferguson felt that his place was in Africa, and that he ought not to delay his departure. The first Episcopal act of the new bishop was, however, performed in this country at Norfolk, Va., where, at the request of the bishop of the diocese, he confirmed seven persons.

THE CONSECRATION SERVICE

took place in Grace Church, New York, on June 24th, 1885. The church was filled with a large congregation attracted by the novelty of the occasion. A considerable sprinkling of persons of color was noticeable. The Bishops of New York, Pennsylvania, Northern New Jersey, and Long Island, took part in the service. The sermon was preached by the presiding bishop, the Right Rev. Alfred Lee, D.D., LL.D., Bishop of Delaware. In the course of his sermon Bishop Lee said:

"Enviably is the privilege, my brother, of bearing a part in doing something to help forward and hasten the regeneration of Africa. It was a son of Africa who bore the Saviour's cross on the way to Calvary. Be it yours patiently and lovingly to carry the same hallowed burden for the same dear Master. The task of Simon the Cyrenian is not yet done. We rejoice in the belief that you are here to-day in obedience to a higher call than that of man. Trusting that you will not labor unsustained by the presence, uncheered by the smile of our gracious Saviour, and that with enlarged powers abundant success will crown your efforts, we this day devoutly wish you God speed."

WELCOME TO AFRICA.

The bishop's arrival at the scene of his past and future labors is graphically described in a letter which he wrote for publication in the Spirit of Missions, from which the following is an extract: "I have met a warm reception on all sides. The first voices that greeted my ears were those of the inmates of our Orphan Asylum and Girls' School, who, descending the cape on the summit of which the institution is located, and standing on the rocks below, sang out merrily, 'Welcome Home,' as the surf-boat that was bearing me to the shore passed them, and made me forget for awhile that we were entering the bar whose foaming billows were far from being inviting. Nearing the wharf, the 'Gloria in Excelsis,' chanted joyfully by scores of men, women and children, was also heard above the noise of the waters; and, on landing, I found the Sunday-school of St. Mark's assembled there, headed by its superintendent, who made a short address, bidding me welcome. Many of the prominent citizens, including Methodists and Baptists as well as our own Church folk, were also present to receive me.

"A more formal public reception was given four days afterward, under the direction of the officers and teachers of St. Mark's. Nor were the native Christians behind in manifestations of good-will toward me. The Hoffman Institute and High School, with several ladies and gentlemen of Cavalla Station—twelve miles away—came up en masse; and after some good singing, their pastor made an address of welcome to me. The Hoffman Station folk also came, and in like manner gave me assurances of their good-will. According to their custom, they brought large bowls of palm-butter and rice (their principal article of diet) which we partook of together in token of affectionate regards.

"In the midst of all this, reflecting on what the wise king of Israel says, 'Better is the end of a thing than the beginning thereof,' and also on what another said to the king of Syria, 'Let not him that girdeth on his harness boast himself as he that putteth it off,' I rejoice with trembling.

"On Monday, the 14th inst., a meeting of Gedebe Christian men, whom I had invited from the different stations to meet me at Cavalla, was held, to settle a matter of difference that had arisen between the Christian men of Hoffman Station and those of Cavalla. After some discussion a compromise was happily effected. I exhorted them all to lay aside everything that would tend to impede the progress of our work; and to unite their hearts and hands in a determined effort to rescue their brethren from heathenism. There is no time for dissension while souls are perishing right at our doors."

BAPTISM OF A KING AND QUEEN.

Bishop Ferguson reports in a recent letter an event most significant and important which it may be hoped, coming at the commencement of his Episcopal career, will encourage him in his work. He says:

"On the 30th of September I received a note from the Rev. O. E. Hemie Shannon, our Deacon at Hoffman Station, informing me that the King of the Cape Palmas Grebo tribe had expressed to him a desire for baptism. With several of the Christian men of Hoffman Station, I went to Bigtown (as the village in which the king resides is called), and met him seated in a house belonging to one of his sons, which for neatness and furniture, as well as general structure, is far in advance of the surrounding dwellings.

"The king is about seventy years of age, and has been an invalid over a year. He said he had for a long time been persuaded of the truth of the Gospel, and desired baptism, but his office made it necessary that he should practice certain heathen customs which the Christian religion does not allow; that now he has resolved to become a Christian, whatever it might cost him. I questioned him very closely in order to ascertain whether he was indeed a fit subject for baptism, dwelling particularly on polygamy and other heathen practices, and received satisfactory answers. The Rev. Mr. Shannon had given him the necessary instruction. Then, having explained at some length the nature of the sacrament, I baptized his majesty Yiba Wa, in the name of the Holy Trinity.

"Several of the principal men of the tribe were present to witness the ceremony. They looked on aghast; and one—a very intelligent man who fills the office of prime minister—remarked that but for polygamy he would become a Christian likewise. This is apparently the great barrier that keeps many of them from Christ; but the grace of God can and will overcome this and every other hindrance.

"On last Sunday (October 11th) Bigtown was again the scene of an unusual occurrence. Assembled in an open space in front of the house of the bodio (high-priest) were nearly all the Christians from Hoffman Station, themselves rescued from heathenism. On the one side were the state officials, and on the other eminent heathen personages. A large number of young men and naked children made the circle almost complete, while small groups of women, whom heathenism denies a seat in the assemblies of the opposite sex, stood a few yards off, gazing wistfully upon a scene which they had never witnessed before.

"Two persons, seated conspicuously by themselves, were the centre of attraction. One of these is the wife of King Yiba Wa. She is about sixty years of age. Soon after the baptism of her husband, she expressed a desire to become a Christian likewise. She said she had long desired to do so, but the way did not seem open until now. The other candidate was about twenty years of age. He, with another young man, had been down to Lagos in the employment of one of the traders there. Through the efforts of the missionaries at that place, while seeking earthly treasures, the two young men found the pearl of great price. On their return home, both of them applied to the native pastor for baptism. One of them has, however, gone away again; and we trust that the Holy Spirit, who has begun a good work in him, will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ.

"I preached to the people, explaining the nature of the sacrament which we were about to administer, and urging all, old and young, men and women, to follow the good example of their king and the two candidates. All three of these being representative characters, afforded a good opportunity for me to appeal to the different classes present. Indeed, if care had been taken to select the candidates for such an occasion, with a view to making a desirable impression on the heathen, we could not have found more suitable persons. The one full of youthful vigor, kneeling beside the other in the evening of her life, with the recent baptism of the king fresh in memory, made the occasion a most striking one." of which Dr. Ferguson is bishop, is the most southerly of the three districts of the jurisdiction. The other two are the Sinoe and Bassa district, and the Monrovia, and Cape Mount district. Cape Palmas is the centre of a group of several stations at which much good work has been and is done. The most southerly border of the district lies almost upon the equator. In this district there are now four clergymen (two Liberians and two natives). There are also one lay-reader, twelve teachers (four of whom are women) and five student teachers, occupied with the work of education in the institutions mentioned beyond and in the several vernacular day-schools. There are eight principal stations, viz., those at Harper, Cape Palmas, Hoffman Station, Cavalla, Fishtown (Fair Haven), Half-Graway (Spring Hill), Rockbookah and Kabla. Additional stations, mainly preaching-places, are adjacent to several of these towns, aggregating with them over twenty-three stations and preaching-places.

It is very pleasant to observe that at Cavalla and Hoffman Station, where the devoted Bishops Payne and Auer labored, and those associated with them, there are native congregations with complete parochial organizations and commodious church edifices, each ministered to by its own (native) clergyman. Connected with the former are one hundred and one, and with the latter sixty-four, communicants.

It is a sad feature of the Mission that it is crippled for lack of funds. The whole amount the Board of Missions was able to appropriate to the Mission was $3600, which will all be absorbed in urgently necessary repairs. There are other stations which might be built at various points where they would be welcome, and would be a power for good, but as the cost would be $6000 the Board is obliged to let them wait until funds are received for the purpose. There is reason to hope that the evidence the Mission has given of its efficiency in the conversion and education of Bishop Ferguson will encourage God's people here to contribute yet more liberally to its support.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Nailing the Colors to the Mast.—At a recent meeting a young lady said: "I was led to Jesus many years ago, when I was a child. Some people do not believe that children can be converted, but one night in a Gospel meeting a lady spoke to me of Jesus, and I gave myself to the Lord, and from that night my life ran in a different course. Formerly I thought of nothing but to please self, but since then I have, by divine help, tried to please Him who died for me. And so I went on for many years, but still there was something wanting. I felt I cared a little for the world. I wanted to have both the world and Christ, and so I was not satisfied. I knew in my heart that I was ashamed to speak for Christ, or to tell others what He had done for me. So about three years ago I resolved to come fully out for the Lord, and give up all for Him, and what a blessing I got in return!"

Prayer at the Door of a Rum-shop.—Mr. Millar observed: "A man who was saved from intemperance with whom I was speaking, told me that some time ago, when working away from his own home, he was strongly tempted to return to his old evil ways. He yielded so far to the temptation as to go right to the door of a public-house, but just as he was about to enter he lifted up his heart to God in prayer, and cried: 'Lord, help me, for Jesus Christ's sake.' Immediately the desire for drink was quenched. God always with the temptation makes a way of escape to all those whose real desire is to be delivered from it, and preserved from sin. If all poor weak and tempted ones would but believe how much more willing God is to give than we are to ask, they would be saved much mischief and misery."

A Disinherited Son.—The Rev. Charles Graham related: "An eminent man of God, Thomas Kelly, whose hymns we frequently sing, was disinherited by his father for preaching the Gospel. After he had given himself to the Lord he went about calling sinners to repentance. His father called him aside one day, and said: 'Thomas, if you do not give over these irregularities I will disinherit you.' Thomas asked permission to wait upon the Lord, after which he said: 'I must obey God rather than my father.' So in bequeathing his property the old man passed over his son, and left all to his grandson, the son of Thomas Kelly. In the mean time a law was passed that a father could be the heir of his son. The child died, and for forty years Thomas Kelly lived in the enjoyment of his large property, which he used for God's service. How strangely God works! How good He is to those who trust Him! 'It is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in man.'"

Nearly Down a Coal Pit.—Mr. J. Rae said: "A man one night was wending his way along a lonely road. It was a dark and dreary night, and all at once he discovered that he had lost his way. He struggled along for a short time in the dark, for he had no lamp to guide his steps. The roads were rough and dangerous, so he sat down by the wayside and cried, 'I am lost. I am lost.' He continued his call for aid when a farmer came with a lamp to his assistance, and found the man sitting on the edge of a disused coal-pit. Oh, what a discovery. How barely he was saved! One step more and he would have been in utter destruction. But he believed that he was lost, and therefore was saved from being dashed to pieces. Dear unsaved one, not until you know that you are lost can you be saved, for 'Jesus came to seek and to save that which was lost.' 'All we like sheep have gone astray, we have turned every one to his own way, but the Lord hath laid upon Him (Jesus) the iniquity of us all.'"

Winding up with a Dance.—Mr. H. F. Bowker said: "It was my privilege on the last day of the year to address a meeting in this country on the subject of 'The Christian Life.' At the close several young men waited to speak to me, and one of them said he would like to call on me next day as he could not wait that night, having to be home at a certain hour. Next day he called, and after telling me about his church connections, and the different offices he held in it, he said: 'And now, next Saturday we have our annual meeting, when we give in our reports for the year, and make any new arrangements.' 'Yes,' I rejoined, 'and a very good custom it is.' 'But,' he continued, 'that is not all. When the reports have been read, and the business part is over, then we have—well, what we call a harmless dance, just to wind up the evening, and after what you said last night, I do not feel that I could ever join in it again.' Brethren, it is not the business of the Church to find amusement. It is the business of the Church to preach Christ in all His fulness; not to go hand in hand, but to come out from among unconverted worldlings and be separated."

SISTERS AND BROTHERS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached Last Sunday Morning, March 14th, 1886.

"And his sister stood afar off to know what would become of him."—EX. 2:4.

The Boat Princess Thermutis Saw—Its Precious Burden—Miriam's Vigil—Her Adroit Proposal—Legends of Moses' Childhood—A Crown Trodden Upon—Hot Coals Preferred to Rubies—His Unique Burial—The World's Obligation to Miriam—Great Men Helped by their Sisters—Their Toilsome Life—How to Help a Brother—The Curse of Teasing—Avoid Jealousy—A Leprous Abomination—The Rothschilds—A Russian Banquet—The Last Fraternal Escort.

PRINCESS THERMUTIS, daughter of Pharaoh, looking out through the lattice of her bathing-house, on the banks of the Nile, saw a curious boat on the river. It had neither oar nor helm, and they would have been useless anyhow. There was only one passenger, and that a baby boy. But the Mayflower that brought the Pilgrim Fathers to America carried not so precious a load. The boat was made of the broad leaves of papyrus tightened together by bitumen. Boats were sometimes made of that material, as we learn from Pliny, and Herodotus, and Theophrastus.

MIRIAM'S VIGIL.

"Kill every Hebrew boy when he is born," had been Pharaoh's order. To save her son, Jochebed, the mother of little Moses, had put him in that queer boat and launched him. His sister Miriam stood on the bank watching that craft with its precious burden. She was far enough off not to draw attention to the boat, but near enough to offer protection. There she stands on the bank. Miriam the poetess, Miriam the quick-witted, Miriam the faithful, though very human, for in after time she became so mad with that very brother for marrying a woman she did not like, that she made a great family row, and was struck with leprosy.

Miriam was a splendid sister, but had her faults like all the rest of us. How carefully she watched the boat containing her brother! A strong wind might upset it. The buffaloes often found there might in a sudden plunge of thirst sink it. Some ravenous water-fowl might swoop, and pick his eyes out with iron beak. Some crocodile or hippopotamus crawling through the rushes might crunch the babe. Miriam watched and watched until Princess Thermutis, a maiden on each side of her, holding palm leaves over her head to shelter her from the sun, came down and entered her bathing-house. When from the lattice she saw that boat she ordered it brought, and when the leaves were pulled back from the face of the child and the boy looked up he cried aloud, for he was hungry and frightened, and would not even let the princess take him. The infant would rather stay hungry than acknowledge any one of the court as mother.

AN ADROIT MAIDEN.

Now Miriam, the sister, incognito, no one suspecting her relation to the child, leaps from the bank and rushes down and offers to get a nurse to pacify the child. Consent is given, she brings Jochebed, the baby's mother, incognito, not sure of the court knowing that she was the mother, and when Jochebed arrived the child stopped crying, for its fright was calmed and its hunger appeased. You may admire Jochebed, the mother, and all the ages may admire Moses, but I clap my hands in applause at the behavior of Miriam, the faithful, brilliant, and strategic sister!

"Go home," some one might have said to Miriam. "Why risk yourself out there alone on the banks of the Nile, breathing the miasma and in danger of being attacked of wild beast or ruffian; go home!" No; Miriam, the sister, most lovingly watched and bravely defended Moses, the brother. Is he worthy her care and courage? Oh, yes; the sixty centuries of the world's history have never had so much involved in the arrival of any ship at any port as in the landing of that papyrus boat caked with bitumen. Its one passenger was to be a non-such in history: Lawyer, statesman, politician, legislator, organizer, conquerer, deliverer.

HEBREW LEGENDS.

He had such remarkable beauty in childhood that Josephus says, when he was carried along the road, people stopped to gaze at him, and workmen would leave their work to admire him. When the king playfully put his crown upon this boy, he threw it off indignantly, and put his foot on it. The king, fearing that this might be a sign that the child might yet take down his crown, applied another test. According to the Jewish legend, the king ordered two bowls to be put before the child, one containing rubies, and the other burning coals. And if he took the coals he was to live, and if he took the rubies he was to die. For some reason the child took one of the coals, and put it in his mouth, so that his life was spared, although it burned the tongue till he was indistinct of utterance ever after. Having come to manhood, he spread open the palms of his hands in prayer and the Red Sea parted to let two million five hundred thousand people escape. And he put the palms of his hands together in prayer and the Red Sea closed on a strangulated host.

UNIQUE BURIAL.

His life was unutterably grand, his burial must be on the same scale. God would let neither man nor saint, nor archangel have anything to do with weaving for him a shroud or digging for him a grave. The omnipotent God left His throne in heaven one day, and if the question was asked, "Whither is the King of the Universe going?" the answer was, "I am going down to bury Moses." And the Lord took this mightiest of men to the top of a hill, and the day was clear, and Moses ran his eye over the magnificent range of country. Here, the valley of Esdraelon, where the final battle of all nations is to be fought; and yonder, the mountains Hermon, and Lebanon, and Gerizim, and hills of Judea; and the village of Bethlehem there, and the city of Jericho yonder, and the vast stretch of landscape that almost took the old lawgiver's breath away as he looked at it.

And then, without a pang, as I learn from the statement that the eye of Moses was undimmed, and his natural force unabated, God touched the great lawgiver's eyes and they closed; and his lungs, and they ceased; and his heart, and it stopped; and commanded, saying: "To the skies, thou immortal spirit!" And then one divine hand was put against the back of Moses, and the other hand against the pulseless breast, and God laid him softly down on Mount Nebo, and then the lawgiver lifted in the Almighty's arms, was carried to the opening of a cave and placed in crypt, and one stroke of the divine hand smoothed the features into an everlasting calm, and a rock was rolled to the door, and the only obsequies at which God did all the offices of priest, and undertaker, and grave-digger, and mourner were ended.

THE WORLD INDEBTED.

Oh, was not Miriam, the sister of Moses, doing a good thing, an important thing, a glorious thing when she watched the boat woven of river plants and made water-tight with asphaltum, carrying its one passenger? Did she not put all the ages of time and of a coming eternity under obligation, when she defended her helpless brother from the perils aquatic, reptilian, and ravenous? She it was that brought that wonderful babe and his mother together so that he was reared to be the deliverer of his nation, when otherwise, if saved at all from the rushes of the Nile, he would have been only one more of the God-defying Pharaohs; for, Princess Thermutis, of the bathing-house, would have inherited the crown of Egypt, and as she had no child of her own, this adopted child would have come to coronation. Had there been no Miriam there would have been no Moses. What a garland for faithful sisterhood!

For how many a lawgiver, and how many a hero, and how many a deliverer, and how many a saint are the world and the Church indebted to a watchful, loving, faithful, godly sister?

Come up out of the farm-houses, come up out of the inconspicuous homes! Come up from the banks of the Hudson, and the Penobscot, and the Savannah, and the Mobile, and the Mississippi, and all the other Niles of America, and let us see you, the Miriams who watched and protected the leaders in law and medicine and merchandise and art and agriculture and mechanics and religion!

If I should ask all these physicians, and attorneys, and merchants, and ministers of religion and successful men of all professions and trades who are indebted to an elder sister for good influences, and perhaps for an education or a prosperous start, to rise, they would rise by the hundreds. God knows how many of our Greek lexicons and how much of our schooling was paid for by money that would otherwise have gone for the replenishing of a sister's wardrobe. While the brother sailed off for a resounding sphere, the sister watched him from the banks of self-denial.

THE ELDER SISTER'S POWER.

Miriam was the oldest of the family, Moses and Aaron, her brothers, are younger. Oh, the power of the elder sister to help decide the brother's character for usefulness and for heaven! She can keep off from her brother more evils than Miriam could have driven back water-fowl or crocodile from the ark of bulrushes. The older sister decides the direction in which the cradle-boat shall sail. By gentleness, by good sense, by Christian principle she can turn it toward the palace, not of a wicked Pharaoh, but of a holy God; and a brighter princess than Thermutis shall lift him out of peril, even religion, whose ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace.

HER TOILSOME LIFE.

The older sister, how much the world owes her! Born while yet the family was in limited circumstances, she had to hold and take care of her younger brothers. And if there is anything that excites my sympathy it is a little girl lugging round a great fat child, and getting her ears boxed because she cannot keep him quiet. By the time she gets to young womanhood she is pale and worn out, and her attractiveness has been sacrificed on the altar of sisterly fidelity, and she is consigned to celibacy, and society calls her by an ungallant name, but in heaven they call her Miriam.

In most families the two most undesirable places in the record of births are the first and the last, the first because she is worn out with the cares of a home that cannot afford to hire help, and the last because she is spoiled as a pet. Among the grandest equipages that sweep through the streets of heaven will be those occupied by sisters who sacrificed themselves for brothers. They will have the finest of the Apocalyptic white horses, and many who on earth looked down upon them will have to turn out to let them pass.

HELP TO MAKE MEN.

Let sisters not begrudge the time and care bestowed on a brother. It is hard to believe that any boy that you know so well as your brother can ever turn out anything very useful. Well, he may not be a Moses. There is only one of that kind needed for six thousand years. But I tell you what your brother will be—either a blessing or a curse to society, and a candidate for happiness or wretchedness. He will, like Moses, have the choice between rubies and living coals, and your influence will have much to do with his decision. He may not, like Moses, be the deliverer of a nation, but he may, after your father and mother are gone, be the deliverer of a household. What thousands of homes to-day are piloted by brothers! There are properties now well invested and yielding income for the support of sisters and younger brothers, because the older brother rose to the leadership from the day the father laid down to die. Whatever you do for your brother will come back to you again. If you set him an ill-natured, censorious, unaccommodating example, it will recoil upon you from his own irritated and despoiled nature. If you, by patience with all his infirmities and by nobility of character, dwell with him in the few years of your companionship, you will have your counsels reflected back upon you some day by his splendor of behavior in some crisis where he would have failed but for you.

TEASING A FAMILY CURSE.

Don't snub him. Don't depreciate his ability. Don't talk discouragingly about his future. Don't let Miriam get down off the bank of the Nile, and wade out and upset the ark of bulrushes. Don't tease him. Brothers and sisters do not consider it any harm to tease. That spirit abroad in the family is one of the meanest and most devilish. There is a teasing that is pleasurable, and is only another form of innocent railery, but that which provokes, and irritates, and makes the eye flash with anger is to be reprehended. It would be less blameworthy to take a bunch of thorns and draw them across your sister's cheek, or to take a knife and draw its sharp edge across your brother's hand till the blood spurts, for that would damage only the body, but teasing is the thorn and the knife, scratching and lacerating the disposition and the soul. It is the curse of innumerable households that the brothers tease the sisters, and the sisters the brothers. Sometimes it is the color of the hair, or the shape of the features, or an affair of the heart. Sometimes it is by revealing a secret, or by a suggestive look, or a guffaw, or an "Ahem!" Tease! Tease! Tease! For God's sake quit it. Christ says, "He that hateth his brother is a murderer." Now, when you, by teasing, make your brother or sister hate, you turn him or her into a murderer or murderess.

BEWARE OF JEALOUSY.

Don't let jealousy ever touch a sister's soul, as it so often does, because her brother gets more honor or more means. Even Miriam, the heroine of the text, was struck by that evil passion of jealousy. She had possessed unlimited influence over Moses, and now he marries, and not only so but marries a black woman from Ethiopia, and Miriam is so disgusted and outraged at Moses, first because he had married at all, and next, because he had practised miscegenation, that she is drawn into a frenzy, and then begins to turn white, and gets white as a corpse, and then whiter than a corpse. Her complexion is like chalk; the fact is, she has the Egyptian leprosy. And now the brother whom she had defended on the Nile comes to her rescue in a prayer that brings her restoration.

Let there be no room in all your house for jealousy, either to sit or stand. It is a leprous abomination. Your brothers' success oh sisters is your success. His victories will be your victories; for, while Moses the brother led the vocal music after the crossing of the Red Sea, Miriam, the sister, with two glittering sheets of brass uplifted and glittering in the sun, led the instrumental music, clapping the cymbals till the last frightened neigh of pursuing cavalry horse was smothered in the wave, and the last Egyptian helmet went under.

FAMILY QUARRELS.

How strong it makes a family when all the sisters and brothers stand together, and what an awful wreck when they disintegrate, quarrelling about a father's will and making the surrogate's office horrible with their wrangle. Better when you were little children in the nursery that with your playhouse mallets you had accidentally killed each other fighting across your cradle, than that, having come to the age of maturity, and having in your veins and arteries the blood of the same father and mother, you fight each other across the parental grave in the cemetery.

THE ROTHSCHILDS.

If you only knew it your interests are identical. Of all the families of the earth that ever stood together, perhaps the most conspicuous is the family of the Rothschilds. As Mayer Anselm Rothschild was about to die in 1812, he gathered his children about him, Anselm, Solomon, Nathan, Charles and James, and made them promise that they would always be united on "Change. Obeying that injunction they have been the mightiest commercial power on earth, and at the raising or lowering of their sceptre, nations have risen or fallen. That illustrates how much on a large scale, and for selfish purposes, a united family may achieve. But suppose that, instead of a magnitude of dollars as the object, it be doing good and making salutary impression and raising this sunken world, how much more ennobling! Sister, you do your part, and brother will do his part. If Miriam will lovingly watch the boat on the Nile, Moses will help her when leprous disasters strike.

THE FAMILY BOND.

When father and mother are gone, and they soon will be, if they have not already made exit, the sisterly and fraternal bond will be the only ligament that will hold the family together. How many reasons for your deep and unfaltering affection for each other! Rocked in the same cradle; bent over by the same motherly tenderness; toiled for by the same father's weary arm and aching brow; with common inheritance of all the family secrets; and with names given you by parents who started you with the highest hopes for your happiness and prosperity—I charge you, be loving and kind and forgiving. If the sister see that the brother never wants a sympathizer, the brother will see that the sister never wants an escort.

Oh, if the sisters of a household knew through what terrific and damning temptations their brother goes in this city life, they would hardly sleep nights in the anxiety for his salvation! And if you would make a holy conspiracy of kind words and gentle attentions and earnest prayers, that would save his soul from death and hide a multitude of sins. But let the sister dash off in one direction in discipleship of the world, and the brother flee off in another direction in dissipation, and it will not be long before they will meet again at the iron gate of Despair, their blistered feet in the hot ashes of a consumed lifetime. Alas, that brothers and sisters, though living together for years, very often do not know each other, and that they see only the imperfections and none of the virtues!

A RUSSIAN BANQUET.

General Bauer, of the Russian cavalry, had in early life wandered off in the army, and the family supposed he was dead. After he gained a fortune he encamped one day in Husam, his native place, and made a banquet, and among the great military men who were to dine, he invited a plain miller and his wife, who lived near by, and who, affrighted, came, fearing some harm would be done them. The miller and his wife were placed one on each side of the general at the table. The general asked the miller all about his family, and the miller said that he had two brothers and a sister. "No other brothers?" "My younger brother went off with the army many years ago, and no doubt was long ago killed." Then the general said: "Soldiers, I am this man's younger brother whom he thought was dead." And how loud was the cheer, and how warm was the embrace!

Brother and sister, you need as much of an introduction to each other as they did. You do not know each other. You think your brother is grouchy and cross and queer, and he thinks you are selfish and proud and unlovely. Both wrong! That brother will be a prince in some woman's eyes, and that sister a queen in the estimation of some man. That brother is a magnificent fellow, and that sister is a morning in June. Come, let me introduce you: "Moses, this is Miriam." "Miriam, this is Moses." Add seventy-five per cent to your present appreciation of each other, and when you kiss good-morning do not stick up your cold cheek, wet from the recent washing, as though you hated to touch each other's lips in affectionate caress. Let it have all the fondness and cordiality of a loving sister's kiss.

BE AGREEABLE.

Make yourselves as agreeable and helpful to each other as possible, remembering that soon you part. The few years of boyhood and girlhood will soon slip by, and you will go out to homes of your own, and into the battle with the world and amid ever-changing vicissitudes, and on paths crossed with graves, and up steps hard to climb, and through shadowy ravines. But oh, my God and Saviour, may the terminus of the journey be the same as the start, namely, at father's and mother's knee, if they have inherited the kingdom! Then, as in boyhood and girlhood days, we rushed in after the day's absence with much to tell of exciting adventure, and father and mother enjoyed the recital as much as we who made it, so we shall on the hillside of heaven rehearse to them all the scenes of our earthly expedition, and they shall welcome us home, as we say: "Father and mother, we have come, and brought our children with us." The old revival hymn described it with glorious repetition:

"Brothers and sisters there will meet,
Brothers and sisters there will meet,
Brothers and sisters there will meet,
Will meet to part no more."

I read of a child in the country who was detained at a neighbor's house on a stormy night by some fascinating stories that were being told him, and then looked out and saw it was so dark he did not dare go home. The incident impressed me the more because in my childhood I had much the same experience. The boy asked his comrades to go with him, but they dared not. It got later and later—seven o'clock, eight o'clock, nine o'clock. "Oh," he said, "I wish I were home!" As he opened the door the last time a blinding flash of the storm and a deafening roar overcame him. But after a while he saw in the distance a lantern, and lo! his brother was coming to fetch him home, and the lad stepped out and with swift feet hastened on to his brother who took him home, where they were so glad to greet him, and for a long time supper had been waiting. So may it be when the night of death comes and our earthly friends cannot go with us, and we dare not go alone; may our Brother, our Elder Brother, our Friend closer than a brother, come out to meet us with the light of the promises, which shall be a lantern to our feet, and then we will go in to join our loved ones waiting for us, supper all ready, the marriage supper of the Lamb!

A Surgical Operation Performed by the operator on his own person is described in the Belleville Ontario. It states that the judge who recently presided at the Belleville Assizes had a terrible experience when he was a young man. He was then intending to be a farmer, and one winter day he went into the woods to fell timber. During the day he felled a tree which lodged. He attempted to fell another on the first one to bring it down, but did not succeed. He went up to one of the leaning trees to attempt to dislodge them, when suddenly the upper tree fell and caught the young man's foot between the two, at the same time throwing him over backward so that his shoulders just touched the snow. He was in great peril, for in the bush his voice could not reach his friends, and, it being a cold day, he must soon perish. But he was a man of strong will, and was equal to the occasion. He took his knife from his pocket and cut the flesh around the bone of the imprisoned leg. As he came to an artery he held it until the cold congealed the blood, and then proceeded. If he felt his strength beginning to fail he bathed his face with snow. When he had the bone bared he reached his axe, and with one blow severed it, and was free. He crawled out of the woods and across a field to the road, where a passing team took him home. It is not likely that he has ever regretted the loss of his foot, seeing that by it his life was saved. There will be men in heaven whose souls have been saved by the loss of something just as precious to them. Christ taught that whatever held men back from eternal life was well sacrificed at any cost (Matt. 18:8).

A GOSPEL TOUR IN MEXICO.

IN the course of a letter to the Presbyterian Monthly Record the Rev. T. F. Wallace, who dates from Zacatecas, says: "I have just returned from my second regular missionary tour among the churches of the Laguna district this year. Lerdo and Leocadias I have visited three or four times. The eight congregations and preaching places we visited in this part of our field have the ministration and pastoral care of two licensed and three lay preachers. Only two of them are under thirty years of age. The others are men of considerable experience and good judgment. None of them rank high as popular speakers, but their acquaintance with the Scriptures, high standing as honorable men and as sincere Christians, make them admirably suited for the kind of work this field demands."

"I was accompanied on my late trip by Mr. Amaya. He had advised the people of our coming. Our little congregation at the hacienda of Sacramento, the second place visited after leaving Lerdo, had made arrangements to hold services in a larger and more central house, which had been rented by a woman of the congregation. Our audiences here have seldom numbered over fifty, and that rarely. This time at our first service we had over one hundred. The order and attention were the very best. It was calculated that at least half the number were witnessing Protestant services for the first time. We and our people were rejoicing in the bright prospects, and promising ourselves a more delightful time the following night, when members were to be received and the Lord's Supper administered."

"The next morning, however, the aspect of affairs had changed. The fanatical owner of the hacienda had ordered, through the highest civil officer in the place, the immediate ejection of the woman in whose house services had been held. Mr. Amaya and I called upon the owner, but could not get him to agree to allow the woman to remain in the house, although we offered to hold worship elsewhere, nor was he willing that Protestant worship should be held in the ranch."

"We concluded that the proper person to see was the civil magistrate, and to him we went. He informed us that he had an order from his chief, the mayor of Lerdo, to consult with the owner of the hacienda in regard to everything and be subject to him. He pretended to look for the order, but of course it could not be found. He would not consent to our holding services. Mr. Amaya and several others went later to visit this magistrate and try to have him to put his refusal on paper. He at first consented, then seeing where this might lead him, he pretended to get mad and was on the point of putting Amaya and the others in jail. To avoid any trouble we concluded to obey the unlawful order. But that night our own people, and many who had heard us the night previous for the first time, hunted us up in the humble hut where we were stopping. The room in about ten or fifteen minutes was completely packed, and crowds about the door, all hungry to hear something from God's word and witness our service. There was no formal preaching, yet portions of Scripture were read and expounded. To appreciate the deep interest shown by these people, it must be kept in mind that their conduct might bring them loss of home and means of supporting themselves in that hacienda."

"The following day we left to fill appointments at other places, assuring our brethren that on our return to Lerdo we should see the mayor of Lerdo, and find out whether he could secure to them the rights guaranteed them by the laws. The time of our visit to the mayor some three weeks later could not have been more opportune. While in his room informing him of our treatment at the hands of the owner of the hacienda, and his tool, the civil magistrate, the latter passed by the door and was called in by the mayor, who had us repeat what had occurred between said officer and ourselves. Then followed a most severe reprimand from the mayor, who not only told him that our people were to be allowed to worship wherever and whenever they pleased in conformity with the laws, but that he was to see to preserving order and keeping them from being molested. The mayor also gave a circular letter to Mr. Amaya that instructs all the authorities in ranches and haciendas under his jurisdiction to see that Mr. Amaya, his assistants and people who wished to receive their preaching, have all the protection necessary."

THE WAITING CHRISTIAN.

His Character Influenced by His Attitude.
By Rev. W. J. Erdman.*

The Ideal of Saints—Virtues Allied with Expectation—A Valuable Influence Neglected—Testimony of Practical Benefit—The Effects of Second Advent Expectation—I. On Faith—II. On Love—III. On Hope—The Holy, Blameless Life.

THE believer in Christ Jesus is not at liberty to become a Christian of any fashion he may choose. Once for all the ideal of saints is portrayed in the divine Word, and to it and to it alone the believer must be conformed; and the one characteristic imparting tone and harmony and a luminous glory to all the features and graces together is the hope and love of the second appearing of the Son of God.

THE INEVITABLE INJURY.

Since every virtue and holy excellence of the Christian is related in the Scripture to this great expectation, it follows that ignorance or disobedience of the express command to watch and wait for the Son of God from heaven, or any substitution for His personal return, must result either in a defective development of the new nature or in an experience not so spiritual and heavenly as it otherwise might have been.

It is not meant that the possession of this one characteristic will make up for the lack of other graces, or that all who are looking for the Lord are more holy and heavenly-minded than those who put far off His return, or substitute other events for it; but rather that any believer, however great his love of the Lord and his devotion to Him may have been up to a given time, will find on the belief of this all-touching truth from the heart, his heavenly mindedness increase, his sympathies deepen and broaden according to a fuller knowledge of God's purposes and plans in times past and present and for the ages to come.

ASSURED BENEFIT.

To more than one Christian the reception of this truth was—to use a too-familiar phrase, like a "second conversion," and all life thenceforth took on new form and color; to some it came like a trumpet blast to rouse from spiritual lethargy and death; and for others it cut the last tie of worldliness, and forever dissipated the dream of a permanent improvement of the world in its present form, and of the earth as the abode of everlasting righteousness and enduring peace before the Lord comes; and for all, its invariable tendency is to lift the soul to a height and air of vivid personal relations and converse with the Son of God.

Nor is it the purpose of God since the apostolic day that anything should for motive and for influence take the place of the "blessed hope." His providence of a seeming delay does not set aside His written Word. He has hidden counsels we know not of, but our duty is to work and watch and wait. He is His own interpreter of His own mysteries. Nor can death be made the source of motives of holy life and endeavor.

THE CROWNING EPOCH.

Whatever may be the blessed state of saints between death and the resurrection, it is not the time according to the Scriptures of reward, or of inheritance, or of sovereignty, or of manifested glory. All these and their implied mysteries of holy, reverent, loving fellowship with the Lord and perfected powers of spirit, soul and body for the exercise of royal and priestly ministries belong to "His appearing" and "that day."

The testimony of the Word on this subject

* Part of a paper in "I Come Quickly," Published by S. R. Briggs, Toronto.

may be considered in regard to the faith and love and hope of the Christian.

I. The faith of the Christian as to salvation and service and sufferings is in the earliest and latest apostolic testimony inseparable from the Return of our Lord.

The importance and power of this truth in the mind of the apostle to mature the faith of converts just rescued out of the ignorance and abominations of paganism, may be seen in the allusions and reminders of his epistles, how in his brief sojourn of about three weeks among these Thessalonians he had given them much teaching on this subject; and the cry of the mob that raged through the streets of their city: "These all do contrary to the decree of Caesar, saying that there is another king, one Jesus" (Acts 17:7), is an attesting echo of this important teaching.

In latest epistles is found this same use of the doctrine to keep in ceaseless exercise faith and the sense of a nearness to the unseen things of the great salvation. "For our citizenship is in heaven, from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ" (Phil. 3:20). "Who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation ready to be revealed in the last time." (1 Pet. 5:5). "Being confident of this very thing, that He which hath begun a good work in you will perform (perfect) it until the day of Jesus Christ" (Phil. 5:6). "Unto them that look for Him shall appear the second time without sin unto salvation" (Heb. 9:28).

In brief, the whole Church as one body is seen in the Scriptures while in the exercise and use of all gifts "waiting for the Coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, who shall also confirm you unto the end that ye may be blameless in the day of our Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Cor. 1:7-8).

II. The love of the Christian which is the informing spirit of holiness is inseparable from the Return of our Lord.

"The Lord make you to increase and abound in love one toward another, and toward all men even as we do toward you, to the end he may establish your hearts unblameable in holiness before God even our Father at the Coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all His saints" (1 Thess. 3:12, 13; 5:23; Phil. 1:9-11).

Our love of God and of Christ is drawn forth and illumined by the rays of His coming glory, and is one with the hope that maketh not ashamed. Our confession of love as individual believers now, is linked to His confession of us hereafter at His Coming; and our corporate confession in the Lord's Supper of His love and of our love continues till He come (1 Cor. 11:26). How pertinent then, though startling, that last word of the epistle, "If any man love not the Lord Jesus let him be anathema. Maranatha." (Our Lord Cometh.) (1 Cor. 15:22; Matt. 10:32; Luke 12:38).

Our love of each other as holy ones is bound to the same hope (1 Th. 3:12, 13). Our moderation or courteous compliance which will not always insist upon rights says: "The Lord is at hand" (Phil. 4:5); and so our willingness to be defrauded rather (1 Cor. 6:1-4); and our unwillingness to judge or murmur against each other (Jas. 5:9; Rom. 13:10); in a word, the self-denial of love has its perfect work only in the all-illuminating hope of His appearing. And Paul sums up all holiness, Godward and manward and selfward (1 Pet. 1:13; 4:7) in connection with "the Lord Jesus Christ our hope" (1 Tim. 1:1).

III. The hope of the Christian, with its objects, and their peculiar motives of holy living is inseparable from the Return of our Lord.

There is no fear, no trouble, no anxiety, no sorrow, no pain which is not in some way alleviated or enlightened, if not altogether removed, and the soul made full of courage, peace, and joy by the remembrance of the Father's house and of the promise of the Lord to come again and receive us unto Himself (John 14:1-3).

In this hope believers can afford to sit loosely to the things of this world and confess themselves to be strangers and pilgrims on the earth with the elder men of faith who knew the promises could not be fulfilled until the city of God had been prepared and their Redeemer appeared in glory (Heb. 11 : 8-16). In this hope the sons of God are serving, being mindful of the kingdom promised to them that love Him (Jas. 2 : 5), and are perfecting a holy character according to the pattern of all lowly, kingly ways the King Himself once set them when He came "not to be ministered unto but to minister, and to give His life a ransom for many" (Matt. 20 : 28). In a world that knows them not they walk in strange consciousness of a heavenly country and holy city, princes in training for sovereignty, priests perfecting for an invisible temple (1 John 3 : 1-3; Rev. 1 : 5).

In this hope hallowing and illumining every thought and aspiration of a boundless future they would walk worthy of the calling wherewith they are called, and live holy, blameless lives, not only in remembrance of Him who loved them and gave Himself for them, but also in view of the holy solemnities of the great day of their presentation unto Him before the presence of His glory (1 Th. 2 : 12; Eph. 5 : 22-27; Jude 23-25).

ON BOARD THE MORNING STAR.

THE following extracts from a number of letters published in the Boston Missionary Herald show how much the missionaries are helped by the good ship recently placed at their disposal, and which at the time of writing was among the Micronesian Islands, situate on and near the equator to the northeast of Australia.

Captain Bray writes of a visit appropriately made on the anniversary of the ship's launching to two islands utterly sunk in heathenism: "Our vessel is one year old to-day. A year ago we were launched with her into the Kennebec. On this, her first anniversary, she was visiting a new island with the messengers of the Gospel. We reached Pleasant Island at half-past seven in the morning. Seven white traders came on board, and quite a number of native men. Mr. Walkup went on shore and endeavored to persuade some of the native boys to go to his school, but did not succeed.

"Most of our information in regard to the island was obtained from the traders. Pleasant Island well deserves its name. It is fifteen miles in circumference, one hundred or more feet high, well covered with cocoanut and other trees, and has twelve hundred inhabitants, divided into twelve tribes. They are constantly fighting. Some of the interior natives have never ventured to the sea. The men are above the average, both in size and in general appearance, and all were covered with the malo. The women were so much delighted with the appearance of the well-dressed Gilbert Island students that they very unceremoniously began to embrace the blushing young men, proposing a dance with them at once. Both natives and traders seemed favorably disposed to receive a teacher whenever one can be brought."

The other new island visited was Banaba, or Ocean Island. Of this Mr. Walkup writes:

"It is about two hundred feet high, nearly flat on top, and sloping to the sea. It seems to be an elevation of the coral or lime-stone formation. The vegetation is nearly all of a new growth, for the drouth a few years ago destroyed all the trees except a few hundred cocoanuts. The young cocoanuts and pandanus are beginning to bear, while mummy-apples, sugar-cane, melons and pumpkins are in abundance. Bananas grow in sheltered places. There are over two hundred natives, men being entirely nude. Married women have the fringe worn in the Gilbert Islands, while girls and unmarried women wear leaves, generally suspended around the neck. The natives seemed delighted to see so many who could talk with them, for my scholars went ashore with me.

"When told our errand, they said they wanted a teacher, but told us to wait till the king and all the people came. One old man, the most zealous of the number, having got on a woman's fringe, said to me, in broken English, 'You come, and we go find king.' We passed up the slope by several houses with nice gravelled doorways, until the old man came to his own house, where he put on a shirt, and showed me a pair of trousers and said again in broken English: 'You see I like clothes and missionaries—long time ago me go on whale-ship to Nantucket, and then to New York; no, not New York—Boston.'

"The king's village was on a flat spot about one hundred feet above the beach in a grove of cocoanut trees; beside his house was a playground, reminding one of school-days. The king listened to us, and then asked abruptly: 'What good will it be to us?' When answered he said the other chief and people would be called to decide. I proposed that they assemble in the village on the beach, where most of the people were collected, and there decide. In the public assembly, after much palavering, they admitted four public sins, namely: stealing, quarrelling, drunkenness and adultery. They did not seem to have any appreciation of a future life, or of anything in this life beside beyond getting clear from the above sins. I told them the Bible would tell them how to do this and more, if they would obey its teachings. They accepted a teacher and promised to treat him well and feed him. One man and his wife said they prayed to Jehovah and were Christians, for a man from Apamama had been on the island several months and had a book and taught them."

THE DISCOURSE.

Text: "Shall never thirst" (John 4 : 14).

We all know what bodily thirst is. And we all know that there is something in our spirits analogous to this appetite of our bodies.

No man can drink so much water at one time as that he shall not thirst again.

No man can receive so much of this life's good things as that he shall not desire more.

Whatever we have, we desire more of that or else something additional. Men who seem to have all that heart could wish, and who really cannot name another thing, nevertheless feel as if there must be something else for them, as they are not thoroughly happy. It is an undefined longing.

So far from satisfying, merely earthly enjoyment quickens our imagination, and we begin to paint wider and fairer scenes, and long to be in them.

Our Lord, who knows what is in men, says of each stream of earth, "Whosoever drinketh of this water shall thirst again."

Our natural thirst cannot be satisfied. But as fever increases the natural thirst of the body, so sin increases that of the soul. In the former case water does not slake the thirst; the physician must give something which shall remove the disease which creates the thirst.

Our Lord gives us that to drink which shall destroy the cause of the abnormal thirst and satisfy the healthy desires of the soul.

The satisfaction is from within; "but the water that I shall give shall be in him a well of water springing up."

No more hunting up or down for streams. No more filling broken cisterns that leak.

A spring! A well!

In me!

Always there!

Always fresh!

Think, my soul, of thy thirst all gone! No more longing. No more dry mouth. No more parched spirit.

Say with the woman at the well, "Lord Jesus, give me this water, that I thirst not."

[The Lord's Prayer should be used somewhere in each service, and the service may be closed with the "Gloria" or other Doxology.]

AFTERNOON TALK.

[A service may be held, and the following discourse read:]

A LIVING SACRIFICE.

By Rev. J. W. Cornelius, of Baltimore.

The Apostle Paul (Rom. 12 : 1) says: "I besech you, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice."

The question to him seems very urgent. The sacrifice is a necessary one. "I beseech you." "As though God did beseech you by us we pray you in Christ's stead." Unless there were great importance to us in the act described, there would not be such emotion in the soul of the Apostle and such vigor in his speech. He can see more fully than we have appreciated, how that God, who has made a perfect sacrifice for us, requires of us a perfect sacrifice to Him. He has done His part; let us do ours. He has fulfilled His part of the covenant by sending His own Son to redeem us, and exalting Him to be our high-priestly Intercessor. We now must humbly imitate His work for us by presenting our bodies living sacrifices, holy, acceptable unto God, which is our reasonable service.

The sacrifice of Christ for us was freely, willingly made, that we might be entirely redeemed for this world and prepared for the next. "God spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up freely for us all." And we must, of our own free will and accord, surrender ourselves to Him. The whole purpose of God cannot be attained if there be not a cheerful and complete presentation of our lives to Him. There is no compulsion in Christianity. It is inconsistent with our free agency that God should use any kind of constraint. He deals with us as rational beings, and presents before us the most laudable and essential motives to an immediate and complete sacrifice; but He leaves the matter with us.

It is a grateful task. "I beseech you by the mercies of God." As you remember what great things God has done for your souls, be willing now fully to reciprocate His love. One who cannot be impressed by the love of another has a character lower in infamy than any other that breathes. Let not the least suspicion of such a taint of blackness be upon the Christian.

The sacrifice is the most valuable you can bring—your life. Present your bodies a "living sacrifice." True, of ourselves there is nothing good. We are in body and soul filthy beyond any power of analysis and description. Nothing could more insult God than a worthless or diseased offering. But you have been redeemed. You are made new creatures. You have a new life and capacities purged from all guilt and depravity. Give this new life to God. You who have received His mercies in your recovery from condemnation and evil and your restoration to His image, present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, which is your reasonable service.

[The following poem may be committed to memory by the young people:]

FORSAKE ME NOT.

When on my day of life the night is falling,
And, in the winds from unsunned spaces blown,
I hear far voices out of darkness calling
My feet to paths unknown,

Thou who hast made my home of life so pleasant,
Leave not its tenant when its walls decay;
O Love Divine, O Helper ever present,
Be thou my strength and stay!

Be near me when all else is from me drifting—
Earth, sky, home's pictures, days of shade and shine,
And kindly faces to my own uplifting,
The love which answers mine.

I have but Thee, my Father! let Thy Spirit
Be with me then to comfort and uphold;
No gate of pearl, no branch of palm I merit,
Nor street of shining gold.

Suffice it if—my good and ill unreckoned,
And both forgiven through Thy abounding grace—
I find myself by hands familiar beckoned—
Unto my fitting place.

Some humble door among Thy many mansions,
Some sheltering shade where sin and striving cease,
And flows forever through Heaven's green expansions
The river of Thy peace.

There from the mummy round about me stealing,
I fain would learn the new and holy song,
And find at last, beneath Thy trees of healing,
Thy life for which I long.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Dispute Between the President and the Senate occupied a considerable portion of the Senate's time last week. On Tuesday Senator Edmunds made a characteristic speech dealing with the abstract side of the question. He had collected an imposing array of precedents to prove that the Senate had the right, which former Presidents had admitted, to the papers. He also dwelt on the right of the people to explore the official records of their Government. That argument was a bid for public support, but it was neutralized by the fact that the papers are not demanded for public information, but for the use of the Senate only, which jealously keeps them from the public eye. If the people were sure that the Senate's motive in seeking the papers was to use them for the public good the case would be different, but while it maintains secrecy there is ground for the suspicion that the Senate is concerned only to protect its opportunities for bargaining with the President over the offices and selling its confirmations for a consideration consisting of certain nominations to be made by him. As the nominations of Hedden and Rasin were confirmed last week in spite of all that has been said, the suspicion gains in credibility. Senator Pugh's speech against Mr. Edmunds on Wednesday, had the same defect. Senator Kenna did not aim so much to show whether the President was right or wrong as to prove that Mr. Edmunds was inconsistent, and that under Republican Presidents he had not made the claims he does now. The wisest utterance in the whole debate came from Senator Eustis who reminded all concerned that the real question was one apart from the papers, and related only to the wisdom or folly of appointments. Bad nominations would damage the Democratic party, and if the Senate confirmed them it would share in the responsibility. He might have added that the nation is also damaged by bad nominations, but Senators of both parties are more concerned about the welfare of their party than about the efficiency of the public service.

The House Committee on Civil Service Reform brought in a report last week which shows that its members hold sound opinions, opposed to the repeal of the law. The report disclosed that the bill submitted to it instead of either improving or enlarging the scope of the present law, simply provides for its unconditional and absolute repeal. The bill was therefore reported adversely, and the following reasons assigned for doing so: First, The principle of divorcing the subordinate offices of the Government from politics and elections, and making the term of office depend, not upon party service, but upon moral and good behavior, is a good one. So far as this principle is sustained by the present law the committee think there should be no change.

Second, The present law has not been on the statute-books long enough to have had a full and complete trial. Third, No reason or information has been presented to this committee justifying an unconditional repeal of the present law. It may, perhaps, need improvement, but the remedy is amendment, not total repeal.

A Retrograde Step is Proposed by Senator Wilson, of Iowa, who wants the rate of postage on fourth class mail matter doubled. It is now one cent an ounce and it is a great boon to people who live far away from the offices of express companies, and who yet want to enjoy some of the advantages of those who dwell in cities. Fourth class mail matter consists of samples of dry-goods, seeds, plants and bulbs. The mails have been extensively used of late years for the conveyance of these articles, and it is now proposed to restrict it. The attempt ought to fail; the mails should not be used for the transportation of cumbrous or heavy articles of merchandise, but, in carrying the articles named, facilities are given to a large number of citizens who have a claim on the public service which deserves more consideration than the interests of wealthy express companies.

The Alliance Between Politics and Crime in New York City has long been suspected, and last week allegations were made public which, unless they are disproved, will turn the suspicion into certainty. The incriminated officers will, of course, have an opportunity of defending themselves and for the sake of the character of the city, it may be hoped that they will vindicate themselves. It is charged on affidavit that a lady's house was broken into, and a lot of silverware stolen; that the chief of the burglars is the President of a powerful political association, and the man to whom he sold the plunder, and who promptly melted it down is an alderman of the city; that the lady robbed applied to the detectives and the District Attorney for assistance, and in both cases, when the position of the accused parties was known, obstacles were placed in her way. Finally, the Alderman paid $1100 to the lady, and he admits paying it. The charges are too serious to be passed over, and the explanation of the Alderman, the Inspector of Detectives, and especially the District Attorney will be eagerly awaited.

An Extensive Labor Struggle Paralyzed Traffic in the Southwest last week. It commenced on the Texas Pacific Line, and extended to the Missouri Pacific, and all the Gould system of the Southwest. The grievance, so far as can be learned, is mainly that the companies have been engaging new men and discharging employes who belong to the Knights of Labor, and have taken a prominent part in labor agitations. On Monday the number of men who voluntarily quit work and who belong to the Knights of Labor numbered ten thousand. Attempts were made by the companies to run freight trains on Wednesday and Thursday, but, as the firemen, switchmen and brakemen were on strike, it was found impossible to send a train over the line. Another attempt was made on Friday to run a train from St. Louis to Kansas City, but it was necessary to employ a policeman to do duty as fireman, and another as brakeman, and only so could the train be got out of St. Louis. The engineers have not joined the strike, but they sympathize with the strikers. The companies appear to have prepared for a long siege, as they have discharged clerks, telegraph operators, and watchman to the number of five thousand. Good order prevailed throughout the week.

Speculation as to Mr. Gladstone's Scheme for the pacification of Ireland, has little material on which to feed. He and those statesmen who are in his confidence maintain complete silence on the subject. It is, however, significant that a newspaper published in the north of England, and supposed to be under the control of Mr. John Morley, the Secretary for Ireland, implies that the scheme will be practically that of Home Rule. It also intimates that the opposition to such a scheme will find few supporters in the Liberal ranks and that the bill will pass the House of Commons easily. That the House of Lords will reject it is a foregone conclusion. An autumn session of Parliament will then be called and the bill passed a second time. If it is again rejected it will be passed a third time by the House of Commons, and if the Lords throw it out then the Premier will appeal to the people on that issue by holding an election of a new House of Commons. This programme is regarded as authoritative, the paper publishing it being controlled by Mr. Morley, who is in Mr. Gladstone's confidence.

The Determination of Greece to Make War on Turkey appears to be unshaken. The purchase of arms and the mobilization of troops are being pushed forward with unremitting energy. It is believed that the moral effect of the assembling of the foreign fleets in Suda Bay will not be sufficient to coerce Greece, and that further measures will be necessary. Greece has been warned that if she persists in her intention of violating the peace she will be left to suffer punishment at the hands of Turkey. Greece reasserts her claims to Epirus in accordance with the terms of the Berlin Treaty, and declares that hitherto she has only yielded to the combined forces of Europe. She still, though with little apparent reason, believes herself able to cope with Turkey single-handed.

The Sinking of the Oregon, the Magnificent trans-Atlantic steamer of the Cunard Line last Sunday is the most startling of recent maritime disasters. Happily it was not attended by the loss of life which too often constitutes a shocking element in the record of shipwrecks. Though there were eight hundred and forty-six persons on board the vessel, it is stated at the time of writing that every one was saved, but the beautiful steamer is a total wreck. The Oregon, which was the second fastest steamer afloat, left Liverpool on March 6th, and Queenstown at two o'clock the next day. She arrived off Fire Island at half-past four on Sunday morning last. It was dark and cloudy but there was no fog. The Captain was below and the first officer was in charge of the vessel. Suddenly a loud crash like the report of a cannon was heard, and the steamer quivered from stem to stern. The passengers, some of whom were asleep, were alarmed by the shock, and hurried on deck, many of them without waiting to dress. They learned that a heavily laden schooner in trying to cross the Oregon's bows had crashed into her side tearing a hole through which a horse and carriage might have been driven. There was a terrible scene of distress, women shrieking and men running around distracted. They were ordered below while an attempt was made to stop the leak and the pumps were set to work. The captain soon saw that the vessel was doomed. He then made the safety of the passengers his first consideration. The ten boats carried by the steamer were lowered and the passengers were summoned. It was light by that time and there was no wind, and the sea was calm. Before the first boat was filled a pilot boat had seen the Oregon's signals, and had come to her assistance, and shortly afterward a large schooner came up. The passengers' hopes revived at the sight of these vessels and the transfer took place in perfect order. About one o'clock the Bremen steamer Fulda arrived at the scene of the disasters having seen the signals of distress shown by the Oregon. The Fulda took on board all the passengers and crew, and brought them to New York. At twenty minutes to two the Oregon sank beneath the waves. About six hundred bags of mail matter and an unknown quantity of property went down with her, but the fact that no lives were lost though so many were in peril is a matter for so much thankfulness that the money loss is forgotten. The schooner that caused the disaster was not seen after the collision. It is supposed that she must have sunk instantly. The Oregon was built in 1883, and was the first steamer to make the run from New York to Queenstown under seven days. She was originally owned by the Guion Company, but was purchased in 1884, for the Cunard line.

The Will of the Late Mr. John B. Gough was filed for probate on March 4th. The private bequests are to Mrs. Gough, Mr. Herbert D. Gough, the orator's brother, and his four nieces. It also leaves $1000 each to the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions, American Home Missionary Society of New York, American Seaman's Friend Society of New York, Children's Friend Society of Worcester, Trustees of the Memorial Hospital of Worcester, and National Temperance Publication Society of New York. Mrs. Gough is given absolute authority to revoke any bequests contained in the will.

Christian Work Among the Chinese in California is bearing abundant fruit. Since its organization the Chinese church in San Francisco has received on confession of faith one hundred and fifty-eight persons. The Oakland church reports an encouraging attendance at the six weekly services. There is also a Chinese Presbyterian church in connection with the Presbytery of Los Angeles, and mission work is carried on in connection with the Presbyterian churches of Placerville, Sacramento, Napa, San Rafael, Alameda, San Jose, San Buenaventura, Anaheim, Orange, etc.

An Appeal for Assistance Has Been Received from "The Household of Faith Church," of Wilmington, Del. The church is financially straitened through a variety of causes which strongly appeal to the sympathy. The building cost $14,000, is of brick, in an excellent situation, and in good repair. It holds eight hundred people. There is a debt upon it of $6600, and the congregation is threatened with foreclosure. The pastor and church ask help from their brethren of the Second Advent faith and Christians of other communions. Contributions may be sent to Rev. George W. Wright, 834 Bennett Street, Wilmington, Del.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey's Services in Houston, Texas, have been much blessed. Dr. E. D. Junkin, of that city, writes: "The meetings were held in the largest hall in the city, which had been seated to accommodate comfortably about eighteen hundred persons; but after the seats were all filled they still crowded in and found sitting room and standing room on the steps of the platforms, or about the doors, so that the audience must have exceeded two thousand; and then many had to go away. The audiences were composed of all classes, Protestants, Catholics, Jews, white, and colored people and of all conditions. A large platform was arranged on one side of the hall for the accommodation of the colored people, and it was always filled with a very orderly and attentive crowd. For more than two weeks before these brethren came, the pastors of the Methodist, Presbyterian, and Baptist churches held union prayer-meetings daily in the different churches, and thus a spirit of expectation was aroused in the hearts of God's people, which prepared them for the services, and which will doubtless lead to blessed results in the future."

The Farewell Services in Connection with the departure of twenty missionaries to join Bishop Taylor's band in Africa, were commenced on Sunday last, in the Central Methodist Episcopal Church, of which the Rev. Dr. Lane is pastor. On Saturday the twenty missionaries will start for the interior of Africa. In the morning the Rev. Dr. Daniel Steele preached, the Rev. Dr. J. N. Fitzgerald in the afternoon, and in the evening the Rev. Dr. T. Hanlon. Large audiences were in attendance at all the services, and much interest was manifested in the work of the missions to which the new laborers are going. Dr. Lowrey, in conversation with a reporter, said: "There are now thirty-two missionaries under Bishop Taylor's care. These twenty, soon to go, represent about as many mechanical professions as there are missionaries. There are carpenters, printers, farmers, engineers, etc. Bishop Taylor will meet them at the coast, probably at Cape Palmas, and conduct them to their new field. We have only lost one member of the party I sent a year ago. Bishop Taylor has now required from every one who joins him a promise that they will take medicine if they are ill. He has been able to settle several stations on the Congo, and one of its tributaries. He has purchased a large tract of land, two thousand acres at one place, for a mission station, about three hundred and fifty miles from the sea. This new party will go still further inland. There are several children in the party, four in one family.

An Editor Sent out Novel Invitations to His wedding recently. His paper is published at Putnam, Conn., and as he is personally popular in the neighborhood the invitations for the interesting ceremony were somewhat numerous. They were in type-writing, on tinted paper, each sheet bearing at its head his professional card. With the invitation was a concise history of the bridegroom, followed by a complete history of the bride, with a few material facts in regard to her family, her brother, who is a journalist in Florida, receiving special mention. The editor did not forget to mention also that the young lady in question had been a successful school teacher, and that "her character was above reproach." At the close of the nuptial card was the time table of the arrival and departure of all trains at Putnam on the important day. The novel invitations were characteristic of a man accustomed to impart all available information on any subject in hand. It may be hoped that his guests found it useful. They could not in any case plead ignorance in these matters as an excuse for absence. Preachers, who are bearers of an invitation to the marriage supper of the Lamb, ought to be equally careful that their message is so clear and definite that no honest seeker who hears them shall miss the way (Matt. 22 : 9).

The Memory of a Horse in Louisiana is the subject of comment in the New Orleans Picayune. That journal states that a Methodist preacher in North Louisiana has a horse which possesses strong reasoning powers or remarkable memory. On the first and third Sundays in the month the preacher holds service in a town which is reached by taking the left fork of the road, while on the second and fourth Sundays the town in which he preaches is at the termination of the right fork of the road. The horse, without a word or a touch of the bridle, never fails on the first and third Sundays to take the road to the left, and on the second and fourth Sundays that on the right. We admire that horse and still more the regularity of his rider, whose habits his observant steed had committed to memory. Very few horses, even those belonging to Christian people, could be trusted to take them to the right church without the guidance of the reins. The fault, however, is not with the horses, but with the owners, who have fallen into the state of religious vagrancy or neglect of public worship which is a conspicuous evil of these days. Men with all their superiority to brutes, might learn a much-needed lesson from their example of regular habits (Jer. 8 : 7).

A Romance at Castle Garden Ended Happily last week. Among the arrivals from Europe on February 17th was a good-looking, intelligent girl from Basle, in Switzerland. As she had no money nor any means of earning a livelihood, the superintendent at Castle Garden decided to send her back to Europe. The girl, however, pleaded hard to stay, saying that her lover who had sent her here would follow on the next steamer and marry her. The superintendent interrogated her, and arrived at the conclusion that her lover was a bad man who had sent her here to be rid of her and would never follow. The girl's entreaties softened him so far that he allowed her to remain until the next steamer arrived, but, as the superintendent expected, the young man was not on board. But the girl's confidence was unshaken, and she insisted that something must have detained him unexpectedly. She was certain he would come. She got others to plead for her, and the superintendent permitted her to remain, and had her cared for at the expense of the commissioners. Two more steamers arrived, and the girl scanned every face eagerly, but her lover was not among them. Then her spirits fell, and she went away in tears to assist the matron in the hospital. There would be no other steamer from a Continental port for a week. On March 8th a young man went to Castle Garden and inquired for her. The girl was called, and, with a cry of joy rushed into her lover's arms. The young man had been unable to close up his affairs so soon as he expected, but when he had done so, instead of waiting for a steamer from a Continental port he ran across to England and took passage on the City of Berlin, and so arrived when the girl was not looking for him. They were married immediately by Pastor Berkemeier. The young man's arrival was a surprise to every one but the girl who knew him and loved him. The Church in these days of unbelief has need of such constancy of spirit in looking confidently for the Coming of her Lord (11 Peter 3 : 4, 10).

Forty Hours in a Well Nearly Caused the death of a man in Milwaukee, who was rescued late at night on March 9th. On the morning of the previous day the man descended a well on his farm to repair the tubing. While engaged at his work a portion of the stone curbing at the top fell in. An alarm was at once given, and the neighbors came to his assistance. On looking at the well all hope of saving the man's life was abandoned. A faint cry from the bottom of the well showed that the man was still alive. An effort was then made to rescue him, but it was discovered that the stones had merely caught upon the boards of the bracing in an arch, and the slightest jar would precipitate them on to the man below. The situation was critical. The neighbors went to work with the utmost caution, each stone having to be carefully secured with ropes before it was hauled up. They worked all day, and then got lanterns and worked all night. After forty hours the entombed man was found lying under stones and dirt at the bottom of the well, and was safely raised to the surface. Christian workers are engaged in just such an occupation. They see their unhappy brothers groaning under the ruin sin and selfishness have brought on them, and, not listening to philosophy that bids them leave the lost to their fate, nor Socialism that would bring calamity by rash, ill-considered attempts at rescue, they, like their Master, go down to the lost ones, and by God's blessing raise them to life and happiness (Heb. 12 : 2, 3).

The Air Telegraph, Mr. Edison's Latest In-vention or discovery, has undergone a more severe test on the St. Paul Railroad than it did on the Staten Island Railroad, but with equally satisfactory results. It was proved that messages could be sent to a station from a moving train without the use of any wires attached to the cars or the track. The system is the outcome of the discovery that the induction coil will throw electric currents a foot or two; but Edison found he could throw a strong electric current fifty feet. This discovery was then combined with kindred labors of other scientists, and at length Edison made the current leap five hundred and eighty feet, so that it could easily reach the ordinary wires established on poles along the road-beds of railways. The invention is usually called the railway telegraph, but Edison styles it the air telegraph, since it is the sending of messages anywhere through the atmosphere. He expects to adapt it to ships at sea as well as to moving trains, so that communications of distress, the condition of cargoes, and any other intelligence may be readily sent and received. Mr. Edison fully explains his system in an interesting article in the North American Review. The discovery, when perfected, will prove exceedingly valuable by enabling firms to communicate with their agents on their travels, to direct them by later knowledge or to change their destination. It arouses deep interest in the scientific and commercial world. Christians in all ages have enjoyed a privilege of which this is an illustration. Without entering their closet, while going about their ordinary duties, they have looked up to God for light or guidance in unexpected emergencies and have received it (Neh. 2 : 4).

PLEADING FOR PRAYER.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

Now I beseech you, brethren, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake, and for the love of the Spirit, that ye strive together with me in your prayers to God for me; that I may be delivered from them that do not believe in Judæa; and that my service which I have for Jerusalem may be accepted of the saints; that I may come unto you with joy by the will of God, and may with you be refreshed. Now the God of peace be with you all. Amen."—ROMANS 15: 30-33.

THE apostle of the Gentiles held a very useful and glorious office; but he had by no means a smooth path in life. When we read the account of his sufferings, and persecutions, and labors, we wonder how a single individual could have gone through them all. He was a true hero: though a Hebrew of the Hebrews, he stands in the very front of the whole Gentile Church as its founder and teacher under God, and we owe to him what we can never fully estimate. When we consider the struggles of his life, we do not wonder that the apostle was sometimes in great sorrow of heart, and heavily burdened in spirit. He was so at the time when he wrote this Epistle to the Christian friends at Rome.

A PERILOUS JOURNEY.

It was a great delight to him to have to go to Jerusalem—it was a place which was much revered and loved by him; it was a greater privilege for him to go and exchange salutations with his brother apostles; and it was the most joyous privilege of all to be the bearer of a contribution from the Gentiles to relieve the necessities of the saints at Jerusalem. He rejoiced much more in that gift to Jewish believers than if it had been anything for himself. But he was well aware that there were those in Judea who hated him with deadly hatred, and would seek his life. He had been the rising hope of the Jewish party, and he had become a Christian; therefore the bigoted Jews regarded him as an apostate from the faith of their fathers.

Paul had also the apprehension that he would not be well received even by the brethren at Jerusalem. He knew what a strong conservative feeling there was among the circumcision for the maintenance of the old Jewish law, and how he was a marked man because he had shaken off entirely that yoke of bondage. Thus he had fears as to foes, and doubts about friends. His case was peculiarly hard.

What did Paul do when his spirit was greatly oppressed? He wrote to his brethren to pray for him. He asked the good friends at Rome that they would lift up their hearts earnestly and unitedly to God, that he might be preserved from the double evil which threatened him.

SEEKING HELP.

Does it astonish you that a man so rich in grace as Paul should be asking prayers of these unknown saints? It need not astonish you; for it is the rule with the truly great to think most highly of others. In proportion as a man grows in grace he feels his dependence upon God, and in a certain sense, his dependence upon God's people. He decreases in his own esteem, and his brethren increase in his estimation. Every ministering servant of the Lord Jesus Christ is in much the same condition as Paul; true, we are of a lower grade, and our work is on a smaller scale; but our needs are just as great. We have not all the grace which Paul possessed; but for that very reason we make the more pathetic an appeal to you, our friends and fellow-helps, while we use the apostle's language, and cry, "We beseech you, brethren, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake, and for the love of the Spirit, that ye strive together with us in your prayers to God for us,"

I shall call your attention to this text with the longing in my own heart that I may more abundantly myself live in your prayers. I have to rejoice in the prayers of thousands of holy men and women who love me in the Lord. I am deeply grateful for the affectionate supplications of multitudes whom I have not seen in the flesh, to whom go week by week. I am a debtor, not only to the beloved people around me, but to a larger company all over the world. These are my comfort, my riches, my strength.

To such I speak at this time. Beloved, I need your prayers more than ever. I am more and more conscious of their value; do not restrain them. Just now there is to me a special need of grace on many accounts, and I hope that some of those who have long borne me up will give me a special portion of aid at this hour. I am not worthy to use the same language as the Apostle Paul, but I know no better, and my necessity is even greater than his: therefore I borrow his words, and say, "I beseech you, brethren, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake, and for the love of the Spirit, that ye strive together with me in your prayers to God for me."

In our text there are two things: prayer asked, and a blessing given—"Now the God of peace be with you all. Amen."

I. First, here is

PRAYER ASKED FOR.

First, here is a request to the people of God for prayer in general. He asks it for himself—"That ye strive together with me in your prayers to God for me." He knew his own weakness, he knew the difficulty of the work to which he had been called, he knew that if he failed in his enterprise it would be a sad failure, injurious through coming ages to the entire Church. He cried, "Agonize for me," because he felt that much depended upon him. It is like a man who is willing to lead the forlorn hope; but he says to his comrades, "You will support me." A man cannot be charged with egotism if he begs for personal support when he is engaged in labors for others, and is not seeking himself but the success of the great cause. Under heavy responsibilities he does well to enlist the sympathies and prayers of those whom he is serving; and he has a right to have them. Beloved friends, if you are with me in the great battle for God and truth, and if you count me worthy to bear the brunt of this war, I beseech you for Christ's sake support me by your importunate wrestlings at the throne of grace. Pray for all ministers and workers, but pray also for me. I am of all men the most miserable if you deny me this.

But observe what kind of prayer he asks for: "That ye strive together"—that ye "agonize,"—that is the word. It remains to all that are true brethren in Christ that, when they see a man in agony of heart for Christ's sake and for souls' sake, they should bow the knee side by side with him, and be true brothers to him. When his labors become intense, when his difficulties are multiplied, when his heart begins to sink, and his strength is failing him, then the man must wrestle with his God, then his brethren must wrestle at his side. You see it is earnest prayer which Paul asks for, not the prayer which foams itself away in words; but prayer with force, with energy, with humble boldness, with intensity of desire, with awful earnestness; prayer which, like a deep, hidden torrent, cuts a channel even through a rock. His request was "that ye wrestle with me in your prayers to God for me;" and this is our request this day.

THE ARGUMENTS.

This verse is one of the most intense I ever remember to have read, even in so intense a book as this Holy Scripture. Observe the fervency of the pleading—"Now I beseech you, brethren, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake." What an argument! That name is full of power with true hearts. But he adds to that another argument—"for the love of the Spirit." If the Spirit of God has indeed loved you and proved it by quickening and sanctifying you, then pray for His ministers. Brethren, I say the same. Unless our profession is a lie we love each other, and we must therefore show that love by our prayers for one another. Especially if any of you have been brought to the Lord Jesus Christ by the ministry of any man whom God favors with His help, then that man must live forever in your hearts, and be remembered in your prayers. You cannot escape from the obligation of intercession for the man who brought you to Jesus.

A SCEPTICAL WARRIOR.

What is more than this, the apostle believed in the power of the prayers of simple people so to move the mind of God that He would exert His hand in providence and His influence over the hearts of men. Never let us imagine that the doctrine of the fixity of events, or the supremacy of law, as the philosophers call it, is at all contrary to the truth that prayer is effectual for its own ends and purposes. In olden times a warrior was going forth to battle for his country, and a certain preacher of the Word said to him: "My prayer is made continually for you that you may be victorious." The warrior, in his philosophic doubt, replied that he saw no use in the promised prayers; for if God had determined to give him victory, he would have it without prayer; and if fate had decreed that he should be defeated, prayers could not prevent it. To which the godly man very properly replied: "Then take off your helmet and your coat of mail, and hang up your sword and buckler. Go not forth to battle at all with your men-at-arms; for, indeed, if the Lord is to conquer your enemies He can do it without your weapons, and if He will not prosper you, it is in vain for you to mount your war-horse."

The argument, when carried out, answers itself: there is, in truth, no force in it. The net result of such reasoning would be absolute inaction. Common sense shows us how absurd it is. All means are to be used, notwithstanding the eternal purpose of God; for that purpose includes means and their uses. We declare that among the most potent means in all the world is prayer; and this must not be neglected. There are certain ascertained forces, and among those forces, always to be reckoned with and relied upon, is the force of the cry of God's dear children to their great Father in heaven; in other words, the power of prayer.

PRECISE PRAYER.

In our text there is, in the next place, a statement of the apostle's desires in detail. When we pray, we should make a point of praying for something distinctly. There is a general kind of praying, which fails from want of precision. It is as if a regiment of soldiers should all fire off their guns anyhow; possibly somebody would be killed, but the majority of the enemy would be missed. I believe that at the battle of Waterloo, there were no arms of precision, they had only the old Brown Bess, and though the battle was won, it has been said that it took as much lead to kill a man as the weight of the man's body. This is a figure of the comparative failure of indistinct, generalizing prayer. If you pray anyhow, if it be with sincerity, a measure of blessing results from it; but it will take a great deal of such praying to accomplish much. But if you plead for certain mercies definitely and distinctly, with firm, unstaggering faith, you shall richly succeed.

Our apostle gives his friends three things to pray for: First, he would have them ask that he might be delivered from them that did not believe in Judea. He was delivered, not perhaps in the precise manner which he hoped for; but he was to the letter delivered from the unbelieving Jews. They were also to ask of the Lord that his service which he had for Jerusalem might be accepted of the saints. This also was granted; the brethren did accept Paul's embassy. He met with little difficulty; the contribution was accepted with much gratitude, and we do not hear afterward of those bickerings between the Jewish and the Gentile believers. Oh that we also could be of service to that community of Christians to which we belong! Brethren, pray that our word may be accepted of our own brethren; for some of these are wandering from the way of truth.

They were to pray next, that he might come unto them with joy by the will of God; and might, with them, be refreshed. That was to be the third prayer. It is to be observed that this petition also was heard, but it was not answered as Paul might have expected or desired. He did come to them according to the will of God rather than by his own will. He may or may not have been on his way to Spain, as he purposed; he certainly was on his way to prison, as he had not purposed. The Roman saints had long looked for the apostle, and he came at last—an ambassador in bonds, a prisoner who must go to the Prætorian guard-room, and there await the emperor's will and pleasure. They had not expected to see him in such case; but they were not ashamed of his chain. They made a considerable journey to meet him, and he was filled with their company, and refreshed by their fellowship, as he had desired.

REST IN PRISON.

Even his imprisonment may have been a rest for him; it could not have involved such wear and tear as his former labors and persecutions. He was not afraid of being stoned while in imperial custody; and probably he was the more at ease because he had not to preach to such as the Corinthians and the Galatians, from whom he had asked no prayers, but had received much grief. He asked the Ephesians and Philippians, the Colossians and the Romans, to pray for him; but from the others he would have received little benefit, for they were very weak in the faith, and troubled with sad disorders. He was in his imprisonment clear of those fickle and quarrelsome folk who had often pained him.

His confinement under guard would not permit of his preaching himself to death, or wearing himself out with watchings: the soldier who kept him would make him reasonable; and so, I have no doubt, by the will of God he received precisely what he had asked his friends to pray for: "that I may come unto you with joy by the will of God, and may with you be refreshed."

See the efficacy of prayer, then, in Paul's case; though the desire did not seem to be accomplished, yet it was so. When the Lord does not appear to hear His people's prayers He is hearing them none the less, yea, rather He is answering them all the more fully and graciously. When the Lord replies by terrible things in righteousness rather than by sweet, smooth deeds of kindness, He is doubly blessing us. Do not vessels often sail more swiftly with a side wind than they would do with a directly fair wind? The sails are more under the action of a side wind than if it blew directly behind them. The Lord often gives His people side gales, and these turn out to be the best they can have. Let us trust the Divine wisdom, and rest assured that the Lord will do better things for us than we can ask or even think.

II. I have but little time left to notice indeed it occupies but one verse in the text, and that verse is the shortest of the four, and therefore I may give it due consideration in a brief space. See how Paul, with all his anxiety to gain the prayers of his friends, cannot finish the chapter without uttering a benediction upon them. "Now the God of peace." What a blessed name! In the Old Testament Scriptures He is the "Lord of Hosts"; but that is never the style in the New Testament. The "Lord of Hosts" is God as He was revealed under the old dispensation; in the majesty of His power, "the Lord is a man of war, the Lord is His name." But now that our Lord Jesus Christ has further unveiled the Father, we see Him as "the God of peace." Is not this a greater, sweeter and more cheering title? O God of peace, we long for Thy presence with us all!

THE BLESSING GIVEN,

What does Paul wish for them? "The God of peace be with you," not only "peace be with you," but, better far: "The God of peace," and so the source and fountain of peace. The benediction is,

"The God of peace be with you all." Unless all are at peace, none can be perfectly quiet. One brother who is quarrelsome can keep a whole church in trouble. One fellow knocking about the boat, may stop the oarsmen, rend the sails, and run the boat on a rock. Oh that the peace of God may be with all the saints in all the churches! It is a blessed benediction. Such a benediction we pronounce with all our heart this morning: "Now the God of peace be with you all. Amen."

TRYING TIMES.

Now we draw to a close, brethren. Prayer is sought most earnestly by me at this moment. I speak, I think, in the name of all those who have to stand prominent as preachers of the Gospel of Christ. We beseech you, our beloved friends and fellow-laborers, that you wrestle together with us with God on our behalf, that our testimony may be with power and with success; for the times are very difficult. The very air is full of unbelief. The solid earth seems well-nigh to tremble with unrest, social and political—a deep and terrible unrest that fills us with dark forebodings of the future. The hope of the world lies, under God, in the Church of Jesus Christ. Therefore we beseech you, brethren, if in other days and softer times you did in a measure restrain prayer, do so no longer, but wrestle for us with God. What is coming no man knoweth.

Men are perishing all around us. Whatever may have been the state of the world in Paul's day—and it was, no doubt, horrible to the last degree—it is not much better now; and the population of the world has so largely increased since those days that all her problems have become more difficult. We are much better aware of the miseries of vast populations than people could have been in apostolic times. Paul knew but little of the world except that portion of it which bordered on the Mediterranean Sea; the whole world then seemed to lie in a nutshell; but now our discoverers and geographers, our steamboats and telegraphs, have brought a greater world close to our doors. We share with the sorrows of India; we groan in the darkness of Africa; the cries of China are at our doors, and Egypt's griefs are our own. Increase of knowledge demands increase of prayer. "The world for Jesus" is our motto; but how the world for Jesus if the Church of Jesus does not wrestle in her prayers?

Dear brethren, do remember that the truth alone, if not enforced by the Spirit of God, will not sink into the hearts of men. They say, "Truth is mighty, and will prevail"; but this is only half the case. If you put truth upon a shelf, and let the dust lie on her record, of what use will it be to men? Truth unknown, how can it enlighten? Truth not felt, how can it renew? There must therefore be the preacher to call attention to truth; but how shall they preach except they be sent? and how shall they be sent aright except in the power of the Holy Ghost? and how can we expect the Holy Ghost if we do not ask for His working? Wherefore, we pray you, wrestle together with us in your prayers, that the Holy Ghost may go forth with the truth and by the truth.

This will be

TO YOUR PROFIT.

No man hears his pastor preach without deriving some benefit from him, if he has earnestly prayed for him. The best hearers, who get the most out of a man, are those who love him best, and pray most for him. God can make us dry wells to you if you offer no prayers for us. He can make us clouds that are full of rain, if you have pleaded with God on our behalf.

But the master argument with which we close is that which Paul mentions—"for Christ's sake." Oh, for God's sake, for His name and glory's sake, if you would honor the Father, if you would let Jesus see of the travail of His soul, wrestle together with us in your prayers for the divine working. It is so, brother, you know it is so, we are wholly dependent upon the Spirit of God. If it be so, that without God's blessing we can do nothing, and that God's blessing is given if we inquire of God for it, then I need not press you further—you will pray for me and for other preachers of the Word. If your hearts are right, you will each one resolve to offer special, continuous, and fervent prayer in private, and in your families and in our holy convocations, and these shall deepen into an agony before God, and then a blessing shall be given us which we shall scarcely have room enough to receive. Lord, teach us to pray!

NEW BOOKS.

RIFTED CLOUDS

is the title of a book which contains the record of a life not sad, though its circumstances might produce sadness in one who had not in very large measure the Spirit of Christ. It is mainly an autobiography of Bella Cooke. A few letters from friends add to it the needed touch to complete the picture, telling the reader what the author could not in modesty say of herself. It is a very beautiful life, showing in a most extraordinary degree what power the love of Christ has to support the soul under sorrow, bereavement and physical pain. The portrait prefixed to the volume represents a countenance on which it is easy to read the proof that the Lord keeps those in perfect peace whose heart is stayed upon Him. As the author says, "Not one thing hath failed." Thirty-six years of sorrow and trial, such as few know, passed over her head, yet she kept her confidence unshaken in her God; and her faith, often tried, remained firm, like a rock on which the tides dash and foam but never disturb. HOW TO BE HAPPY THOUGH MARRIED.

In spite of all that has been written and said in the way of sage counsel about marriage, a very large proportion of married people will not think the author of this book wrong in putting the qualifying "though" into his title. Marriage is a trial to many men and women. Some of them ought never to have been married at all, and others who are not happy might have been "happy though married" if they had been married to some one else. Somehow the wrong halves of the circles are continually getting joined, and the mistake is not found out until it is too late. One partner finds that there is no sympathy or community of taste or thought in the other, and the stronger is always forcing the weaker to do something not agreeable. Two cannot walk together, as the Prophet Amos reminded his contemporaries, unless they be agreed. They can pull each other back, though, and struggle and contend with each other, and that is what often happens. There are two classes of people whom this book will help if they will follow the author's counsels. People who are thinking of getting married, and people who are already married and who wish they were not. The former may be saved from making a fatal mistake which will wreck their lives, by reading about the kind of people who do or do not get on well together. The latter class may learn how the discovery that they have made a mistake may be faced, and the best made of a bad thing. There is generally wisdom in accepting the situation, whatever it may be, and instead of vainly struggling and uselessly kicking against the net, sitting down and considering how it may be made less irksome. "Sorrow," says the author in one passage that may be taken as the keynote of the whole work—"Sorrow may teach us wisdom, and if we study patience in the school of Christ much comfort will from thence be derived. And much hope, too. He is the resurrection and the life." The author has ransacked the whole realm of history and biography for illustrations with which to point his remarks, and they are excellently apt and often amusing. The advice given is thoroughly practical. There are many ways by which through sheer thoughtlessness and inexperience, misery may enter into married life. These are pointed out shrewdly, and forcibly. "Drive gently over the stones" is the title of one chapter full of sound advice. "They had a few words" is the heading of another excellent chapter. They would if heeded save many couples from rushing into the Divorce Court. At the very outset the author lays down one sound rule which ought never to be overlooked: "The husband and wife who never try to serve God will not be likely to serve each other or to gain real happiness from their marriage. . . . Live away from Him, and the happiness you enjoy to-day may become your misery to-morrow." The book may be commended to all for whom marriage has a personal interest, present or future; it will do them good. Pp. 285; price $1.25. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons.

A BRIDE'S LOST OPPORTUNITY.

A SHORT time ago a lady and gentleman went away to a country district for a change of air and scenery. They were earnest Christians. The lady began to take an interest in a young married couple who had come there for their honeymoon, and she noticed with regret that the young lady was very worldly. She used to dress very gaily, and flit about like a butterfly. The Christian lady called upon her. The young lady expressed her gratification in meeting with her. "For," she said, "I have often noticed you and your husband, and you always seemed so happy." "We don't only seem happy," rejoined the other, "but we are happy, and I will tell you the reason: we are Christians." The young lady did not like the turn the conversation was taking, and tried to change it; but the other was not to be daunted in her purpose, and continued to speak about the Christian life. Finally the hostess begged to be excused, saying she had an appointment at a certain hour, which she must keep. The lady took her departure, fully resolved on calling again. Not long after this the newly married lady was laid down by a malign fever. Soon the doctor advised her to send to her friends, because she had not long to live. She would often say, "Oh, I shall get over it, for I must go to that concert." The hairdresser was sent for to take off the beautiful hair which lay in wavy curls on the pillow. When he began to cut it, she exclaimed, "You are cutting my hair! Oh, I beg of you do not cut my hair, for I cannot go to the concert without my hair." She then begged her miserable father, who was also without Christ and without hope in the world, to take her to the concert; but within two hours she was in eternity, and when the gay concert came round her poor body lay in the grave. Oh, sinner, if ye will hear His will harden not your heart.

A MAGNANIMOUS LITTLE PLEADER.

"I PRESUME we had better go up to the school-house," said Farmer Wright. "The boy must go to school somewhere till he's old enough to go to State's prison; that's where he'll bring up in a few years."

"Don't talk so, Ephraim," said his wife, "it's flyin' in the face of Scripture. 'Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it.'"

"Dan ain't likely to depart from it, seein' he's never been in it. He's obstinate as a mule. The more we've tried to get him in the right way the more he's been balky."

"Perhaps we've not trained him right, Ephraim. Mayhap we've been too strict with him."

"Well, you ain't been too strict; you've let him have his head all along. And if we ain't done our duty, though I don't admit it, for I ha'n't spared the rod if you have, teacher ha'n't done any better wi' him. Teacher's given him up for a bad job."

"We musn't do that, Ephraim. We've got to persevere in faith, and pray the Lord to change his heart. There's good points in him. You owned he worked like a man last fall when the barn was on fire. You'll go to the teacher and try to get him taken back. I'll go along."

"Yes, I'll go," said Ephraim; "I'd better be getting my hands in so as to be ready when I have to go to the Governor to get him pardoned out of Penitentiary."

"I wish you wouldn't talk so, Ephraim," said the wife, putting on her bonnet.

"Here you, boy, get your cap and come along to school-house, and ask teacher's pardon," said

Ephraim. "You'll bring your mother's gray hairs in sorrow to the grave afore you're through."

Dan got his cap, and, looking as sulky a boy as can be imagined, prepared to follow his mother and father to the school from which his bad behavior had effected his expulsion.

"I'm most ashamed to come, Mr. Hall," said Ephraim, when he shook hands with the teacher, "I presume you guess what it's about. We want Dan took back. He's got to beg pardon, and he's got to be well spanked—I've give him a taste to go on wi', but you can give him a full dose, and we hope you'll let him come as usual."

"I don't know, Mr. Wright, whether it can be done," said the teacher. "I am afraid not. I am very sorry for you and his mother, but the other boys must be considered. It is not safe. Dan is so quarrelsome, and he is cowardly, too. The boy he set upon is quite a little fellow, and if I had not happened to see him and come up in time, I believe Dan would have killed him."

"You hear," Ephraim said to his wife, "he'll be hung yet, I know."

"Oh, please Mr. Hall, do try him again! I've talked to him, and I am sure he's sorry. He won't do anything like that again. Will you Dan? Tell the teacher you're sorry."

Dan mumbled something indistinctly about being sorry, but prudently avoided any pledges. The teacher looked at him doubtfully. He was clearly a hard case, not without mental capacity, but with a violent ungoverned temper that hitherto had been proof equally against severity and kindness. The school was more easily managed when he was out of it, but it was hard to resist the mother's pleading. "Walter Brown, come here," Mr. Hall said at last. A bright, intelligent child, poorly clad, but with a clean face that was very pale stepped forward.

"Mrs. Wright, look at this child, Widow Brown's only son. Don't you think it was cruel for a great boy like Dan to beat such a little boy as this? Dan has been very rude to me and very impertinent at times, but I could forgive that. When I saw him ill-using this boy as fiercely as if he wanted to kill him, I concluded it was dangerous to have him here. And I think so still." The teacher put his hand caressingly on the little boy's shoulder, and his waning resolution became solid again.

"Please, sir," said the little fellow, "don't mind me; let Wright come back. I ain't scared of him, and I guess he is sorry."

Dan advanced a step. He dreaded being forbidden the school, and having to work under his stern father's eye. He could imagine no worse life, and was more concerned about the teacher's decision than he cared to show. Little Walter's plea was unexpected, and, as he knew, quite undeserved. It touched his heart as it had not been touched before. "Thank you, Wal," he said, "if you'll let me come back, Mr. Hall, I'll try to behave."

"You'd better," put in Farmer Wright, with some energy.

"I will take your promise, my boy," said the teacher. "You are on your honor, remember, and don't forget that it is Walter's intercession that saves you. He is giving you good for evil. You may go to your place."

Mrs. Wright stooped, and gave the brave little pleader a kiss and a mother's blessing, and she and her husband returned home.

"Good little fellow that," remarked Ephraim, as they went. "A forgivin' little chap. It was his word that did it."

Mrs. Wright said nothing, but that night a basket was packed with some special dainties for the manufacture of which the farmer's wife was noted, and Mrs. Wright carried it herself to Widow Brown's home, and the two women cried together over the story of the scene of the morning. Dan himself said little about the affair, but little Walter had no reason to regret pleading for him, and the farmer is not quite so sure that Dan will come to wear stripes after all.

THE LATE MR. GOUGH'S HOME.

ABOUT five miles from the city of Worcester, Mass., is Hillside, the country home of the late Mr. J. B. Gough. The house is a plain, substantial, unpretentious structure. A winding road, well shaded, leads up the hill to the knoll on which the house stands, perhaps one quarter of a mile from the main road. "As I drove up this winding way," observes a visitor, "it seemed to me as though I might be entering the grounds of one of those English country seats of which we often read descriptions; and the substantial elegance, and the air of solid comfort, which pervaded the whole house within and without, and the very scenery as I saw it that summer afternoon from Mr. Gough's front porch, added to the illusion."

"The lawn, five acres, I believe, in grass, slopes down toward a meadow-land that melts into a valley, across which you look upon the rounded wooded hills opposite, not sharp and craggy like those here in my Hudson River home, not cold, naked, and grand, like those in my old home in northern Maine, but smooth and velvety, where the farmer gathers his grass; and rich in wood of varied hues of green, where the axe has not yet gone, or gone only to thin out the underbrush."

"Within, the house speaks in very plain language of much taste and culture, as well as of much attention to the solid comforts of life, and little to its show and pretension. One needs not to be introduced to Mrs. Gough to know that her husband has, what the Bible declares, is a gift from the Lord, but, being introduced, is confirmed in that faith, and finds in even a very short acquaintance that her temperance sympathies are quite as strong as those of her husband, and her literary tastes as carefully cultivated. The home life, as I saw it that day, was a delightful one, and Hillside seemed to me the very ideal of a happy Christian home."

RECONCILIATION OF INDIAN CHIEFS.

WHILE the cry is being heard throughout our land for vengeance on Geronimo and his gang of murderers, and while men everywhere, horrified at the long list of atrocities which it seems impossible to prevent the Apaches committing, are asking whether extermination is not as we have often been told the only course compatible with safety, the Christian can but wish that a really earnest and comprehensive effort could be made to evangelize the Indians. Those who know them best are least sanguine of good results from such an effort, but it will take more facts and arguments than can be adduced to convince a godly man that any man or class of men is beyond the reach of the softening, humanizing influence of the Gospel.

The following incident recently published by an English contemporary, purporting to be related by Judge Conrad, of Canada, affords encouragement to the hope that even an Apache heart may be subdued by the teaching of Christianity:

"It has been alleged by high authority that the Indians cannot be converted; the readiest answer to the impious and profane absurdity is, that they have been converted. A large body of Indians have been converted by the Moravian Missionaries, and settled in the West, where their simplicity, harmlessness, and happiness seemed a renewal of the better days of Christianity. During the Revolutionary War, these settlements, named Lichtenau and Gnadenhutzen, being located in the seat of the former Indian contests, were exposed to outrage from both parties. Being, however, under the tuition and influence of the white people, and having adopted their religion, they naturally apprehended that the hostile Indians, sweeping down upon the American frontier, would take advantage of their helplessness, and destroy them as allies of the whites.

"A party of two hundred hostile Hurons fiercely approached the Moravian Indian town. The Christian Indians conducted themselves in this trying extremity with meekness and firmness. They sent a deputation with refreshments to their approaching foes, and told them that by the Word of God, the universal Father, they were taught to be at peace with all men, and entreated for themselves and their white teachers peace and protection.

"And what replied the savage, fresh from the wilds and panting for blood? Did he answer with his war-whoop, and lead on his men to the easy slaughter of his foes? What else could be expected? Yet such was not the response of the red warrior. He said he was on a war-party, and his heart had been evil, and his aim had been blood, but the words of his brethren had opened his eyes. He would do them no harm. He hoped they would be on better terms, and learn to love one another. 'Obey your teachers,' said he; 'worship your God, and be not at all afraid. No creature shall harm you.'"

Such a speech uttered by one Indian chief to another indicates their susceptibility to Christian influence, without which, instead of their hands being clasped in amity they would have been engaged in deadly conflict.

AT THE MISSION.

A SERIAL STORY.

Westward Bound.

"OH! is not this glorious—delicious!" exclaimed Juliet Erle, as she came up to her fellow-passenger, Maria Selden, who was seated on a bench by the bulwarks of the good ship Quebec, bound to Canada. "The blue above, and the blue below—and—not exactly silence—but beauty wheresoe'er we go! How delightfully we are speeding over the waves of the broad Atlantic!" she added, as she seated herself by the side of her friend.

For friends they were already; though little more than a week before, neither had known of the other's existence. They shared the same small cabin, with all its manifold discomforts, and always were seated next each other at the cuddy-table. But what had drawn the two most closely together was Maria's sister-like care of her younger companion during the trials of storm and sickness which had made the first three days and nights of the voyage as disagreeable as what remained of it promised to be pleasant. Juliet had never seen before such sympathy and unselfishness as that shown to her by a perfect stranger. They had made a strong impression on her mind, counterbalancing the prejudice she might otherwise have entertained against one "dreadfully religious."

The tossing and the miseries of sea-life appeared now to be over; ladies no longer kept their cabins—and gentlemen who had looked cadaverous made bold onslaughts on the plentiful fare provided. Amusement became the order of the day. The gayer of the passengers even proposed getting up a scene from an English opera to beguile the tedium of the voyage. Juliet entered with eagerness into every scheme of diversion. She now looked the picture of health and happiness as she gazed on the placid ocean, on which remained hardly a trace of the tumultuous heaving and rolling which had sorely tried the passengers of the Quebec.

"It is very enjoyable," said Miss Selden. "I have been long watching that lovely iceberg afar off, glittering like a jewel in the sun. How it has changed its shape since it first came in view! It was like a castle five minutes ago, with battlemented walls of crystal, now it has split into two—there—there—half of it has sunk under the waves with a splash!"

"You can watch it just as well if you 'come and pace the deck with me;' it is really too cold to sit still," cried Juliet. The two maidens linked their arms together, rather for warmth and companionship than because the motion of the vessel made their steps unsteady, for there was little roughness now. The north breeze was scarcely strong enough to wave the blue veil on Maria's simple straw hat, or to make the curling crimson feather tremble on Juliet's velvet-trimmed felt. The same difference between the taste or the means of the ladies was apparent in the rest of their dress. Over Maria's dark blue serge dress was thrown a gray plaid shawl; Juliet's pretty figure was covered by a luxurious seal-skin jacket; many buttoned was the kid glove that rested on the arm of Maria, and the younger lady's boots were as dainty as any that Regent Street could supply. Both of the girls were attractive in appearance, but of different types of beauty. Juliet's was that of the apple-blossom, the pink-tinged pride of the spring, full of the laughing hope of the future. Maria's was that of the pure, calm white lily, surrounded by the waters of trouble, yet ever rising above them. She looked, with her pale cheek and thoughtful brow, like one who had suffered, yet in suffering had found peace. Maria's smile was less merry than that of Juliet, but the joy which it expressed was deeper.

"I delight in the icebergs just as much as you do," said Juliet. "I am so glad that we have come across their track, for one did not expect it in July. The captain says that they are unusually late this year. I asked him yesterday morning whether we were likely to see any icebergs to-day. 'Yes, more than enough,' he replied. I do not think that we can have more than enough of anything so lovely as that one yonder. I only wish that the captain would take us closer to the beauties; we keep at such a respectful distance."

"The captain has doubtless his own reasons for not being too intimate with the bergs," was Maria's playful reply.

"There might be some coldness between us on nearer acquaintance," laughed Juliet. "But now, Maria (you said I might call you Maria, Miss Selden sounds so stiff!), shall I tell you that I regard the sight of the icebergs as a kind of birthday treat, for—I don't care to tell any one here but you—I am twenty-one years old to-day."

"I am sure that I wish you every best blessing!" said Miss Selden earnestly, looking affectionately at the bright face which was raised toward hers, for she was the taller of the two. "But are you really twenty-one? I should not have guessed you more than eighteen."

"Every one says so," observed Juliet Erle. "You see I've not had many cares to cover my face with wrinkles; I've led an easy comfortable life. I've two sisters—half-sisters, I mean—a great deal older than myself (one of my nieces was presented at Court this year). I divide my time between these sisters. Both of them, of course, spend the season in London (Sir Theodore is an M.P.) but Mrs. Delany has a fine country-seat in Suffolk; and my eldest sister, Lady Gathorne, is always for months either in Brighton or Paris, so between them I see a good deal of life. I am now going to Canada with the Bates's—old friends—for a change, and to recruit after the season, which thoroughly knocked me up. I was always out six nights in the seven, and what with afternoon concerts, kettle-drums, promenades, and exhibitions, I lived in such a whirl of amusement that I was half dead at the end. I had quite lost my appetite and my spirits; so the doctor ordered a voyage, and now this delicious sea-breeze has set me all right again!"

Miss Selden was silent for a few moments; the two turned round on their quarter-deck walk; then Maria gently asked, "Do you think this gay life a happy one, Miss Erle?"

"Oh, yes!" was Juliet's hesitating reply; "at least as long as one is hearty and well."

"If you could remain hearty and well, would you wish to lead such a life for fifty—for a hundred years more?"

"A hundred!" repeated Juliet, laughing; "you are giving me a pretty long term! Well, one would certainly tire of balls, races, and routs long before a hundred years had run out."

"Then the very best that the world could give would pall before long," said Maria; "and you know that you and I have a whole eternity before us!"

"I don't think much, perhaps not enough, of these things," said Juliet, a little more gravely. "I wonder how you, who are so terribly good, have anything to say to a foolish little creature like me." Then abruptly changing the conversation, she went on, "I'm not going to tell the Bates that this is my birthday; it's no great matter my coming of age, for I am not an heiress; I have only £5000 of my own, scarcely enough for pin-money, less than £200 a year." Another pause of silence ensued, another turn on the deck, as the paddles turned round and round, churning the blue waves into cream, and the vessel spread joyously on, leaving a foaming track in its wake.

Juliet was the first of the ladies to speak. "I wonder what you had in your mind when you wished me every best blessing," she said.

"I wished you the best of hopes, the best of joys, the best of Friends," answered Maria.

"You had a serious meaning; I guessed that. I hope that you won't be dreadfully shocked if I own that I don't want all of your 'best blessings' just now. I should like, I confess, to enjoy myself a little longer. I know that I must become very good, and do a great deal, and give up a great deal before I can go to heaven, but—" Juliet made a very long pause indeed; in fact she did not know how to finish her sentence, so sat down again on the bench.

Miss Selden took her place beside her companion. "I think that you and I look at the same thing from different points of view," observed Maria; "religion seems to you all giving up, to me it appears all receiving."

Juliet looked at her friend with surprise. "You don't mean to say that you do not think it needful to give up a great deal for religion? Why, I heard to-day that you are going to America as a sort of missionary to the Red Indians!" This appeared to the younger lady to be the very ne plus ultra of self-sacrifice and devotion.

"Not exactly as a missionary," replied Miss Selden. "My brother, who is one, has lost his wife, and needs some one to look after his five little children. As my dear parents have three other daughters at home, we all felt that I ought to go and help him. I fear that I shall be too busy in the nursery to do more than a very little work among the heathen."

"Have you ever seen these children?" asked Juliet.

"No, they were all born in Canada. I have not seen my brother since his marriage."

"So you are crossing the Atlantic to play nursery governess to a pack of young children who are perfect strangers to you! Why, you don't even know whether you will like them!"

"I mean to love them!" cried Maria, with animation.

"I think it will be a dreadful life; I am quite sorry for you," said Juliet. "Imagine being in a perpetual racket, with children of all ages romping, or howling, the only variety paying a visit now and then to some hideous squaw, with the chance of being scalped at the end! But then you are one of those very good people who would do anything to win heaven."

"I have not the faintest idea of winning heaven in any such way," said Maria. "I should as soon expect that if I threw my veil on those heaving waters I could use it as a vessel to bear me up, and carry me in safety to the other side of the Atlantic."

"I should be sorry to be your fellow-traveller on such a raft," said Juliet, smiling. "But I really cannot understand what you mean. If a young lady like you leaves her country and home, and devotes her life to work intensely disagreeable, she must, of course, have some motive for doing so. She must expect to be paid in another world for sacrifices in this."

"May I explain myself in parable fashion?" asked Maria. "Suppose that a nobleman should find a poor man languishing in prison, because unable to pay an enormous debt that he owes. The nobleman takes the man out of prison, cures him of a dangerous illness, gives to him all that he needs, in short, treats him as if he were a son. The released debtor says: 'I wish that I had some way of showing my gratitude to such a benefactor!' The nobleman, just to gratify the poor fellow, says: 'Will you look after and weed that little flower-pot in my garden?' The man complies. Now, do you think that however carefully the trifling work be performed, that the released debtor will say, or even think in his heart, 'I was saved from prison on account of my labor in the garden—my friend is indebted to me for my services? I have given up some hours to weeding and watering, and there are really enough of flowers in my plot to make a tolerable nosegay!'"

"How absurd he would be!" said Juliet.

"And so, dear Miss Erle, should I be, if I thought that anything that I do, or give up as you call it, would give me the slightest claim to heaven. Freedom and cleansing, pardon and peace, light and life, have all been freely bestowed upon me; it is just a pleasure to do any trifle to show how grateful and happy I am."

"I should not be happy in your place," said Juliet. "I hate looking after children; and as for having anything to do with Red Indians, I should rather have to do with bears. They are the savages that make head-dresses of feathers, paint and tattoo their faces, torture their enemies, and, I rather think, actually eat them!"

"I never heard of that last part of the business," said Maria, with a smile. "Are you not thinking of the savages in Robinson Crusoe?"

"Oh, all savages are pretty much alike!" said Juliet. "It is all well to read novels about them, but to live among them—horrible! horrible!! horrible!!!"

"Is not this cold horrible?" asked Maria.

Juliet was surprised at the sudden turn in the conversation, the subject of which she was not very sorry to change. "I think the weather just delightful," she said; "so bright, invigorating, bracing! How I do enjoy pacing up and down on the deck!"

"Because you have buoyant health, vigorous life, and are well protected from the cold," observed Maria. "But suppose yourself to be brought here exhausted from your last ball-room, attired in the thinnest gauze, would you enjoy the cold then? Would not this breeze, which is now exhilarating, chill your frame through and through?"

"It would be dreadful!" said Juliet, shivering at the idea; "it is my nice sealskin jacket that makes me defy, and even to enjoy, the cold!"

"And can you not imagine something in spiritual matters that can make one defy, even enjoy, what would otherwise be distressing? The vigorous life, the warm love which enables a Christian to meet the chill of trial with greater pleasure than can ever be found in a ball-room?"

"I own that I cannot imagine it," said Juliet.

"Will you let me use a familiar illustration from Scripture? The Israelites, during their bondage in Egypt, had what products of the earth that fruitful land could supply—emblems of earthly pleasures; but in the barren desert they were more bountifully fed, they had a daily supply of sweet manna—they ate the bread of angels."

"Don't think me quite a heathen for saying it, but I think that one would need be an angel one's self always to relish such food," said Juliet; "I am afraid that I at least—"

The conversation was here interrupted by a stout elderly lady, who came toward the place where the two young ladies were sitting. Mrs. Bates was pressing her sable muff to her face, where the pink-tipped nose showed the effect of the weather.

"Juliet! I really cannot see you sitting there to catch your death of cold looking at icebergs; you know that you are under my care. If you wish to stay on deck you should walk. For my part, I'm going down into the saloon to prevent being turned into an iceberg myself."

"It would be a marvellous transformation," said Juliet to Maria in a mirthful whisper, as the companions arose and resumed their quick walk on the deck.

(To be continued.)

THY WILL BE DONE.

S. S. Lesson for March 28. Rom. 12:2. Golden Text, Ps. 40:8. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

A Merchant's Submissive Spirit—The Will of God Perfect—Christ's Vocation—His Fear of Failing in the Garden—How to Know God's Will—Not a Mocking Injunction—His Will for the Sinner—For Believers—For Healing—The Renunciation of the Will.

THE devil is always at work to make us think the will of God is a hard, difficult, oppressive thing. "Well, my dear, it is God's will," said a merchant to his wife, when the tidings came to hand that a cargo, which represented the third part of his capital, had been lost. When that same man died, and whenever sickness, sorrow or trial occurred in the family, it was their custom to sing the hymn: "Thy will be done." But when anything happy or joyful occurred—when a child was born, when there was a wedding, when the children returned safe and sound from school—no one said anything about the will of God. It was looked upon as something which represented suffering, hardship, trial; something to be endured with the best grace possible, but from which there was no escape. The idea that the will of God was in itself

GOOD AND ACCEPTABLE AND PERFECT could hardly enter into hearts so little acquainted with Him.

In the life of our blessed Lord, His Father's will is seen to be the chief and inspiring motive. "When He cometh into the world, He saith, . . . Lo I come (in the volume of the Book it is written of Me) to do Thy will, O God" (Heb. 10:5-7); and He adds: "I delight to do Thy will, O My God: yea, Thy law is within My heart" (Ps. 40:8). It was not only the very purpose of His life, but the delight and joy of our blessed Lord to do His Father's will. To Him it was not irksome but "good and acceptable and perfect;" a joy and not a grief, not like a constraint from without, but a law or power within which possessed Him and held His heart captive. It was also a real physical strength and refreshment to Jesus, "My meat is to do the will of Him that sent Me, and to finish His work" (John 4:34). It was the one thing He sought; "I seek not Mine own will but the will of Him that sent Me" (John 5:30). It was His vocation, "I came down from heaven not to do Mine own will, but the will of Him that sent Me" (John 6:38). Even when, for a few moments, He lost the thread of His Father's will, and in dire perplexity and anguish lest He should die without fulfilling His mission of redemption on the cross, He said: "My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death," and cried: "Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from Me," He yet added: "Nevertheless, not My will, but Thine be done." He was heard in that He feared" (Heb. 5:7). He was saved from death in Gethsemane, He was permitted to endure the cross which He had foretold to His disciples, but even when it seemed to Him as though this redemption work for a ruined world was to be withheld from Him, so persuaded was He that the Father's will was "good, and acceptable, and perfect," that He could say in such a moment, "Not My will but Thine be done."

How is it then that the will of God can be so much dreaded by His creatures? There are numbers who are kept in fear and bondage, in uncertainty and misery, from misapprehension of the will of God. "How are we to know the will of God?" some may say. Surely by His Word. It is His will that we should know it; "Be ye not unwise, but understanding what the will of the Lord is" (Eph. 5:17). Paul prayed for the Colossians, of whose faith, love and hope he had heard, who "knew the grace of God in truth," and whose "love in the Spirit" had reached his ears, "that they might be filled with the knowledge of God's will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding, that they might walk worthy of the Lord to all pleasing" (Col. 1:9, 10). Epaphras prayed also for this Church that they might "stand perfect and complete in all the will of God" (Col. 4:12). If it were not possible for us to know the will of God, the exhortation in Ephesians would be a mockery, and the prayers in Colossians vain. Our dear Lord says: "If any man he shall know of the doctrine" (John 7:17); and this accords with the exhortation of Paul to the Romans: "I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service. And be not conformed to this world, but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God." It is just as we yield to the will of God that we find it fits us; just as our will yields and we will do His will, it opens to us in all its perfection of wisdom; just as we yield our bodies as instruments created, redeemed, preserved, healed to do the will of God, we learn how good, how acceptable, how perfect that will is in every moment, in every circumstance.

WILL DO HIS WILL

But can we prove from Scripture that the will of God is good, perfect, acceptable? Let the Word of God answer. What is

HIS WILL FOR THE SINNER?

"God our Saviour . . . will have all men to be saved, and to come to the knowledge of the truth" (1 Tim. 2:3, 4). "It is not the will of My Father which is in heaven that one of these little ones should perish" (Matt. 18:14). "The Lord is . . . longsuffering to us-ward, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance" (II Pet. 3:9). Go into a company of the most lost and depraved, with the joyous conviction that God wills the salvation of these souls; that the will of an Almighty Saviour is with you, and O how small the difficulties look! With what joy you can tell them of His good, His acceptable, His perfect will for their salvation; that God wants to save them more than they want to be saved. Pray with the same conviction for the heathen and you will soon cease to pray a prayer which is only a fervent wish, and you will find yourself saying: "Thy will be done, O God, in their conversion," and your heart will praise Him for a will so good, so acceptable, so perfect. You will pray for your unsaved relations, looking more at God's will to save them than at their will which resists.

What is

HIS WILL FOR BELIEVERS?

How many there are trying, striving, praying, struggling to be holy, and almost ready to blame God for not hearing their prayer, which, they think, deserves an answer. But, all the time, the real thought in their hearts is, "I am anxious to be holy, but God is holding back and not doing all for me which He could do!" What does He say? "This is the will of God, even your sanctification." What? God wants me to be holy? God wants these tempers subdued? God wants this jealousy, envy, spite and malice cleansed away! Then what can I say but "Thy will be done." Thy good, acceptable, perfect will be done in my sanctification. I will what Thou wilt? He wants to get us over from our human to His divine side, and then all is changed; we see how our very fervency and earnest struggling presupposed that God had to be overcome, whereas His will was to supply all our need.

How about

HIS WILL FOR HEALING?

The same Lord who wills that all men should be saved, and who is not willing that any should perish, and who therefore bare our sins in His own body on the tree (1 Pet. 2:24), also took our infirmities and bore our sicknesses that He might fulfil that word in healing all that were sick (Matt. 8:16, 17). The same Jesus who receiveth sinners received all the sick who came to Him and healed them. The same Jesus who says: "Whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely," says: "Is any sick among you, let him" be healed (James 5:14, 15). "Pray one for another that ye may be healed" (v. 16). Thus we can say: "Lord, save this soul because it is Thy will; Lord sanctify me, deliver and keep me from sinning because it is Thy will; Lord, heal my body because it is Thy will; thy good, and acceptable, and perfect will."

But it is only as we renounce our own will that we learn to understand what the will of the Lord is. The living sacrifice is consumed, and retains its proportions, its shape, its color no more; it combines with the element which consumes it. And just as we let ourselves go, and lose ourselves in God, so He takes us up into Himself, and unites our will with His, making us in love with His will so that it becomes to us a delight, and our meat and drink; no longer a doleful dirge, an irresistible but unacceptable necessity. Our dear Lord did not find His Father's will crossing His purposes, because He had no purpose apart from His Father: "I thank Thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that Thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and revealed them unto babes. Even so, Father, for so it seemed good in Thy sight." He trusted His Father's will. Paul tells us that "All things work together for good to them that love God." If this is so, then in everything which occurs, however trying in itself, we may glory in this that it is the good, acceptable, perfect will of God which is making it work together. As long as we do not accept God's will it looks unacceptable, but once accepted by us, He makes it acceptable.

But how can we accept the will of God and yet ask to be delivered from sickness? Just as we accept temptation as permitted by God, and yet ask and accept deliverance from sin. Just as we accept a loss or perplexity as something to be trusted over to God immediately. God would have us at once refer all which happens in our inner or our outer life to Him: stoical endurance savors more of obstinacy and pride than of faith, but a trustful commitment of all to Him who is our Shepherd of soul and body brings about an increasingly fearless and trustful joy in the good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God, which we pray may be done on earth as it is in heaven.

"YE HAVE DONE IT UNTO ME."

MATT. 25: 40.

A poor wayfaring man of grief
Hath often crossed me on my way,
Who sued so humbly for relief,
That I could never answer, Nay.
I did not stop to ask his name,
Whither he went, or whence he came;
But there was something in his eye
That won my love—I knew not why.

Once, when my scanty meal was spread,
He entered—not a word he spake—
Just famishing for want of bread.
I gave him all: he blessed it, brake
And ate, but gave me part again.
Mine was an angel's portion then,
For, while I fed with eager haste,
The crust was manna to my taste.

I found him where a fountain burst
Clear from the rock—his strength was gone.
The heedless water mocked his thirst;
He heard it, saw it hastening on.
I ran and raised the sufferer up;
Thrice from the stream he drained my cup,
Dipped, and returned it running o'er—
I drank, and never thirsted more.

'Twas night—the floods were out; it blew
A wintry hurricane aloof;
I heard his voice abroad, and flew
To welcome him beneath my roof.
I warmed, I clothed, I cheered my guest,
I laid him on my couch to rest,
Then made the earth my bed, and seemed
In Eden's garden while I dreamed.

Stripped, wounded, beaten nigh to death,
I found him by the highway-side;
I roused his pulse, brought back his breath,
Revived his spirit, and supplied
Wine, oil, refreshment—he was healed;
I had, myself, a wound concealed,
But from that hour forgot the smart,
And peace bound up my broken heart.

In prison I saw him next, condemned
To meet a felon's doom at morn;
The tide of lying tongues I stemmed,
And honored him 'mid shame and scorn;
My friendship's utmost zeal to try,
He asked if I for him would die?
The flesh was weak, my blood ran chill,
But the free spirit cried, "I will."

Then in a moment to my view
The Stranger started from disguise:
The tokens in His hands I knew—
My Saviour stood before mine eyes.
He spoke, and my poor name He named:
"Of Me thou hast not been ashamed;
These deeds shall thy memorial be.
Fear not; Thou didst it unto me."

ELIZABETH MOUATT, the Heroine of the Great Drift from Shetland to Norway—The Columbine.

ELIZABETH MOUATT.

The Heroine of the Drift in the Columbine.

Her Life in Shetland—Hairbreadth Escapes from Death—Setting out in the Columbine on January 30—The Captain Overboard—The Crew Desert the Ship—Imprisoned in the Cabin—Her First Night Alone—The First Meal—Her Prayer of Faith—The Last Biscuit—The Ninth Day—The Columbine on the Rocks—Saved.

AN extraordinary adventure, as the daily journals briefly reported, has occurred in the North Sea. Were the facts not attested by many witnesses and evidence that compels belief, it would be difficult to give them credence; but they are proved beyond the possibility of doubt. That an aged invalid woman should have been left alone on a small vessel in a sea bristling with dangerous rocks, and that she should have sailed without guidance for nine days and nights, and yet be alive to tell the story, seems almost like a miracle; yet that is just what occurred. The heroine of so wonderful an adventure is naturally an object of interest, and so eager was the desire to see her, that a Londoner of the P. T. Barnum type has offered her $50 a week and board to take a place in his exhibition. It speaks volumes for the woman's modesty and sense that she declined the offer, saying with characteristic point: "Faith, I've travelled enough for the rest of my poor days." Our readers, however, will be interested in the portrait of her and the picture of the ship she was in, which appear on the first page. From the narratives of her voyage, supplied by the European correspondent of the New York Herald and English journals, the following facts are extracted:

THE VOYAGE.

Elizabeth Mouatt is sixty years old. She has long been regarded as bearing what is foolishly termed "a charmed life" in the district of Seatness, in the Shetland Isles off the coast of Scotland, where she lived. Eighteen years ago she was accidentally shot in the crown of the head by a sportsman who had not observed her, being in the range of his game. Ten years later, while driving a peat cart, the pony became restive, and she was thrown out. One of the wheels crushed her foot, injuring also her hip. She has never been fully well since.

On January 30th this frail woman embarked at Gruitness, in the Columbine, intending to visit her niece at Lerwick, the chief town of the Shetland Islands. She carried with her forty of the Shetland shawls for which the islands are famous, with which her neighbors, who make them, intrusted her to sell for them. She was the only passenger, and, being seasick, remained in the little cabin. Proceeding to sea with the usual complement of three men, the little vessel had not long been under way before the weather became more boisterous.

ALONE.

Elizabeth Mouatt was below seasick, and was seated near the foot of the cabin steps. She heard the skipper cry out, "The main-sheet has parted!" Looking up through the open hatchway she saw him run to the fore part of the vessel, and the next moment heard another voice cry, "Clear away the boat!" Fearing something alarming had occurred, she endeavored to climb up the steps to look out. In doing so she fell back on the floor. In about ten minutes she rallied, and on again ascending the steps, to her amazement she discovered the crew had left. She felt no doubt that when the skipper went forward the swinging boom had knocked him overboard, and that within ten minutes of her fall the two men had put out in the boat to rescue him, forgetting or regardless of the fact that the poor woman was alone in the ship, and they might not be able to return.

She naturally concluded that the Columbine would speedily become a wreck, and she went below to gather her few poor effects together in case of a rescue. On again attempting to ascend to the deck that, as she said, she "might look death in the face," the ladder fell, and she was quite unable to replace it, so that she was imprisoned below deck, and could only catch glimpses of the surrounding sea by climbing on a box, that she dragged to the place where the ladder had been. This brought her chin on a level with the deck.

The wind blew with some violence, driving the Columbine rapidly before it to the open sea, leaving the two men in their boat weary with their fruitless efforts to save the captain and unable to overtake the Columbine. The poor woman could see distinctly the sailors in their boat a considerable distance away.

THE FIRST NIGHT

was a terrible one, the vessel rolling heavily. It was pitchy dark and bitterly cold, with the sea washing down the open hatchway, and keeping her drenched to the skin. The only provisions she carried were two biscuits and a bottle of milk, and though a week's rations were in the fore-castle, she was totally unable to leave her prison-chamber to avail herself of it.

Elizabeth Mouatt said: "I could only maintain my sitting posture by keeping firm hold of a rope fastened to the roof, and was in danger every moment of being thrown violently on the floor. The idea of being alone in a little craft on a stormy sea, with the darkness of night coming on, horrified me. A feeling of terror came over me, and I commenced to scream. Then I became calm, knowing my voice could reach no human ear. And then there came to me the thought of the impossibility of people on shore ever being aware of my fate. This was on Saturday night."

When the light of morning came again no land was to be seen, and not even a distant sail. The sea was still rough, but the poor woman's hope began to revive, seeing that the vessel had survived that fearful night. From this time, she said in her subsequent statement, she never despaired, but put her trust in God, fully assured that He would send rescue to her.

The men landed and gave the alarm, and what could be done was done. Vessels sailed on the course the Columbine had last been seen to take, and at a later date the only steamer accessible was despatched from Mid Yell to scour the neighboring sea. All at length returned unsuccessful, and the search from Shetland was abandoned on the two men who had formed her crew expressing their confident belief that the smack had by that time sunk, the boom being so placed that, in the trough of the sea, it would so damage the vessel as to cause her to founder. Nevertheless, as a last resource, the chief proprietor of Mainland caused telegrams to be sent to different stations on the opposite shores of Norway, offering rewards for any intelligence which might aid in recovering the castaway or lead to some tidings regarding her fate.

The pecuniary bribe was unnecessary, for to any one acquainted with the Scandinavian character the mere fact of a woman drifting about in a derelict hulk would be at once the signal for the fishermen from the Naze to the North Cape to be on the alert. Still, the certainty that they would be paid for their lost time would stimulate their alacrity, and, as circumstances proved, not without happy results.

A TERRIBLE SITUATION.

The vessel was rolling at the mercy of the waves in the stormy North Sea, and as the well-known outlines of the islands were quickly left behind the truth of the terrible situation in which she was placed presented itself to the old woman. Being under no sort of control, the helm shifted at every lurch. The waves washed over the deck first from one side and then from the other. Heavy showers of spray were blown down the hatchway. The loosened sail, flapping with the wind, was gradually being reduced to tatters. The boom was swinging, and the ropes with the blocks attached were flying dangerously about from the rigging.

HER FIRST MEAL.

On Sunday, as daylight came, she fancied she heard a distant church bell ring. She prayed, and felt calmer. Now, having tasted nothing since Saturday, she made her first meal on board, which was confined to half a biscuit and a small quantity of milk. The experience of Sunday was much like that of the previous afternoon. The storm continued unabated in fury. By standing on the chest which she fastened where the ladder had been, she could look out, and every day cast her eyes over the sea in search of land or passing vessels.

Sunday closed dark and stormy, and the prospect of another night of terror was overpowering. On Monday morning she again drew upon her scanty store of biscuit and milk. Snow and hail had given place to rain. Finding a piece of rope, she fastened it to that which hung from the roof, and made a convenient loop in which she could rest one elbow at a time. This helped her to remain seated, and her blistered hands got better.

THE COURSE.

What course or courses the Columbine took can only be guessed at. When last seen from Shetland she was drifting northward; but as the place at which the "winds and waves delivered" her is north-east from the islands, she must have soon altered her direction, and as the distance between the two points is barely two hundred miles, whereas she must have sailed nearly a thousand miles, the probability is that the smack floated about in an aimless manner. Had the wind been due south she might have been driven to the Polar ice fields, or (if the breeze had blown from the east) either dashed to pieces on the rocks or propelled into the Atlantic. Not improbably, after keeping before the prevailing wind for some distance, she got into the Gulf Stream, which passes along the Norwegian coast, and then slowly came into the peaceful haven where eventually she was found. Still, no matter how we look at the story of this drift, it is full of wonder.

The captain's watch, hanging on a nail in the cabin, had ceased to go at half-past twelve on Monday. When the lonely woman fancied the day had advanced to about that hour she wound it up. This she did daily until her release, when, as she somewhat triumphantly said, the watch was found to be not so far wrong. The presence of the watch, too, was a source of quiet comfort in her loneliness almost, as she added, "like to something in the way of company." Searching around the cabin during the moments when the lurching ceased, she found a stout sailor's jacket, which she put on above her shawl. Thus a sufficient degree of heat was maintained in her body to prevent any serious shivering, which in the night might have been very dangerous.

HER LAST BISCUIT.

Monday night, like the two which had preceded it, closed dark and cheerless. Tuesday morning brought no improvement in the weather and the usual eager gazing over the waters. The same scanty meal was again eaten. Toward the afternoon the weather moderated, and it was possible to sit without holding the rope. The cold in her extremities was the chief cause of the old woman's suffering. On Wednesday the sun was shining brightly, and continued so all day. There was in this a glimmer of comfort, and the poor, lonely creature sat down to her last meal on board, with the last half of her last biscuit and drinking from a bottle of milk, which on the previous Saturday she had herself taken from the cows at her humble home.

She then climbed upon the box and looked out. It was about midday, and the bows were directed toward the sun. Looking behind, to her momentary delight she saw land, which she knew by the sun lay northward, and that the course of the vessel was for the time southerly. She described the land as a range of low hills, with much higher, snow-covered hills in the distance. The course of the vessel soon left them far behind. By Thursday morning the craft had lost every rag of sail, and was drifting stern foremost.

More cheerless hours passed. Early on Friday morning the wind sprang up. The sea was violent, and hunger and horror again oppressed the old woman. Her thirst increased, and she eagerly licked drops of condensed vapor from the cabin windows. Through Saturday the storm continued, but after midnight—then one hundred and sixty-eight hours having passed—she felt the first indication that either help or destruction was at hand. The vessel began to strike violently on some submerged rocks, and with the rise and fall of the sea she found a bed, now on one inclination and then on another.

The timbers began to creak and strain, and as the vessel struck rock after rock, the noises produced by the bumping, the shifting of the furniture, and the oscillation of the mast, which now began to give way, were to the prisoner most terror striking. It is due to the long-suffering little peasant woman to say that even in these trying hours she maintained her calmness and fortitude. "I knew," she said, "I could do nothing. My only desire was for the return of the light of day."

THE COLUMBINE AGROUND.

When Sunday morning broke, weak and exhausted as she was from starvation and exposure, and notwithstanding that the vessel was still rolling among the rocks, Elizabeth Mouatt contrived to raise herself once more upon the box and to look out. Here at last was land. The vessel was still beating along stern foremost. Every rag of canvas had blown away. Part of the rigging was hanging over the side, and the mast threatened every moment to go overboard. At about eight o'clock the Columbine ran upon a shingly beach, leaned over to one side and remained fast, the mast in the same minute going over into the sea with a loud crash. As the vessel leaned toward shore the water in the hold made its way into the cabin, and soon rose to a foot.

STRANDED ON AN ISLAND.

The place where the Columbine came to land after its erratic voyage across the North Sea was the little island of Lepsoe, on the coast of Norway, twelve miles north of the fishing town of Aalesund. This island is four miles long and two broad, consisting namely of one huge rock sixteen hundred feet high, with, at several places, narrow seaboard boulders. Where the Columbine stranded there is only a very short stretch of shingly beach, and had the vessel struck a few fathoms either to the east or west of the identical spot on which it now lies it could only have been dashed to pieces against the precipitous rocks, and become an irrecoverable wreck, and Elizabeth Mouatt would have been killed.

The solitary passenger was now eagerly looking out from the hatchway which stood breast high to her from her footing on the box beneath. She was able to see young lads who had for some time been watching the smack. She waved her arms, and raised her voice to its loudest pitch. As the poor woman screamed for help the lads shouted in return. Several ran off to the nearest hamlet, called Farstad, for assistance. A number of fishermen arrived, but as the vessel was distant from the beach six yards, and was in a heavy surf, it was evidently going to be a work of considerable difficulty to get on board.

TO THE RESCUE.

One fisherman, with a rope around his waist, walked into the sea, but was several times beaten back. At length, getting hold of part of the sail and a rope hanging from the bow, he climbed on board, and was soon afterward followed by a companion.

Still, however, the distance between the vessel and the land was great. The fishermen put a rope around the woman's waist and threw it to land. They next lifted her over the bow and gave her hold of the rope by which the vessel had been drawn toward the shore, and which was there held taut by willing hands. Suspended in mid-air, this much-tried woman of sixty years actually scrambled hand over hand for a distance of several yards until relieved by two men from the shore, who, standing up to their middle in the water, caught her in their arms. She was carried ashore nearly dead with terror and exhaustion. She recovered with a rapidity scarcely conceivable in a woman of her years, and was able to make the voyage home, where she arrived on February 24th.

Among the comments made upon this extraordinary deliverance not a few ascribe it to the "surprising luck" for which the woman has long been famous in her native land. That is natural, but the Christian reader has no faith in luck. He would prefer to connect it with the prayers the deserted woman offered continually to the God in whom she trusted. "I put my trust in God," says Miss Mouatt, "and I believed He would send rescue to me." The rescue came, as it has come to many of us in trial, when rescue seemed impossible. He who "holds the waters in the hollow of His hand," and has "His agents everywhere," is able and willing to answer prayer, and He does answer it.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Boy's Head in a Lion's Mouth.—At a recent meeting Mr. Figgis said: "There were a father and mother who were going to send out their son as an apprentice to a place that was right in the midst of temptation; so, before the boy's departure they called a few friends together to have a prayer-meeting in his behalf. One after another engaged in prayer, asking the Lord to keep the lad, and one of them in closing, prayed thus, 'O Lord, O Lord, after having put their son's head into the lion's mouth, we have come to ask Thee not to let the lion bite it off.' How many are there like these foolish parents who go right into sin and expect the Lord to keep them."

Rescued from a Den of Thieves.—Mr. Calder observed: "Among those who came to our meetings in Aberdeen when I was there was a poor sailor who had been led to a den of thieves, and there robbed and afterward cruelly treated. But worse than that, he had turned his back on the God who loved him. But that night he arose and sought his Father. And we know that those who seek in earnest shall find Him. Filled with gratitude to the Saviour who loved him, and who died to redeem him, he took ship back to India, where he now, as a missionary of the cross, tells the poor Indians of this precious Saviour, whose blood cleanseth from all sin."

Making an Idol of a Pipe.—"Some Time Ago I was speaking to six young men, when I saw that each of them was worshipping a god. I urged them to give them up, telling them that if they did not discontinue to worship their idol they would suffer much in consequence. And only one out of that number, the youngest of them, had the manliness to give it up. Putting his hand in his pocket, he drew from it a pipe, and handing it to me, he said frankly: 'Here is mine, sir; I give it up; you may do what you like with it.' 'Are you sure you will not regret this act?' I asked. 'No, I shall never, sir,' was the reply. Much is spoken of the idolatry of the heathen, but I pray God to have mercy on the idolaters of our Christian land, who are daily hearing the Gospel, and will not take the exhortation which Paul gives—'Therefore, my dearly beloved, flee from idolatry' (1 Cor. 10:14).

Insulting an Ambassador.—Mr. J. A. Campbell said: "When I was in Africa, among the Arabs, the natives one day insulted an ambassador of the French Republic. The next day the flag was lowered, and the ambassador had taken his departure for France to tell of the insult he had received from the Africans. Now, to offer an insult to their ambassador was to offer an insult to the French Government. When the ambassador made his report, word was at once telegraphed to Africa, saying: 'We are coming, and if we do not get a sign by the firing of twenty-one guns, to show your allegiance, we shall bombard your city.' So one day we were on the top of a house from which we could see a French fleet nearing the African coast. Fear made the Arabs bow down before the French. The twenty-one guns were fired, not only to show that they had repented of their act, but that they were doing honor to the French. So, dear friends, if you do not bow down to the Great Ambassador, Jesus, whom God has sent, you will not be left unpunished, for by not doing so you offer an insult to the Great King of heaven."

An Old Offender's Photograph.—"A Magistrate, a man who feared God, told me that two men were brought up before him who were accused of forgery. They persisted in their innocence, and it could not be proved that they were really guilty, so it was a very hard case to deal with. While the magistrate was undecided as to what course he should take, a police officer said: 'I am sure that man,' indicating one of the prisoners, 'is an old offender.' 'Can you prove it?' asked the magistrate. 'If you will give me time I will,' he replied. The men were sent back to prison, and after a few days they were brought into the court again, and still pleaded that they were innocent. But the police officer had found and brought a photograph of that man, whom he had recognized, in his convict's clothes. 'And,' said the magistrate, 'I remember how his face fell when his own photograph was held up before him; he could no longer deny the charge brought against him.' The last thing a soul likes to look at is itself."

A Youth Counseled by two Angels.—Mr. Mather observed: "I heard a parable of a young man who was travelling along a road when he came to a place where it divided, one way leading to the right, and the other to the left. While he stood there, undecided as to which way he should take, two angels appeared; one stood at the top of the path leading to the right, and the other at the top of the other path. The one on the right addressed the young man, who stood there rather perplexed, saying: 'Come this way, and you shall have forgiveness of all your sins, and everlasting peace and joy shall be your portion.' And the other on the left said: 'Come this way, and you shall have all the pleasures that this world can give.' The young man yielded to the last speaker, and turned to the left. He got what he was promised, and enjoyed it for a time, but it was neither satisfying nor lasting; so at last wearied with his journey, he turned to his companion who had led him so far wrong, and said: 'Whither are you leading me?' 'I did not promise to lead you anywhere,' was the rejoinder. 'I only promised to give you.' So on he went, until he came to a precipice, where he stumbled and fell into everlasting darkness. Is not this the state and end of every unsaved soul? 'Seek ye the Lord while He may be found, call ye upon Him while He is near.'"

Garibaldi in Search of a Lost Sheep.—Mr. Hill related: "On one occasion Garibaldi, the great emancipator of Italy, was marching through a mountainous part of the country with a few of his followers, not far from their encampment, when they were met by a poor shepherd, who seemed to be in great distress. The General stopped, and asked if anything had gone wrong; and the shepherd told him that he had lost a sheep, for which he had been searching, and it was a great loss to him, for he was very poor. The man looked so grieved that Garibaldi was touched, and he commanded his men to go and help the man to find the stray sheep. Over hills and valleys they diligently searched, until night-fall; but failing to find it, they returned to the camp to make known to the General their fruitless search. When all had retired, and the camp was still that night, the great heart of the General went out in pity for the poor peasant, and he rose, and at a late hour of the night went in search of the missing sheep. The General did not make his appearance at the customary hour the following morning, and as this was very unusual they entered his sleeping tent, and found their noble commander rapt in sleep, and the lost sheep, with his military cloak half thrown over it, lying at his feet. What a beautiful illustration this is of the Great Emancipator of the world! How He goes forth on His beneficent mission until He finds 'the lost sheep,' and brings them safely to His feet."

THE CHILDREN'S PATRIMONY.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached at Fayette, Mo., last Sunday Morning, March 21st, 1886.

"Whose son art thou, thou young man?"—I SAM. 17: 58.

An Unequal Fight—A Tableau—Transmitted Characteristics—Royal Scoundrels—Above Circumstance—Perversion of the Doctrine—Your Duty—The Old Folks at the Festivity—I. A Christian Pedigree—The Influence of a Departed Mother—A Vast Estate of Prayer—An Unwritten Will—Trustees of Piety—The Voice of an Old Cradle—An Entry in a Diary—A Mother's Answered Prayers—II. An Evil Pedigree—Transmitted Avarice—Inherited Vice Successfully Resisted—The Hero to Put Down the Brakes—The Divine Parentage Offered.

NEVER was there a more unequal fight than that between David and Goliath. David five feet high; Goliath ten. David a shepherd boy, brought up amid rural scenes; Goliath a warrior by profession. Goliath a mountain of bragadocio; David a marvel of humility. Goliath armed with an iron spear, David armed with a sling with smooth stones from the brook. But you are not to despise these latter weapons. There was a regiment of slingers in the Assyrian army and a regiment of slingers in the Egyptian army, and they made terrible execution, and they could cast a stone with as much precision and force as now can be hurled shot or shell. The Greeks in their army had slingers who would throw leaden plummets inscribed with the irritating words: "Take this!" So it was a mighty weapon David employed in that famous combat.

A Jewish rabbi says that the probability is that Goliath was in such contempt for David, that in a paroxysm of laughter he threw his head back, and his helmet fell off, and David saw the uncovered forehead, and his opportunity had come, and taking this sling and swinging it around his head two or three times, and aiming at that uncovered forehead, he crushed it in like an egg-shell. The battle over,

BEHOLD A TABLEAU:

King Saul sitting, little David standing, his fingers clutched into the hair of decapitated Goliath. As Saul sees David standing there holding in his hand the ghastly, reeking, staring trophy, evidence of the complete victory over God's enemies, the king wonders what parentage was honored by such heroism, and in my text he asks David his pedigree: "Whose son art thou, thou young man?"

The king saw what you and I see, that this question of heredity is a mighty question. The longer I live the more —good blood, bad blood, proud blood, humble blood, honest blood, thieving blood, heroic blood, cowardly blood. The tendency may skip a generation or two, but it is sure to come out, as in a little child you sometimes see a similarity to a great-grandfather whose picture hangs on the wall. That the physical and mental and moral qualities are inheritable is patent to any one who keeps his eyes open. The similarity is so striking sometimes as to be amusing. Great families, regal or literary, are apt to have the characteristics all down through the generations, and what is more perceptible in such families may be seen on a smaller scale in all families. A thousand years have no power to obliterate the difference.

I BELIEVE IN BLOOD

ROYAL RASCALS.

The large lip of the House of Austria is seen in all the generations, and is called the Hapsburg lip. The House of Stuart always means in all generations cruelty and bigotry and sensuality. Witness Queen of Scots. Witness Charles I. and Charles II. Witness James I. and James II. and all the other scoundrels of that imperial line.

Scottish blood means persistence, English blood means reverence for the ancient, Welsh blood means religiosity, Danish blood means fondness for the sea, Indian blood means roaming disposition, Celtic blood means fervidity, Roman blood means conquest.

The Jewish facility for accumulation you may trace clear back to Abraham, of whom the Bible says "he was rich in silver and gold and cattle," and to Isaac and Jacob, who had the same FAMILY CHARACTERISTICS.

Some families are characterized by longevity, and they have a tenacity of life positively Methuselah. Others are characterized by Goliathian stature, and you can see it for one generation, two generations, five generations, in all the generations. Vigorous theology runs on in the line of the Alexanders. Tragedy runs on in the family of the Kembles. Literature runs on in the line of the Trollopes. Philanthropy runs on in the line of the Wilberforces. Statesmanship runs on in the line of the Adamses. Henry and Catharine of Navarre religious, all their families religious. The celebrated family of the Casini, all mathematicians. The celebrated family of the Medici—grandfather, son and Catharine—all remarkable for keen intellect. The celebrated family of Gustavus Adolphus all warriors.

This law of heredity asserts itself without reference to social or political condition, for you sometimes find the ignoble in high place and the honorable in obscure place. A descendant of Edward I. a toll gatherer. A descendant of Edward III. a door-keeper. A descendant of the Duke of Northumberland a trunk-maker. Some of the mightiest families of England are extinct, while some of those most honored in the peerage go back to an ancestry of hard knuckles and rough exterior. This law of heredity entirely independent of social or political condition.

Then you find avarice and jealousy and sensuality and fraud having full swing in some families. The violent temper of Frederick William is the inheritance of Frederick the Great. It is not a theory to be set forth by worldly philosophy only, but by divine authority. Do you not remember how the Bible speaks of "a chosen generation," of "the generation of the righteous," of "the generation of vipers," of an "untoward generation," of "a stubborn generation," of "the iniquity of the past visited upon the children unto the third and fourth generation?" So that the text comes to-day with the force of a projectile hurled from mightiest catapult, "Whose son art thou, thou young man?"

"Well," says some one, "that theory discharges me from all responsibility. Born of sanctified parents we are bound to be good and we cannot help ourselves. Born of unrighteous parentage we are bound to be evil and we cannot help ourselves."

TWO INACCURACIES.

As much as if you should say, "the centripetal force in nature has a tendency to bring everything to the centre, and therefore all things come to the centre. The centrifugal force in nature has a tendency to throw out everything to the periphery, and therefore everything will go out to the periphery." You know as well as I know that you can make the centripetal overcome the centrifugal, and you can make the centrifugal overcome the centripetal. As when there is a mighty tide of good in a family that may be overcome by determination to evil, as in the case of Aaron Burr, the libertine, who had for father President Burr, the consecrated; as in the case of Pierpont Edwards, the scourge of New York society seventy years ago, who had a Christian ancestry; while on the other hand some of the best men and women of this day are those who have come of an ancestry of which it would not be courteous to speak in their presence.

YOUR DUTY.

The practical and useful object of this sermon is to show to you that if you have come of a Christian ancestry, then you are solemnly bound to preserve and develop the glorious inheritance; or if you have come of a depraved ancestry, then it is your duty to brace yourself against the evil tendency by all prayer and Christian determination, and you are to find out what are the family frailties, and in arming the castle put the strongest guard at the weakest gate. With these smooth stones from the brook I hope to strike you, not where David struck Goliath, in the head, but where Nathan struck David, in the heart. "Whose son art thou, thou young man?"

There is something in the periodical holidays to bring up

THE OLD FOLKS.

Sometime in the winter holiday, when we are accustomed to gather our families together, old times have come back again, and our thoughts have been set to the tune of "Auld Lang Syne." The old folks were so busy at such times in making us happy, but they shook off the white blankets and mingled in the holiday festivities—the same wrinkles, the same stoop of shoulder under the weight of age, the same old style of dress or coat, the same smile, the same tones of voice. I hope you remember them before they went away. If not, I hope there are those who have recited to you what they were, and that there may be in your house some article of dress or furniture with which you associate their memories. I want to arouse the most sacred memories of your heart while I make the impassioned interrogatory in regard to your pedigree: "Whose son art thou, thou young man?"

I. First, I accost all those who are descended of a CHRISTIAN ANCESTRY.

I do not ask if your parents were perfect. There are no perfect people now, and I do not suppose there were any perfect people then. Perhaps there was sometimes too much blood in their eye when they chastised you. But from what I know of you, you got no more than you deserved, and perhaps a little more chastisement would have been salutary. But you are willing to acknowledge, I think, that they wanted to do right. From what you overheard in conversations, and from what you saw at the family altar and at neighborhood obsequies, you know that they had invited God into their heart and life. There was something that sustained those old people supernaturally. You have no doubt about their destiny. You expect if you ever get to heaven to meet them as certainly as you expect to meet the Lord Jesus Christ.

That early association has been a charm for you. There was a time when you got right up from a house of iniquity and walked out into the fresh air because you thought your mother was looking at you. You have never been very happy in sin because of a sweet old face that would present itself. Tremulous voices from the past accosted you until they were seemingly audible, and you looked around to see who spoke. There was an estate not mentioned in the last will and testament, a vast estate of prayer and holy example and Christian entreaty and glorious memory. The survivors of the family gathered to hear the will read, and this was to be kept, and that was to be sold, and it was share and share alike. But there was that read something like this: "In the name of God, Amen. I, being of sound mind, bequeath to my children all my prayers for their salvation; I bequeath to them all the results of a lifetime's toil; I bequeath to them the Christian religion which has been so much comfort to me, and I hope may be solace for them; I bequeath to them a hope of reunion when the partings of life are over; share and share alike may they have in eternal riches. I bequeath to them the wish that they may avoid my errors and copy anything that may have been worthy. In the name of the God who made me, and the Christ who redeemed me, and the Holy Ghost who sanctifies me, I make this my last will and testament. Witness, all ye hosts of heaven. Witness, time, witness, eternity. Signed, sealed, and delivered in this our dying hour. Father and Mother."

You did not get that will proved at the surrogate's office; but I take it out to-day and I read it to you; I take it out of the alcoves of your heart; I shake the dust off it, I ask you will you accept that inheritance, or will you break the will? O ye of Christian ancestry, you have a responsibility vast beyond all measurement! God will not let you off with just being as good as ordinary people when you had such extraordinary advantage. Ought not a flower planted in a hot-house be more thrifty than a flower planted outside in the storm? Ought not a factory turned by the Housatonic do more work than a factory turned by a thin and shallow mountain stream? Ought not you of great early opportunity be better than those who had a cradle unblessed?

THE CAPITAL ACCOUNT.

A father sets his son-up in business. He keeps an account of all the expenditures. So much for store fixtures, so much for rent, so much for this, so much for that, and all the items aggregated, and the father expects the son to give an account. Your heavenly Father charges against you all the advantages of a pious ancestry—so many prayers, so much Christian example, so many kind entreaties—all these gracious influences one tremendous aggregate, and He asks you for an account of it.

Ought not you to be better than those who had no such advantages? Better have been a foundling picked up off the city commons than with such magnificent inheritance of consecration to turn out indifferently.

Ought not you, my brother, to be better, having had Christian nurture than that man who can truly say this morning: "The first word I remember my father speaking to me was an oath; the first time I remember my father taking hold of me was in wrath; I never saw a Bible till I was ten years of age, and then I was told it was a pack of lies. The first twenty years of my life I was associated with the vicious. I seemed to be walled in by sin and death." Now, my brother, ought you not—I leave it as a matter of fairness with you—ought you not to be far better than those who had no early Christian influence?

Standing as you do between the generation that is past and the generation that is to come, are you going to pass the blessing on, or are you going to have your life the gulf in which that tide of blessing shall drop out of sight forever? You are in that ancestral line, and are you going to augment or squander that solemn trust fund? are you going to disinherit your sons and daughters of the heirloom which your parents left you? Ah! that cannot be possible, that cannot be possible that you are going to take such a position as that. You are very careful about the life insurances, and careful about the deeds, and careful about the mortgages, and careful about the title of your property, because when you step off the stage you want your children to get it all. Are you making no provision that they shall get grandfather and grandmother's religion? Oh, what a last will and testament you are making, my brother! "In the name of God, Amen. I, being of sound mind, make this my last will and testament. I bequeath to my children all the money I ever made and all the houses I own; but I disinherit them, I rob them of the ancestral grace and the Christian influence that I inherited. I have squandered that on my own worldliness. Share and share alike must they in the misfortune and the everlasting outrage. Signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of God and men and angels and devils and all the generations of earth and heaven and hell, March, 1886."

O ye of highly favored ancestry, wake up this morning to a sense of your opportunity and your responsibility. I think there must be or a fragment of a cradle somewhere that could tell a story of midnight supplication in your behalf. Where is the old rocking-chair in which you were sung to sleep with the holy nursery rhyme? Where is the old clock that ticked away the moments of that sickness on that awful night when there were but three of you awake—you and God and mother? Is there not an old staff in some closet? Is there not an old family Bible on some shelf that seems to address you, saying: "My son, my daughter, how can you reject that God who so kindly dealt with us all our lives and to whom we commended you in our prayers living and dying! By the memory of the old homestead, by the family altar, by our dying pillow, by the graves in which our bodies sleep while our spirits hover, we beg you to turn over a new leaf for the new year." Oh, the power of ancestral piety, well illustrated by a young man of New York who attended a prayer-meeting one night and asked for prayer, and then went home and wrote down these words:

AN ENTRY IN A DIARY.

"Twenty-five years ago to-night my mother went to heaven, my beautiful, blessed mother, and I have been alone, tossed up and down upon the billows of life's tempestuous ocean. Shall I ever go to heaven? She told me I must meet her in heaven. When she took her boy's hand in hers and turned her gentle, loving eyes on me, and gazed earnestly and long into my face, and then lifted them to heaven in that last prayer, she prayed that I might meet her in heaven. I wonder if I ever shall?"

"My mother's prayers! Oh, my sweet, blessed mother's prayers! Did ever boy have such a mother as I had? For twenty-five years I have not heard her pray until to-night. I have heard all her prayers over again. They have had, in fact, a terrible resurrection. Oh, how she was wont to pray! She prayed as they prayed to-night, so earnest, so importunate, so believing. Shall I ever be a Christian? She was a Christian. Oh, how bright and pure and happy was her life! She was a cheerful and happy Christian. There is

MY MOTHER'S BIBLE.

I have not opened it for years. Did she believe I could ever neglect her precious Bible? She surely thought I would read it much and often. How often has she read it to me. Blessed mother, did you pray in vain for your boy? It shall not be in vain. Ah! no, no, it shall not be in vain. I will pray for myself. Who has sinned against so much instructions as I have? against so many precious prayers put up to heaven for me by one of the most lovely, tender, pious, confiding, trusting of mothers in her heavenly Father's care and grace? She never doubted. She believed. She always prayed as if she did. My Bible, my mother's Bible and my conscience teach what I am and what I have made myself. Oh, the bitter pangs of an accusing conscience! I need a Saviour mighty to save. I must seek Him. I will. I am on the sea of existence, and I can never get off from it. I am afloat. No anchor, no rudder, no compass, no book of instructions, for I have put them all away from me. Saviour of the perishing, save or I perish."

Do you wonder that the next day he arose in a prayer-meeting and said: "My brethren, I stand before you a monument of God's amazing mercy and goodness, forever blessed be His holy name; all I have and all I am I consecrate to Jesus, my Saviour and my God?" Oh, the power of ancestral prayer. Hear it! Hear it!

II. But I turn for a moment to those who had EVIL PARENTAGE, and I want to tell you that the highest thrones in heaven and the mightiest triumphs and the brightest crowns will be for those who had evil parentage, but who by the grace of God conquered. As useful, as splendid a gentleman as I know of to-day had for father a man who died blaspheming God until the neighbors had to put their fingers in their ears to shut out the horror. One of the most consecrated and useful Christian ministers of to-day was born of a drunken horse-jockey. Tide of evil tremendous in some families. It is like Niagara Rapids, and yet men have clung to a rock and been rescued.

There is a family in New York whose wealth has rolled up into many millions that was founded by a man who, after he had vast estate sent back a paper of tacks because they were two cents more than he expected. Grip and grind and gouge in the fourth generation—I suppose it will be grip and grind and gouge in the twentieth generation. The thirst for intoxicants has burned down through the arteries of a hundred and fifty years. Pugnacity or combativeness characterize other families. Sometimes one form of evil, sometimes another form of evil. But it has been resisted. If the family frailty be avarice, cultivate unselfishness and charity, and teach your children never to eat an apple without offering somebody else half of it. Is the family frailty combativeness, keep out of the company of quick-tempered people, and never answer an impertinent question until you have counted a hundred both ways, and after you have written an angry letter keep it a week before you send it, and then burn it up! Is the family frailty timidity and cowardice, cultivate backbone, read the biography of brave men like Joshua or Paul, and see if you cannot get a little iron in your blood. Find out what the family frailty is, and set body, mind, and soul in battle array.

IT MAY BE RESISTED,

CONQUER YOUR WILL.

I think the genealogical table was put in the first chapter of the New Testament, not only to show our Lord's pedigree, but to show that a man may rise up in an ancestral line and beat back successfully all the influences of bad heredity. See in that genealogical table that good King Asa came of vile King Abia. See in that genealogical table that Joseph and Mary and the most illustrious Being that ever touched our world, or ever will touch it, had in their ancestral line scandalous Rehoboam and Tamar and Bathsheba. If this world is ever to be Edenized—and it will be—all the infected families of the earth are to be regenerated, and there will some one arise in each family line and open a new genealogical table. There will be some Joseph in the line to reverse the evil influence of Rehoboam, and there will be some Mary in the line to reverse the evil influence of Bathsheba. Perhaps the star of hope may point down to your manger. Perhaps you are to be the hero or the heroine that is to put down the brakes and stop that long train of genealogical tendencies and switch it off on another track from that on which it has been running for a century. You do that, and I will promise you as fine a palace as the architects of heaven can build, the archway inscribed with the words: "More than conqueror."

ADOPTED CHILDREN.

But whatever your heredity, let me say, you may be sons and daughters of the Lord God Almighty. Estranged children from the homestead come back through the open gate of adoption. There is royal blood in our veins. There are crowns on our escutcheon. Our Father is King. Our Brother is King. We may be kings and queens unto God forever. Come and sit down on the ivory bench of the palace. Come and wash in the fountains that fall into the basins of crystal and alabaster. Come and look out of the upholstered window upon gardens of azalea and amaranth. Hear the full burst of the orchestra while you banquet with potentates and victors. Oh, when the text sweeps backward, let it not stop at the cradle that rocked your infancy, but at the cradle that rocked the first world, and when the text sweeps forward, let it not stop at your grave, but at the throne on which you may reign forever and ever. "Whose son art thou, thou young man?" Son of God! Heir of mortality! Take your inheritance!

OUR AMERICAN HEATHEN.

By Rev. W. F. Re Qua.

THE American Indian has been the unfortunate subject of much of American whims, mis-legislation, and, in earlier annals, barbarism. Their wrongs are of long standing. They have suffered for centuries at the hands of the white immigrants. Even the Pilgrims, whose glorious memory we cherish with justifiable veneration, were not guiltless in their treatment of the Indians, and Robinson, their beloved pastor, wrote to them from Holland words of delicate but pointed reproof when he received intelligence of the killing of the Indians. He said he wished they had converted some before they killed any.

After the landing of the Pilgrims, on the 11th of December, 1620, a noted Indian, named Samosett, came to Plymouth to offer the strangers and foreigners their heathen salutation, saying: "Welcome, Englishmen! Welcome, Englishmen!" and this, too, upon soil the Pilgrims had no scruple about taking possession of outside the limits of the Virginian charter, their intended destination.

The Indians always carried out the spirit of their hospitable greeting, dealing kindly; in turn to receive other than civilized treatment and merited compliments. We venerate our Plymouth fathers for all that is grand and best in them, while we should endanger our own characters if we failed to rue their unblushing faults and all that was disingenuous.

In 1634 the Massachusetts Colony violated a contract made with the Indians; disappointed them in a trade, which somewhat provoked suspicion and displeasure toward the whites; who were not "slow to wrath," but quick to take up arms against their red neighbors; and, without any attempt to conciliate affairs or repair their breach of trade, they resolved to make war against them and exterminate them.

They were too extremely barbarous in their modes of conflict, of which Dr. Mather says: "When the Indian prisoner was executed, his limbs were torn by violence from one another, then burned to ashes." When the Puritan troops moved upon the doomed Pequots, no signal of an attack was given, and Dr. Drake says: "The barking of a dog was the first warning they had of an approaching enemy, and knew not the cause of alarm until met by the cowards of the foe," in which unequal conflict more than six hundred Pequots perished. "Fire was set to the mats that covered the wigwams, which furiously spread, and doleful was the bloody sight to see so many souls lie gasping upon the ground, so thick you could hardly pass along," certifies another witness.

The years that have elapsed since Puritan malversation with the Indians have only served to strengthen and give color to their tribal traditions of the black treatment of the early Pale-faces; as again and again our governmental policy has, upon easy pretexts, arbitrarily dissolved treaties made with the tribes as with sovereign nations, overlooking the importance of keeping trust with the Indians, as with any foreign nation, which would be esteemed no slight offence or cause for redress, even between civilized countries.

But our Indians have not shared the equal clemency and Christian concern of American Christendom with foreign heathen, some of whom were no more susceptible of civilization and gospel impression than the American heathen, judging from the comparatively stunted missionary operations among them and the fruit of the schools founded for Indian education; and it is not unreasonable, only just, to suppose that with the same amount of missionary zeal and outlay of time and means for their Christianization equal results might be secured as among the Fiji and other barbaric nations.

There are about three hundred and fifty thousand American Indians, including those in Alaska, to say nothing of the seven million South American Indians, all of whom have their heathen rites of worship, expressions of crude ideas of God, all intimating that He created their instincts for Himself as well as ours, and wherever we find these Godward instincts it is Deity's inherent though mute Macedonian call: "Come over and help us," and he who shall answer to the call must be loyal to the uppermost correlate convictions of the soul.

JERUSALEM THE GOLDEN.

By Rev. A. C. Tris.

An Awe-Inspiring Subject—Is the Vision of Heaven or Earth?—The Key to the Subject—The Jewish Conception of Grandeur—Coincidences of Prophecy—The Coming Restitution—The Splendor of the City—Unique Building Materials—The Pearls and Jewels—Values and Colors.

THERE are passages in the Holy Scripture so full of sublimity, pathos, and holy awe, that they recall to our mind the august words which Moses heard (Exod. 3:5): "Draw not nigh hither; put off your shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground;" and among them the twelfth vision found in the twenty-first and twenty-second chapters of Revelation must be accorded the pre-eminence, as giving to us a description of Jerusalem "the golden," the place where the Lord dwelleth. Like Moses, we may approach to that holy shrine, we may see the bush of glory burning, and hear the words of Jehovah; yet we are obliged to remain at the proper distance in examining things not yet revealed in full to us.

To intrude in those things which are forbidden ground is not our design in writing the following remarks; but, having a command of "reading" (Rev. 1:3), a declaration that "the book is opened" (Rev. 5:5), and "a blessing vouchsafed in keeping the sayings of the prophecy of this book" (Rev. 22:7), we venture to examine its contents.

QUESTION.

The great question which we desire to consider is this: Do we find in this twelfth vision of the Revelation a description of the heavenly state which shall come after the last judgment day? or is it a description of the glorious state of the Church on the earth during the period called the millennial period?—a question worthy our closest scrutiny and devout study.

THE MILLENNIAL DAY.

For many years we would have answered unequivocally that it meant the heavenly state, the end of all things, the full fruition of glory; but by close examination we have been led to the conclusion that the twelfth vision of the Revelation, as the renowned Dr. Isaac Da Costa designated it, belongs to this mundane world and to that period called "the fulness of times" (Eph. 1:10)—the great millennial day.

THE KEY.

The key to unlock this vision is found in Rev. 22:6: "And He said unto me, These sayings are faithful and true; and the Lord God of the holy prophets sent His angel to show unto His servants the things which must shortly be done." This verse reveals the secret that this vision is mentioned and is written in connection with the writings of the holy prophets. It is brought to the same level as all other sayings of the seers of old who have spoken of those glorious things, although in a dim light, and declared them to belong to that age when Israel should be restored in their own land of Canaan (Isa. 43:18-23; 66:20-23).

A TRUE ISRAELITISH VISION.

Our observation is forcibly called to Israel and to the Old Testament dispensation as connected with the Church of God in the new dispensation. It is like a golden thread running through the whole fabric, speaking of a fulness far above our comprehension; it is a picturesque vision of treasures, of grace, and of heavenly enjoyments, and yet, very singular, there is made mention of the existence of an imperfect state at the same time (Rev. 21:8, 27; 22:15); and, indeed, the same statement is found in Isa. 65:17-20. "For, behold, I create new heavens and a new earth: and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind. . . . I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy; . . . but a sinner being a hundred years old shall be accursed" (also in Joel 3:17; Isa. 35:8).

It must not escape our attention that the name of Jerusalem (New) is the leading idea, and the centre of the whole vision in Revelation 21 and 22. In verses 2 and 10 it is called "The holy city, New Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband," and the same idea is brought out in Isa. 52:1; 54:5.

In verse 3 is spoken of a Tabernacle of God with "the" men, and that "He will dwell with them." And in verse 24 we read of "Nations (which are saved) who shall walk in the light of the New Jerusalem, and that the kings of the earth do bring their glory and honor into it," corroborating the prophecy of Isaiah, written eight hundred years before John, stating the same words: "Arise, be bright; for thy light hath come, and the honor of the Lord hath risen on thee. . . . Nations have come to the light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising" (Young, Isa. 60:1-3).

All these solemn declarations must lead an unbiassed mind to the conclusion that the words found in the twelfth vision of Revelation are indeed belonging to this mundane state of existence—to earth, and not to heaven, not to the time "when God shall be all and in all" (1 Cor. 15:28); because at that time no nationality, nor earthly kings, nor royalty, "nor anything defiling or doing abomination or making a lie" (Rev. 21:24-27) can ever be thought of or mentioned in the regions of eternal bliss.

COINCIDENCE.

It must further be noticed that the Greek word found in verses 2 and 10, and translated "descend or come down," means, literal, to come down on the earth. It is used in Matt. 3:16 of "the Spirit of God descending like a dove, and lighting upon Jesus." In Eph. 4:9 is spoken: "That Jesus also descended first into the lower parts of the earth;" and in 1 Thess. 4:16 is emphatically declared, "That the Lord Himself shall descend from heaven" (11 Thess. 1:9; 11 Thess. 2:8). It has a particular meaning that in verse 3 the definite article, "the men," is used (Rev. 21:3) as the Greek has it. The Apostle Paul in Heb. 2:5 says: "For unto the angels hath He not put in subjection the world to come, whereof we speak?" And also he corroborates the above statement, that "the" men is meant, and that the Tabernacle of God will be in this habitable earth.*

It was a maxim of the ancient Jews that both the Tabernacle and the temple and Jerusalem itself came down from heaven. Rabbi Jeremias said: "The holy blessed God shall renew the world and build Jerusalem, and shall cause it to descend from heaven."

CHRONOLOGY.

Many expositors of the Book of the Revelation suppose that this book is a written history of the Church through the ages past and the ages to come; and taking this view of the twelfth vision, it must be called the last vision in order of the chronology, and must consequently mean the heavenly state and the consummation of all things in glory.

We beg to differ from such an exposition, for the simple reason that the Revelation is not given as a revelation of things which are in heaven, but of things which are on the earth, and also that the division in chapters and verses do not belong originally to the Bible. If we group the last four chapters of the Revelation in one unit, we will find that they are closely connected and interwoven, and that they are like clusters of beautiful flowers all belonging to the same peduncle, but so arranged that each flower is unfolded in its proper time and place. The wife and the bride of the Lamb, although different, are closely connected. The marriage supper, and the glory, and the light of the New Jerusalem all centre in the Husband and second Adam (compare Rev. 19 : 7, 8 with Rev. 21 : 2, 9 ; Matt. 25 : 6 ; 1 Cor. 15 : 47-49).

* [Expositors now are generally of the opinion that the New Jerusalem spoken of in the passage to which Dr. Tris refers is not identical with the earthly city Jerusalem. They believe that the Heavenly Jerusalem will descend from Heaven at the beginning of the millennium, and that it will remain suspended in the air, a dazzling spectacle, during the whole of that period, and will not be actually upon the earth until the close of the thousand years.—Ed.]

(To be concluded next week.)

PRIVATE SCHOFIELD'S MISTAKE.

AN officer in the British army sends to an English journal the following account of the conversion of a soldier in his regiment :

Looking into my room one afternoon, an officer's servant told me that he thought Private Schofield wished to see me.

"What makes you think so?"

"Well, I know he hates swearing and that sort of thing, and last night when some one spoke of you as a 'chest-thumper' he at once said he would like to have a talk with you. Shall I send him down?"

"You may. In a few minutes I shall be going as far as the firing-range ; tell him to dress and come with me."

On our way to the range Private Schofield and I talked of matters chiefly connected with soldiering, but when we had reached a secluded spot and were seated, I inquired if he had anything particular he wished to say to me.

"They call you a 'chest-thumper,'" he replied, "and I have been long enough in the regiment to know that 'chest-thumper' is slang for Christian. Now, I am not a Christian, but wish to become one, and it occurred to me that a conversation with you might help me."

"I hope you will not be disappointed, my young friend, though, perhaps, I am not the best 'chest-thumper' you could apply to. But before we proceed, let us kneel down and ask God's guidance."

Here we uncovered, knelt down on the grass, and asked the Great Wisdom-giver to be with us.

"May I ask," I said, after being re-seated, "what has led you to think of becoming a Christian?"

"The explanation is this: I have been well brought up, and the filthy language of the barrack-room is almost more than I can stand. I know that the non-commissioned officer in charge ought to put a stop to it, but, unfortunately, so far as I can see, he enjoys it. Now, I feel that one of two things must take place if I am to remain a soldier: I must either go down to the level of my comrades, and speak and act as they do, or, in order to be able to bear what I complain of, I must become a real Christian."

"Have you made any effort to become a Christian?"

"I have."

"What have you done?"

"I have prayed."

"And has your praying been of service to you?"

"I am afraid not."

"Have you tried anything else?"

"Yes; I have repented."

"And has your repentance helped you at all?"

"Not that I am aware of. Indeed, I seem to be further from the right thing than ever I was."

"It appears, then, that your praying has failed, and that your repentance has failed. Has any other course been suggested?"

"Yes; I was told one night in the Soldiers' Home that I had nothing to do but believe, and I am sure I have done that."

"And has your believing given you any relief?"

"It has not."

"Have you tried anything else?"

"What else is there to try?"

"Were there nothing else, you must see at a glance that your case would be hopeless; for everything you speak of has, according to your own showing, been of no use. Answer me this one question, and think before doing so. Have you ever honestly tried Christ?"

"Have—I—ever—honestly—tried—Christ?"

That question never was put to me before, and I am inclined to think that I have been trying to pray, and repent, and believe, without any reference to Christ at all."

"Do you believe that when Jesus was on the cross He was thinking of you?"

"Thinking of me?"

"Yes; thinking of you."

"That never struck me before; but as I am one of the sinners for whom He died, He must have been thinking of me. The thought is new to me, but it must be true."

"Well, then, if Jesus has borne the penalty of your sins, why, in view of meeting God, should you be afraid of that penalty? According to Paul, Jesus, takes your sin with its consequences that you may have the benefit of His righteousness, and all that His righteousness merits. Will you promise to ponder over that view of the case?" "I will."

"Then, as I have something to do on the range, you may now go back to the camp, but before we separate let us again kneel down and pray." Again we uncovered and bowed before the Heavenly Father, whose ear was not deaf to our cry.

That night, or rather, I should say, early next morning, Private Schofield was made free. "I pondered," he said, "over Jesus as my Sin-bearer, and as I pondered the light broke in upon me. In my thoughts I was at the cross, and as I looked up I could say with confidence, 'Jesus loved me and gave Himself for me;' and when from the cross I looked forward to the judgment and remembered that the Judge 'loved me, and gave Himself for me,' the fear with which I had been tormented left me. Jesus took my sin, and I get His righteousness. Precious gospel!"

THE DISCOURSE.

Text : "Yield yourselves unto God" (Rom. 6 : 13).

If we keep ourselves from God, we withdraw ourselves from the circle of all blessedness.

If we yield ourselves to God, we are not surrendering to an enemy who will destroy when He obtains control of us ; we are letting go that which will be our destruction if we cling to it ; we are falling into the powerful and loving hands of One who desires to save us ; losing our hold on a burning rafter and yielding to a Friend who is drawing us away into safety.

Yield to God!

You are a sinner against Him.

He seeks not to destroy, but to save you.

He knows how to save ; you do not know.

Give up your plan of salvation ; yield to His.

Cease listening to the shallow philosophers who talk to you of a way of moral improvement according to reason ; you can be saved only according to God's plan, whether that be according to reason or not ; but who dare say it is not ?

He loves you.

He must tell you how to be saved.

He has come in the flesh to ply you with the wooings of affection, not to drive you by force.

You are blind. All other saviours tell you the way ; this Saviour takes you by the hand.

Yield to Him, and you are saved. Yield to God. You profess to do so, being a member of a Christian church.

Yield wholly.

He is your Teacher. Follow thoroughly all His teaching. Never mind what it brings on you, nor where it lands you. Obey thoroughly His commandments.

Do not try God ; do not experiment to see what the result will be of a partial obedience. It will certainly prove unsatisfactory, and that will discourage all obedience.

Yield to Him ; He is your pilot. He is not responsible—you are not safe—unless you take your hand from off the rudder, and let Him steer ; make Him no suggestions, but gladly, promptly, thoroughly, obey all orders.

AFTERNOON TALK.

FULL OF GRACE AND TRUTH.

By Rev. F. H. Reynolds, Philadelphia.

Jesus Himself, we are here told (John 1 : 14), is full of grace and truth ; not a sealed fountain, whose waters have ceased to flow, and is of no use to the weary traveller ; this is not the character of Jesus ; He is a full, ever-flowing fountain, to be used by those in need of grace and those who would be enriched by truth.

How different this is from the truth which Socrates or Plato taught ! they gave the Greeks much moral truth, and yet themselves were always in search of deeper truth, but we never see Jesus thus seeking, for He was the truth Himself.

First note, He was full of grace—that is, unmerited favor, undeserved kindness ; and you will remember that God is spoken of as the God of Grace. This was true of Jesus in His outward state, His whole life being occupied in pouring out grace upon the sons of men ; and also, true in an inward sense ; He was full of spiritual grace.

He was full of saving grace—yea, He is mighty to save, as His name so clearly indicates, and He Himself tells us that He came to seek and to save that which is lost. To the woman He said : "Thy faith hath saved thee," and to us the promise comes, "As many as receive Him, to them gives He power (or the right) to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on His name." When we remember that this Jesus is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever, we may be assured that He yet saves to the uttermost all that come unto God by Him.

Now, in the second place, notice that His grace is a keeping grace. A grace to keep us from falling in every time of need, and which makes us victorious in our daily warfare with the world, the flesh, and the devil. Some say they can't hold out, which is true ; but then Jesus can and does keep the soul by the very power of God Himself.

But He was full of truth as well. He came to manifest the truth. The types all pointed to Christ from different sides, and when He came we see them all distinctly verified, the substance taking the place of the shadow, He was the true Lamb of God, the true atonement for the sins of a ruined world. Human truth never satisfies ; the more one gets, the deeper grows the longing ; there is, indeed, no satisfaction for sinful man until He finds Him who is the Way, the Truth, and the Life. What a Saviour ! so full of saving, keeping, and enlightening grace ! What in the world is there in comparison to Him ! Finally, let me ask you, What think ye of Christ ? Would you have Him show you all His grace and truth ? "Then ask, and it shall be given you ; seek, and ye shall find ; knock, and it shall be opened unto you."

[The following poem may be committed to memory by the young people.]

UNDER HIS WING.

Under His wing I sweetly rest,

While balmy peace reigns in my breast,

I never need a foe to dread,

While His bright wing is o'er me spread.

Under His wing ! Under His wing !

Oh, may my heart forever sing !

Amidst all dangers, seen or known,

His guardian wing is o'er me thrown,

It soothes me with its magic power,

And turns to light the darkest hour.

Under His wing ! Under His wing !

Oh, may my heart forever sing !

While tossing on the stormy sea,

His loving wing still spreads o'er me ;

'Mid scenes of conflict and of grief

Its presence gives my soul relief.

Under His wing ! Under His wing !

Oh, may my heart forever sing !

When wasting on the bed of death

I still can sing with dying breath,

For round me I can clearly see

Christ's wing of love o'erarching me.

Under His wing ! Under His wing !

Oh, may my heart forever sing !

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Basis of Agreement for a Part of the Nominations awaiting confirmation in the Senate, appears to have been found. The Chairman of the Committee on Finance stated last week that the committee would report the nominations in its department whenever the Administration would relieve the suspended officers from any imputation against their characters, or, if there were such charges against them, permit an answer to be made in each case. Mr. Beck went to see the President about the matter, and he said that he was ready to give such assurance in cases where no charges were made. The Chairman, Senator Morrill had also called on the President and upon Secretary Manning. This official gave satisfactory assurance that no charges affecting the character of the suspended officials were on file in the Treasury Department. When this information was placed before the Finance Committee it agreed to report favorably the nominations for office covered by the Secretary's letter. It will be well if this basis becomes a precedent, and a general agreement is reached so that the Senate can get on with more important business.

Geronimo and His Band of Hostile Apaches did not surrender as agreed. The report that they had refused to surrender has, however, been contradicted. General Crook reports that at the fight in Mexico which resulted in the death of Captain Crawford, the Indians expressed a willingness to meet him, and gave hostages as an evidence of good faith. After Captain Crawford's death, Lieutenant Maus, who succeeded to the command, proceeded to San Bernardino on the border, to await the arrival of the Indians. Since then four of the principal renegade chiefs arrived at the camp, and others were expected to arrive soon after. General Crook says he will leave Fort Bowie in a day or two for San Bernardino to meet the Indians and arrange for their surrender. The journey will take several days. The delay of the hostiles in reaching the border is explained at the War Department as being caused by the difficulty in collecting the Indians who had scattered among the mountains, and also because of the liberal ideas held by the Indians in regard to time and dates.

The Civil Service Commission was Reconstituted last week. Two vacancies had to be filled. Those of Commissioner Trenholm, who has become Controller of the Currency, and Commissioner Dorman B. Eaton, who resigned. Mr. Cleveland promoted Mr. Charles Lyman to Mr. Eaton's place. He has been chief examiner since the commission was organized. Before that time for many years he had been in the public service. He succeeded Mr. E. O. Graves as the chief examiner of the Civil Service Board during the Grant experiment, and mastered all the details of the system. He brings to his new duties, as Commissioner, the best kind of qualifications, that of experience in a subordinate capacity, as he has been the principal director of the Civil Service work since it began under the law of 1883. He is an eminently practical man, and in that respect, not less than for his familiarity with the public service, his selection by the President for Commissioner is satisfactory. Mr. Trenholm's successor is John H. Oberly, of Illinois. He has hitherto been more famous for his zeal for his party than for Civil Service Reform. He may, however, have qualifications for the office, not as yet known to the public. It would be unfortunate for the President, the Commissioner, and the public if the Civil Service law should not be observed and faithfully executed in its letter and spirit. In spite of the ridicule cast upon the law by politicians wedded to the old spoils-system, the conviction is growing among the most intelligent citizens that the principle of the law is the one that holds out the best promise for the purification of American politics.

The Resignation of Governor Murray of Utah, tendered to the President last week causes general regret. It has, of course, been expected for a year past, but hopes were entertained that as he had remained in office so long, he would continue through the crisis. The Gentile population of the territory are loud and emphatic in their expressions of disappointment. The Governor's firmness and moderation have inspired them with confidence. The prominent Utah journal, the Tribune, declares that "his record for integrity and perfect justice" is unblemished, and will be a crown of honor to his children. The utmost anxiety prevails as to the character of his successor.

An Important Decision in the Grant & Ward affairs was pronounced on March 17th, by the referee in the case. He decided that William S. Warner must pay to the receiver of the defunct firm $1,395,752, and the $580,000 in real and personal estate which Ward conveyed to him after the failure. The former amount represents the "profits" with interest of his investments in the Grant & Ward business, or the whole amount he received from the firm less the money invested. The decision will, of course, go to appeal, but it is something to know where some of the money went to, and that there is a possibility of recovering a part of it.

Alderman Jaehne of New York City Against whom the charge of receiving stolen property was made, was arrested last Thursday, and held to bail for accepting a bribe of $20,000. The grand jury are said to have his case in hand, but the arrest was made on motion of the District Attorney. The evidence against him has not been disclosed in detail, but it is understood that certain statements made by Jaehne himself and overheard by witnesses constitute an important feature of it. There is not much doubt that the Broadway Surface Railroad obtained its franchise by the purchase of votes, and it is for his action in this matter that Alderman Jaehne has been arrested. It may be hoped that, whatever the result of the prosecution may be, measures will be taken to insure the election of a better class of men to the office of alderman. While they are taken from the class to which many of them belong, scandals of this character must ensue.

Miss Cleveland's Remarks on Immodest dress deserve more attention than they are likely to receive. The Boston Transcript, of March 17th, publishes a letter Miss Cleveland wrote recently to a friend who had called her attention to certain newspaper strictures on the attire of ladies attending the White House receptions. In the course of her letter, Miss Cleveland said: "I should hardly feel true interest or true respect for a person whom I believed to be . . . using the brief prominence of my position to encourage habits in dress and manners which are subversive of 'whatsoever things are pure, lovely, honest, and of good report.' Such I believe the immodest dress of some few society women to be, and against such immodesty I have made that silent protest which it is every woman's right and duty to make, by having my own dress-waists cut in a style which, so far as modesty is concerned, I should be quite willing to have all women follow to whom this style of dress is becoming and comfortable. . . . It is wholly false, so far as I have observed, that a 'shocking scarcity of waists and sleeves marks the gowns of society women.' This is sadly and painfully true of a few 'society women,' and it is indeed shocking, nauseating, revolting, and deserving of the utmost denunciation on the score of morality, beauty, health, and many other considerations which good men and women should conspire to preserve and exact. There is need of a very few words on this subject and no argument. Any American woman can wear the waist of her evening dress up to the lobes of her ears if she likes. There is no queen to command her appearance in low corsetage. She can also, alas! so contrive her dress that, by the exposure of her person, all true social ethics, and aesthetics as well, are revolted. Between the two there is an appropriate, beautiful, and modest mean, which all can follow if they will."

Mr. Gladstone's Scheme for the Pacification of Ireland is to be explained to the House of Commons on April 5th. The political atmosphere was thick with rumors of the character of the scheme last week. One of these rumors, which startled the public, was that Mr. Gladstone intended asking for $750,000,000 to purchase the estates of Irish landlords who might be willing to sell them. Immediately following this announcement came the report that Mr. Chamberlain would resign and oppose the measure in the interests of British taxpayers. That Mr. Gladstone will propose to advance so large a sum of money is by no means certain. There are indications that the astute Premier has allowed the idea to be circulated, in order to find out how it will be received, and will be guided by events. The amount is enormous in the present depressed state of trade, but if it proved to be a species of investment or mortgage, it would not embarrass the treasury. The Parnellites alone appear to be enthusiastic in their support of Mr. Gladstone. The resignation of several members of the Cabinet is talked of, and several prominent supporters of the Premier are said to be implacably opposed to such details of his scheme as have been imparted to them. It is evident that the greatest crisis of this half century in English affairs is impending. If the Premier's scheme will satisfy Ireland, it will eventually pass, though at a heavy cost to England which will be the penalty of long years of misrule.

Socialist Riots are Reported from Belgium. On March 19th a meeting of unemployed Socialists in Liège, the iron manufacturing centre of Belgium, resulted in disorderly demonstration. A mob composed of Socialists and the poorest classes of the people took possession of many of the streets, shouting: "Down with the Capitalists!" and attacked the shops. They wrecked all the cafés and sacked all the shops in the Rue Leopold. The gendarmes finally attacked the mob, and after a severe fight, in which many of the rioters were wounded, succeeded in clearing the streets and restoring order. Several hundred Socialists have been placed under arrest.

Prince Bismarck's Scheme for the Denationalization of Prussian Poland is being earnestly debated throughout Germany. Some support has been won for it in unexpected quarters by the prospect it holds out of checking the tide of emigration to America. If the estates of the Polish landlords are acquired by the State and divided up into small farms, they may be used as a bonus to young German farmers who are to stay in Germany instead of coming here. Bismarck is determined to destroy as far as he can all Polish national feeling. Another of his schemes now introduced provides for the organization of evening schools to teach German to apprentices, attendance being compulsory.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, have been received since our last acknowledgment to the amount of $4.50. From Aylmer, Quebec, Can., $3; New Durham, N. J., $1; Denbigh, Ontario, Can., 50 cents.

Mr. William Noble, the Gospel Temperance evangelist, arrived in San Francisco on March 8th. He was announced to hold special temperance evangelistic meetings in the hall of the Young Men's Christian Association, on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Friday evenings, March 8th, 9th, 10th, and 12th. He expected to sail for Australia, by the ship Mariposa, Saturday, March 13th, stopping at Honolulu, where he will spend a few weeks with the association of that city prior to visiting the Australian Colonies.

Help for the Cape Palmas Diocese is Being received by the Board of Missions of the Protestant Episcopal Church. As was stated in our sketch of the Rt. Rev. Samuel D. Ferguson, D.D., bishop of the diocese, last week, there is urgent need for funds. The entire amount appropriated to the three districts under the bishop's jurisdiction at the time of his visit, was $24,608, and of this $3658 was needed for repairs and new buildings. Since then $2000 has been forwarded to the board by Bishop and Mrs. Bedell, of Ohio. Other contributions are expected and will be welcomed.

Lord's Day Observance in England Has Received a blow by a vote in Parliament. On Friday a resolution was passed in the House of Lords by a majority of fourteen, declaring that, "The time has come when, in the interest of religion and education, all national collections should be opened to the public on Sunday as on other days." The vote is a curious indication of the scale of intelligence of British peers. Plausible reasons may be advanced for opening the museums on Sunday, but when the lords aver that they think the step would promote "the interests of religion," we can but wonder whether they are ignorant or hypocritical. One member of the House remarked: "The English Sunday is misspent. It is worse than misspent. It leads people into temptation. This is not a question of the workingman only, for there are plenty of other people who are entitled to consideration. It is idle and selfish for workingmen to object to being employed on Sunday at places of recreation." If the noble lord had to work seven days a week he would probably be of a different opinion.

The Twenty Missionaries Going to Africa to reinforce Bishop Taylor's band sailed from New York on Saturday last by the City of Chester. The missionaries carry with them a small cargo of dry goods, canned food, farming implements, Bibles, tracts, hymn-books, rifles, and shotguns. It will take them nearly three months to reach the Congo. On their arrival they will be met by Bishop Taylor, who will direct them as to their ultimate destination. This, it is expected, will be about five hundred miles into the interior of Africa. They will sail up the Congo as far as navigation will permit, and then go the remainder of the way with teams or on foot. Miss Britain is from a ladies' seminary, and another lady, Mrs. Cliff, was a missionary among the Indians. A colored man in the party named Judson was graduated several months ago from a university. The others are mechanics, farmers, a surveyor, and a school teacher. The Rev. Mr. Shoreland, Dr. and Mrs. Clark Smith and four children, and Surveyor Burr are from Oregon. The Rev. and Mrs. J. H. Cooper are from Wisconsin, Dr. Harrison and Missionaries Cameron, Walker, Steele, and Mr. and Mrs. Elkin are from Ohio. Mr. Baker is from Brooklyn, and Mr. Sarter from Missouri. They will be divided into parties of two or three among the natives, at a distance of one hundred miles from each other, so as to establish a chain of stations across the continent of Africa. Each of these stations will be visited at intervals by the ministers and physicians, and the farmers and mechanics will go to work teaching the natives how to cultivate the land in a civilized manner, how to read and write, and the principles of the Christian religion.

Seven Girls, the Daughters of Farmers in Pennsylvania, have been enticed from their homes and brought to disreputable houses in New York to lead immoral lives. A dispatch from Reading, Penn., states that on March 14th a respectable farmer near that city appeared before an alderman there and made a complaint of the outrage on behalf of himself and his neighbors. Happily four of the girls have been rescued and returned to their friends. The other three were too much ashamed to return, and remained in the clutches of the men who entrapped them. Those who have returned tell a pitiable story of their trouble and of the lures by which they were led to leave their homes. We commend this fact to the notice of some anonymous correspondents of our own, who have kindly taken the trouble to advise us how to edit the paper. They profess to fear that the facts we published about the Pall Mall Gazette disclosures and kindred matters will "contaminate" the minds of young people. It is better, they think, that girls should not be warned about the dangers that surround them. Wicked men think so, too. They find easy victims in girls who know nothing of these matters. We are of a different opinion, and it is probable that the fathers of those seven girls agree with us. Perhaps our correspondents are not aware that in New York there are houses of ill fame the proprietors of which pay five dollars or more to any man or woman who will bring a country girl there and make her an inmate of the house. Distasteful as the task is, plain words must be used to put innocent girls on their guard. There are times when silence is cruel (Prov. 1 : 17).

A Prisoner Suffering from Good Character is in an uncommon predicament, bad character being usually the complaint that troubles them. A convicted thief, however, in Philadelphia, last week, would have had a lighter sentence if she had borne a worse character. A pretty, well-dressed young woman brought before Judge Biddle, pleaded guilty to seven indictments, charging her with stealing goods. Her counsel pleaded for mercy on the ground that, apart from these thefts she bore an excellent character, was well-educated, was not in need of money, and was exemplary in her private life. The judge refused to entertain the plea, as such a woman as the counsel represented the prisoner to be, knew well what she was doing and was not entitled to so much sympathy as a depraved person educated in criminal society. He passed upon her the severe sentence of five years' imprisonment. Unconverted people who are leading good moral lives and even helping in Christian work, by their contributions, should consider Judge Biddle's remarks. Moral character will not help them in the last judgment (Luke 13 : 26, 27).

A Drunken Man at a Revival Service Caused some ill-timed laughter recently by a claim of comradeship founded on a mistake incident to his drowsy condition. A Brooklyn clergyman states that a man who represented a commercial house in New York City was travelling in the western part of the State, when he happened to be in a city in which an evangelist was holding special services. The drummer while under the influence of liquor strolled into the service, and sitting down in the front seat was soon fast asleep. He slept on until the evangelist, in the authoritative style much in favor among a certain type of his profession, ordered all who wanted to go to heaven to rise. Every one but the sleepy drummer stood up and sat down again. The movement disturbed him, and he recovered a half consciousness in time to hear another invitation to rise. "Now," said the evangelist, "I want all of you who mean to go to hell to stand up." The drummer did not catch the first part of the sentence, but the words "stand up" he did understand, and leaning forward unsteadily he rose from his seat in a dazed kind of way. The young people laughed outright, while the older ones looked at him in horror. Steadying himself against the rail he looked at the evangelist an instant, and then said: "Well, parson, I don't know just exactly what we're voting on, but you and I seem to be in a hopeless minority." Unhappily, the minority is the other way. It would not be so if vague wishes which do not affect the life were sufficient to secure a place (Matt. 7 : 13, 14).

The Purchase of His Freedom has Been Completed by a colored man formerly a slave at Norfolk, Va. Previous to the war the man, whose name is John Billups, agreed to purchase his freedom at the cost of $1300, the price at which he was valued by his owner. At the time the Emancipation Proclamation was issued he had managed, by hard work and economy, to pay $800 on account. President Lincoln's proclamation might have been expected to close the transaction, but that was not the view of Billups. He continued to work and save, and, dollar by dollar, has accumulated and paid over the $500 to complete payment. The Norfolk Ledger reports the final settlement, and compliments both parties on the qualities of character it indicates. The negro is clearly a man of honesty and sturdy independence, and his late owner must have treated him kindly or the money would not have been paid after it became a voluntary act. Spiritual emancipation can never be so gained, although the attempt is often made. It must be accepted as a free gift, already purchased, and it cannot be won by repentance, reformation of character, money offerings, nor merit of any kind (Eph. 2 : 8, 9).

The Serious Results of a Trifling Injury are described in a Sacramento journal. One of the officials of the State government was in the habit of putting his knee upon the edge of a table in his office in order to reach the gas-burner, but after doing so a number of times he found that the sharp edge of the table was hurting his leg, and afterward he stood upon a chair when lighting up. Recently the leg began to trouble him, growing worse daily. He was at a loss to account for the fact, not remembering that he had received any hurt, until one day the circumstance of the gas-lighting occurred to him, and consultation with a physician resulted in an expression of opinion that the bone had probably been injured. The trouble has now become serious, the pain preventing him getting about. An operation by a surgeon will be necessary to find out the extent of the injury, and an amputation will probably be ordered. Aged men have often related an analogous spiritual experience. The reading of a bad book, the possession of a lewd picture, the formation of a friendship have seemed trivial matters at the time, but after years have passed the injury has been found irreparable (1 Cor. 10 : 31).

Restitution After Twenty Years Has Been made by a man whose letter to the Postmaster-General was acknowledged last week. The letter was post-marked Cheyenne City, Wyoming, and had an inclosure of $145. The writer states that in 1866 he succeeded in stealing a letter in the post-office, Peru, Neb., which contained $40, and was addressed to some one in Nebraska City. A little later, while seated in an express car of the Union Pacific Railroad, during the temporary absence of the messenger a man entered and handed him a package containing $125 for transmission. Of that he stole $100 and sent the balance forward. No suspicion attached to him in either case, but he now desires to make restitution, and sent the money, with $5 added, to Mr. Vilas, hoping that the rightful owners might be discovered. Though twenty years have elapsed and the clues were slight, the post-office has been able to trace its share, and the $40 has been paid. The ownership of the $100 has not yet been proved. The writer of the letter signs himself "A Christian." He does not say how long he has so written himself, but it may be assumed that it is a less time than twenty years. He thus gives practical proof of the sincerity of his profession (Ezek. 33 : 15).

THE BLOOD OF SPRINKLING.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And to Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel. See that ye refuse not Him that speaketh. For if they escaped not who refused Him that spake on earth, much more shall not we escape, if we turn away from Him that speaketh from heaven."—HEBREWS 12: 24, 25.

The Sinaitic Covenant—Christians not under it—What they have Come to—What the Blood of Sprinkling is—What it Signified—Preservation—Ratification—Purification—Sanctification—Access—I. A Central Manifestation—II. Identical with Jesus—III. The Voice of the New Dispensation—IV. Always Speaking—Better Things than the Blood of Abel—To be Preached and Sung.

We are joyfully reminded by the apostle that we are not come to Mount Sinai and its overwhelming manifestations. After Israel had kept the feast of the Passover, God was pleased to give His people a sort of Pentecost, and more fully to manifest Himself and His law to them at Sinai. They were in the wilderness, with the solemn peaks of a desolate mountain as their centre; and from the top thereof, in the midst of fire, and blackness, and darkness, and tempest, and with the sound of a trumpet, God spake with them. "The earth shook, the heavens also dropped at the presence of God: even Sinai itself was moved at the presence of God, the God of Israel."

A BETTER COVENANT.

We are not come to the dread and terror of the old covenant, of which our apostle saith in another place, "The covenant from the Mount Sinai gendereth unto bondage" (Gal. 4: 24). Upon the believer's spirit there rests not the slavish fear, the abject terror, the fainting alarm, which swayed the tribes of Israel; for the manifestation of God which He beholds, though not less majestic, is far more full of hope and joy.

Our apostle next tells us what we are come to. I suppose He speaks of all the saints after the death and resurrection of our Lord and the descent of the Holy Ghost. He refers to the whole church, in the midst of which the Holy Spirit now dwells. We are come to a more joyous sight than Sinai, and the mountain burning with fire. The believer in the Lord Jesus Christ lives in quite another atmosphere. He has not come to a barren crag, but to an inhabited city, Jerusalem above, the metropolis of God. Moreover, he has come "to God the Judge of all," the umpire and rewarder of all the chosen citizens who are enrolled by His command, the ruler and judge of all their enemies. God is not to them a dreadful person who speaks from a distance; but He is their Father and their Friend, in whom they delight themselves, in whose presence there is fulness of joy for them. Brethren, our fellowship is with the Father, our God. We have also come to Jesus, our Saviour, who is all and in all. In Him we live; we are joined unto Him in one spirit; He is the Bridegroom of our souls, the delight of our hearts. We are come to Him as the Mediator of the new covenant.

ITS SIGN.

Then comes the last thing of all, mentioned last, as I shall have to show you, for a purpose. We have come "to the blood of sprinkling." On that first day at Sinai no blood of sprinkling was presented; but afterward it was used by divine order to ratify the national covenant which the tribes made with Jehovah at the foot of the hill. Of that covenant the Lord says, "which My covenant they brake, although I was an husband unto them." He never brake His covenant, but they brake it; for they failed to keep that condition of obedience without which a covenant founded upon works falls to the ground. We have come to the blood of sprinkling which has fallen upon a covenant which never shall be broken; for the Lord hath made it to endure though rocks and hills remove.

I shall need this morning to occupy all the time with what I regard as only the first head of my discourse.* What is it? "The blood of sprinkling." It will be our duty afterward to consider where we are—"we are come unto this blood;" and, thirdly, to remember what then? "See that ye refuse not Him that speaketh."

First,

WHAT IS IT?

What is this "blood of sprinkling?" In a few words, "the blood of sprinkling" represents the pains, the sufferings, the humiliation, and the death of the Lord Jesus Christ, which He endured on the behalf of guilty man. Remember that His sufferings and death were not apparent only, but true and real; and that they involved an incalculable degree of pain and anguish. To redeem our souls cost our Lord an exceeding sorrowfulness "even unto death;" it cost Him the bloody sweat, the heart broken with reproach, and specially the agony of being forsaken of His Father, till He cried: "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" Our Mediator endured death under the worst possible aspects, bereft of those supports which are in all other cases of godly men afforded by the goodness and faithfulness of God. His was not merely a natural death, but a death aggravated by supernatural circumstance, which infinitely intensified its woe. This is what we mean by the blood of Christ, His sufferings, and His death.

WHAT IT SIGNIFIED.

But the text does not merely speak of the blood shed, which I have explained to you, but of "the blood of sprinkling." This is the atonement applied for divine purposes, and specially applied to our own hearts and consciences by faith. For the explanation of this sprinkling we must look to the types of the Old Testament. In the Old Testament the blood of sprinkling meant a great many things; in fact, I cannot just now tell you all that it signified. We meet with it in the Book of Exodus, at the time when the Lord smote all the first-born of Egypt. Then the blood of sprinkling meant preservation. The basin filled with blood was taken, and a bunch of hyssop was dipped into it, and the lintel and the two side-posts of every house tenanted by Israelites were smeared with the blood; and when God saw the blood upon the house of the Israelite, He bade the destroyer pass that family by, and leave their first-born unharmed. The sprinkled blood meant preservation: it was Israel's passover and safeguard.

The sprinkled blood very frequently signified the confirmation of a covenant. So it is used in Exodus 24, which I read to you just now. The blood was sprinkled upon the book of the covenant, and also upon the people, to show that the covenant was, as far as it could be, confirmed by the people who promised, "All that the Lord hath said will we do." The blood of bulls and of goats in that case was but a type of the sacrificial blood of the Lord Jesus Christ.

PURIFICATION.

In many cases the sprinkling of the blood meant purification. If a person had been defiled, he could not come into the sanctuary of God without being sprinkled with blood. There were the ashes of a red heifer laid up, and these were mixed with blood and water, and by their being sprinkled on the unclean, his ceremonial defilement was removed. There were matters incident to domestic life, and accidents of outdoor life, which engendered impurity, and this impurity was put away by the sprinkling of blood. In a higher sense this is the work of the blood of Christ. It preserves us, it ratifies the covenant, and wherever it is applied it makes us pure; for "the blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin."

The sprinkling of the blood meant, also, sanctification. Before a man entered upon the priesthood the blood was put upon his right ear, and on the great toe of his right foot, and on the thumb of his right hand, signifying that all his powers were thus consecrated to God. The ordination ceremony included the sprinkling of blood upon the altar round about. Even thus hath the Lord Jesus redeemed us unto God by His death, and the sprinkling of His blood hath made us kings and priests unto God forever. He is made of God unto us sanctification, and all else that is needed for the divine service.

* [The other heads were dealt with in a sermon preached at night of the same day, and this we hope to publish next week.—Ed.]

ACCESS.

One other signification of the blood of the sacrifice was acceptation and access. When the high priest went into the most holy place once a year, it was not without blood, which he sprinkled upon the ark of the covenant, and upon the mercy-seat, which was on the top thereof. All approaches to God were made by blood. There was no hope of a man drawing near to God, even in symbol, apart from the sprinkling of the blood. And now to-day our only way to God is by the precious sacrifice of Christ; the only hope for the success of our prayers, the acceptance of our praises, or the reception of our holy works, is through the ever-abiding merit of the atoning sacrifice of our Lord Jesus Christ. The Holy Ghost bids us enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus; there is no other way.

There were other uses beside these, but it may suffice to put down the sprinkling of the blood as having these effects—namely, that of preservation, satisfaction, purification, sanctification, and access to God. This was all typified in the blood of bulls and of goats, but actually fulfilled in the great sacrifice of Christ. With this as an explanation, I desire to come still closer to the text, and view it with great care; for to my mind it is singularly full of teaching.

THE CENTRAL TRUTH.

I. The blood of sprinkling is the centre of the divine manifestation under the Gospel. Observe its innermost place in the passage before us.* You are privileged by almighty grace to come first to Mount Zion, to climb its steep, to stand upon its holy summit, and to enter the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem. In those golden streets, surrounding the hallowed shrine, you behold an innumerable company of angels. What a vision of glory! But you must not rest here; for the great general assembly, the festal gathering, the solemn convocation of the enrolled in heaven, is being held, and all are there in glad attire, surrounding their God and Lord. Press onward to the throne itself, where sits the Judge of all, surrounded by those holy spirits who have washed their robes, and, therefore, stand before the throne of God in perfection.

Have you not come a long way? Are you not admitted into the very centre of the whole revelation? Not yet. A step further lands you where stands your Saviour, the Mediator, with the new covenant. Now is but you have a further object to behold. What is in that innermost shrine? What is that which is hidden away in the holy of holies? What is that which is the most precious and costly thing of all, the last, the ultimatum, God's grandest revelation? The precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot—the blood of sprinkling. This comes last; it is the innermost truth of the dispensation of grace under which we live.

The atonement of Jesus is the concentration of the divine glory; all other revelations of God are completed and intensified here. You have not come to the central sun of the great spiritual system of grace till you have come to the blood of sprinkling—to those sufferings of Messiah which are not for Himself, but are intended to bear upon others, even as drops when they are sprinkled exert their influence where they fall. Unless you have learned to rejoice in that blood which taketh away sin, you have not yet caught the key-note of the Gospel dispensation. The blood of Christ is the life of the Gospel. Apart from atonement you may know the skin, the rind, the husk of the Gospel; but its inner kernel you have not discovered.

* For this line of thought I am much indebted to a chapter in an admirable book, entitled "Every-day Life," by C. H. Waller.

THE GRAMMAR.

II. I next ask you to look at the text and observe that this sprinkling of the blood, as mentioned by the Holy Ghost in this passage, is absolutely identical with Jesus Himself. Read it. "To Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel. See that ye refuse not Him that speaketh." He saith it is the blood that speaketh; and then He proceeds to say: "See that ye refuse not Him that speaketh." This is a very unexpected turn, which can only be explained upon the supposition that Jesus and the blood are identical in the writer's view. By what we may call a singularity in grammar, in putting Him for it, the Spirit of God intentionally sets forth the striking truth, that the sacrifice is identical with the Saviour. "We are come to the Saviour, the Mediator of the new covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling that speaketh; see that ye refuse not Him."

Beloved friends, there is no Jesus if there is no blood of sprinkling; there is no Saviour if there is no sacrifice. I put this strongly, because the attempt is being made nowadays to set forth Jesus apart from His cross and atonement. He is held up as a great ethical teacher, a self-sacrificing spirit, who is to lead the way in a grand moral reformation, and by His influence to set up a kingdom of moral influence in the world. It is even hinted that this kingdom has never had prominence enough given to it because it has been overshadowed by His cross. But where is Jesus apart from His sacrifice? He is not there if you have left out the blood of sprinkling, which is the blood of sacrifice.

THE VOICE OF THE BLOOD.

III. Observe that this "blood of sprinkling" is put in close contact with "the new covenant"; it is the voice of the new dispensation. Observe that on Sinai there was "the sound of a trumpet, and the voice of words; which voice they that heard entreated that the word should not be spoken to them any more." You look, therefore, under the new dispensation, for a voice, and you do not come to any till you reach the last object in the list, and there see "the blood of sprinkling that speaketh."

The blood of sprinkling has a voice of instruction to us even as it has a voice of intercession with God. It cries to us, "See the evil of sin! See how God loveth righteousness! See how He loveth men! See how impossible it is for you to escape from the punishment of sin except by this great sacrifice in which the love and the justice of God equally appear! See how Jehovah spared not His own Son, but freely delivered Him up for us all."

If ever there should come a wretched day when all our pulpits shall be full of modern thought, and the old doctrine of a substitutionary sacrifice shall be exploded, then will there remain no word of comfort for the guilty or hope for the despairing. Hushed will be forever those silver notes which now console the living, and cheer the dying; a dumb spirit will possess this sullen world, and no voice of joy will break the blank silence of despair. The Gospel speaks through the propitiation for sin, and if that be denied, it speaketh no more. Those who preach not the atonement exhibit a dumb and dummy gospel; a mouth it hath, but speaketh not; they that make it are like unto their idol.

ALWAYS SPEAKING.

IV. Further, my brethren, from the text I learn another truth—namely, that this blood is always speaking. The text saith not "the blood of sprinkling that spoke," but "that speaketh." It is always speaking, it always remaineth a plea with God and a testimony to men. It never will be silenced, either one way or the other. The voice of this blood speaks wherever there is a guilty conscience, wherever there is an anxious heart, wherever there is a seeking sinner, wherever there is a believing mind. It speaketh with sweet, familiar, tender, inviting voice. There is no music like it to the sinner's ear: it charms away his fears. It shall never cease its speaking so long as there is a sinner yet out of Christ; nay, so long as there is one on earth who still needs its cleansing power because of fresh backslidings. Oh, hear ye its voice! Incline your ear and receive its blessed accents: it says, "Come now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord; though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool."

ABEL'S BLOOD.

This part of my discourse will not be complete unless I bid you notice that we are expressly told that this precious blood speaks "better things than that of Abel." I do not think that the whole meaning of the passage is exhausted if we say that Abel's blood cries for vengeance, and that Christ's blood speaks for pardon. Dr. Watts puts it:

"Blood has a voice to pierce the skies:
'Revenge!' the blood of Abel cries;
But the dear stream when Christ was slain Speaks peace as loud from ev'ry vein."

That is quite true; but I conceive that it is not all the sense, and perhaps not even the sense here intended. Revenge is scarcely a good thing; yet Abel's blood spake good things, or we should hardly read that Christ's blood speaks "better things." What does the blood of Abel speak? The blood of Abel speaks to a complete and believing obedience to God. It shows us a man who believes God, and, notwithstanding the enmity of his brother, brings to God the appointed sacrifice of faith, strictly following up, even to the bitter end, his holy obedience to the Most High. That is what the blood of Abel says to me; and the blood of Jesus says the same thing most emphatically.

Our Lord's blood saith "better things than that of Abel;" and what doth it say? It saith, "There is redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins according to the riches of His grace." "He His own self bare our sins in His own body on the tree, that we being dead to sins should live unto righteousness: by whose stripes we were healed." "He hath made Him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him." The voice of the blood is this, "For I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more." "The blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin." Now, my brethren, these are better things than Abel's blood could say, and they are what the blood of Jesus speaks to every one upon whom it is sprinkled by faith. It must be applied to each one of us by faith, or it says nothing to us.

ITS USE.

The apostle says that "Ye are come to the blood of sprinkling." Is it so? Has that blood of sprinkling ever been applied to you? Do you feel it? Are you preserved? Are you cleansed? Are you brought nigh to God? Are you sanctified unto God's service by the atoning sacrifice? If so, then go you out, and in firm confidence that never can be shaken, make your glory in the blood of sprinkling. Tell every sinner whom you meet that if the Lord Jesus wash him he shall be whiter than snow. Preach the atoning sacrifice of the Lamb of God, and then sing of it.

Recollect that wondrous threefold song in the fifth chapter of the Revelation, where, first of all, the elders and living creatures round about the throne, sing a new song, saying: "Thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by Thy blood out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation." Then ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands of angels take up the strain, and cry: "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain." Nor is this all; for the apostle tells us, "Every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever." See you not that they all extol the Lord Jesus in His sacrificial character as, the Lamb slain?

Those who refuse the atonement which wisdom devised, which love provided, and which justice has accepted, have signed their own death-warrant, and none can wonder that they perish. The Lord lead us to glory in Christ crucified. Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

EVENTFUL NIGHTS

in Bible History, by Alfred Lee, Bishop of the Protestant-Episcopal Church, in Delaware. It is a remarkable fact that though the Bible has been studied and expounded for centuries no intelligent expositor, even at this late day, touches it without bringing out of it some new beauties not noticed before. The fulness of God's Word seems inexhaustible, and the fact is a conclusive answer to those who would represent it as the work of men. Bishop Lee introduces us in this volume to a novelty of grouping singularly interesting and beautifully consistent. Probably few people have noticed how many eventful nights are mentioned in the Bible record. Dr. Lee's list will surprise them. They are, from the Old Testament: The Promise to Abraham, Jacob's Vision at Bethel, Jacob at Peniel, The Vision of Eliphaz, The Night of the Exodus, The Passage through the Red Sea, The Overthrow of Midian, Samuel in the Tabernacle, Saul at Endor, The Vigil of the Royal Penitent, Solomon's Choice, Destruction of Sennacherib's Host, Belshazzar's Feast, Daniel in the Lion's Den, The King's Sleepless Night. From the New Testament: Gloria in Excelsis, The Flight into Egypt, The Visit of Nicodemus, The Stilling of the Tempest, Martyrdom of John the Baptist, Jesus Walking on the Sea, The Transfiguration, The Midnight Cry, The Night of the Betrayal, Easter Eve, Paul's Escape from Damascus, Peter's Deliverance, The Prison at Philippi, Paul at Troas, Antonia and Antipatris, The Angel Visit in the Storm, No Night There.

To each of these Dr. Lee devotes several pages of earnest, spiritual teaching, setting forth in brief but clear manner the lessons each is fitted to teach. Perhaps the most beautiful as well as useful is the chapter on the Midnight Cry. Bishop Lee rightly perceives that the duty of watchfulness and purity is the paramount need of the Church of this day, and he entertains no visionary hope of the world being evangelized and becoming purer before the Lord's coming. He says: "The Bridegroom, though He seem to tarry, will surely come. . . . It will be when the world is most supine and careless; when the spirit of slumber most pervades the Church; when the silence is profound and even the watcher's eye grows heavy. It will be then that the cry will resound: 'Behold the Bridegroom!'" It is not often that faithful words so earnest, so clear in the perception of the falsity of the optimistic views, now so prevalent, are uttered by a dignitary of the Church. But throughout his book the Bishop shows the same spirit of practical, earnest piety, faithfully doing his duty of a watchman who has oversight, and sees the dangers that threaten individual Christian life and the life of the Church. We earnestly hope that God will bless its circulation to the awakening of His people. Pp. 423; price, $1.50. Published by Harper & Brothers.

THE WONDERS OF OPTICS,

by F. Marion, is another volume of the excellent Wonders of Science Series. The author deals first with "The Phenomena of Vision," and then with "The Laws of Light." Like the earlier volumes of this series, this is written for unscientific persons, and is intended to explain the wonders of the eye, which, as our readers know, are among the best evidences we have in nature of the infinite wisdom of the Creator. There are thousands of people—even some who are considered well educated—who have no conception of the marvellous beauty of the eye and of the wonderful adaptations by which we are enabled to see. To such people the lucid explanation given in this work will be very welcome. The numerous illustrations render the text comprehensible to the most unlearned reader. Pp. 276; price, $1. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons.

A MISSION SCHOOL IN INDIA.

THE distribution of prizes to the girls of the Free Church Girls' School in Calcutta took place on January 30th, in the compound of the Mission House. The Indian Witness thus comments upon the proceedings, and reports:

The schools for Hindu and other non-Christian girls, and those for native Christian girls, were treated separately. There are four of the former, with more than three hundred girls on the rolls. A good deal is made of the fact that the girls' parents freely allow them to walk up one lane and down another on the way to school. That is not as good as letting them walk along the public street, as they will do in a few years more, but it is much better than insisting upon a closed carriage for their conveyance, as was done ten years ago.

As another instance of advancement, it is noted that even the "Thakurbari" of a Hindu house, the sacred room which faces the outer court, and in which the family idol is set up on the occasion of religious festivals, has been offered rent-free for a mission school-room. Although the girls continue to be withdrawn while they are still children, in order to be married, yet there is an increasing desire, with both the parents and the children, to follow up the school teaching at home. So the schools become every year preparatory to Zanana work.

After all this to cheer, the conclusion of the report is almost pitiful: "Not to speak of India, with its one hundred and twenty million of females, let it be remembered that here, in the town of Calcutta, there are not yet two per cent of Hindu females under instruction, and of Muhammadan females not one per cent. There are only about four per cent of the former and about one per cent of the latter able to read and write."

TRAFALGAR SQUARE.

THE labor demonstration in London on February 8th, out of which developed the riots described in our issue of March 11th, assembled in Trafalgar Square, the large open space in the heart of London, two sides of which are depicted in our illustration. The pedestal in the centre of the picture is the spot from which the Socialist orators harangued the crowd. From it rises the imposing column on the top of which is the statue of Lord Nelson, the hero of Trafalgar. The four bronze lions at its base are the masterpieces of Sir Edwin Landseer.

The building with the dome, on the left of the picture, is the National Gallery, an unsightly edifice on the outside, but well adapted in its interior arrangements for its purpose. In it are exhibited the works of art belonging to the Government. The collection was commenced in 1824 when $300,000 was expended in the purchase of the pictures belonging to a private collector. Additions have been made from time to time since then, by purchase and by gift and bequest, until now there are about twelve hundred pictures in the gallery. The building was opened to the public in 1838.

The church on the right is St. Martin-in-the-Fields, a title singularly inappropriate now, however it may have been when the building was erected. The other two sides of the square not shown in the picture are occupied by the Royal College of Physicians, and by hotels and club-houses.

"ONE OF US."

THE late Mr. John B. Gough was on one occasion during his campaign in England addressing a temperance meeting in Newcastle. At the close of the meeting a large number came forward to sign the pledge. Among them were a man and woman whose miserable appearance indicated that they were victims of the rum traffic. The man's hands twitched nervously, and the woman, clearly much younger than her husband, was clad in garments so tattered and torn that she exposed almost as much of her shoulders as a fashionable lady at the opera. A rope tied around her waist held her rags in place. She was fierce-looking, dirty, and unwomanly in appearance. While they were scrawling their names in illegible characters, the secretary and other gentlemen were busy making out certificates for those who wished to join the society. These certificates were very attractive, fit for framing, being printed in colors; the price of them was sixpence each. The man looked dreamily at them, and Mr. Gough said to the gentlemen—

"Please do not say anything to this couple; I wish to see what they will do." After a few moments the poor fellow remarked to his wife—

"I would like to join and get a 'stiffkit.'"
 "There's sixpence to pay for them things, now you come 'long o' me," repeated the woman, pulling him away, "No, I won't," he answered, almost whining; "I won't go 'long o' you; I want a 'stiffkit.' The woman gave a fierce look, and the man was stupidly dogged, and it seemed as though a quarrel were commencing, when a gentleman stepped up and said—"Well, good people, I hope you will sign the pledge." He spoke very kindly, and the man looked up and said quickly, "We have signed the pledge, me and my missus—she's my missus—and we want to get a 'stiffkit to join the society." "Well, why do you not?" "There's sixpence to pay for each of 'em." "That need make no difference," said the gentleman, cheerily. "Here, Mr. Secretary, make these good people out two certificates, and here is the money."

The man and the wife were very differently affected by this act of kindness. The former stood erect, with a more manly air, but the woman put on almost a savage look, as if resenting the first approach to kindness. The secretary asked their names, as they could not be made out on the pledge. The husband gave his name, and with a pleased expression received the embossed card of membership. When it came to the woman's turn, she stood sulky; her eye grew cold and hard; she returned no answer. Again she was kindly asked to give her name. No reply; but her brows knit and grew dark as if a storm was brewing. She gave a nervous glance around her, but no reply whatever.

The mouth twitched nervously, and her fingers were twisted together. Suddenly she lifted her arm, as if to strike a blow; but no! it was to dash away a tear! Then another—and another—but they would come; so, covering her face with her hands, she let them come. The tears ran over her hands; she could not, nor did she try to, keep them back. The eyes of those who stood near were dim, but not a word was spoken. At last she hastily let fall her arms, and stood with bowed head. The word of kindness had recalled the womanly nature in her. She gave her name, the certificate was handed to her, and the two poor creatures looked bewildered, and almost lovingly at each other—the man at his wife and she at him.

The gentleman who had paid the shilling laid his hand on the man's shoulder, and said: "Remember, you are one of us. You have signed the temperance pledge, you belong to the society, and you must always remember you are one of us." "Did ye hear that, old woman?" cried out the man. "Did ye hear that? He says we're 'one of us.' Come away wi' me—'one of us'—the gentleman—'one of us.' And they went out.

Three years and more had passed from the time when the above scene occurred, when at the close of an address in a town at some distance, a person told Mr. Gough that a man wished to see him. "Who is it?" he asked. "He is a mechanic; he has been living here some time, and is an active member of our society. He says if I tell you it's 'one of us' you'll know." "Show him up."

A man, clean, tidy and healthy, entered, and shook hands with Mr. Gough. Mr. Gough told him how glad he was to meet him, and that he should not have known him; and then asked, "Have you seen the gentleman who said, 'You are one of us?'" "No, sir," replied the man, "you see I don't move in that class of people, and I left the town soon after and got work here; but I'll never forget him, if I never meet him till I meet him in heaven. I'll tell him how his good, kind words helped me when I needed help. Ah, Mr. Gough, you ought to see my wife; she's a changed woman now, and she remembers him, and when she teaches the children to say their prayers, she weaves in little bits beautiful, that God would bless him. She's a knowing woman. Well, good-by, Mr. Gough, good-by; wish ye a safe voyage home; and come back to us again. God bless ye!"

"Now you are one of us."

AT THE MISSION.

A SERIAL STORY.

A Contrast.

"I MUST not stay very long on deck," said Juliet, "for we are to have a rehearsal in the saloon for to-morrow's theatricals. But I suppose that you think theatricals wrong."

"I am very glad, dear Miss Erle, that you have yourself introduced the subject. I have been thinking all the morning how I could venture to speak to you of the play. I own that I am sorry that you are to take a part in the acting."

"Now, if any one but you—dearest, kindest creature in the world—said that, I should call it dreadfully Puritanical! There's not a bit of harm in a little amusement that makes us all happy and draws us together. I've a delicious song to sing."

"And at the end of that song you have to kneel down and sing a prayer to the Virgin."

"Oh! the tiniest bit of prayer; there is nothing in it," laughed Juliet.

"To me there would be something—there would be sin," said Maria, in a low tone of voice. The companions intuitively slackened their pace.

"You are so dreadfully particular," observed Juliet.

"Let me propose a simple test by an appeal to your own feelings," said Maria. As if by mutual consent both ladies stood still, and looked toward the wide ocean. "If you knew that we were to be shipwrecked—lost on this voyage—would you still care to prepare for theatricals, would you gaily sing 'Tis to-morrow?'"

"What a shocking idea," said Juliet, and she withdrew her arm from Maria's; "to think of speaking of death to any girl on her birthday!"

"I always think when one of my birthdays comes, it may be my last," said Maria. "I am sorry if what I said vexed you. We look upon death in a different light."

"Light! what a word to use!" cried Juliet. "I associate death with heavy palls and nodding black plumes, the dreadful mutes, and the dismal tolling! It's like a great black curtain hung before one, not to be passed, one hopes, for many and many a year. Who can tell what lies beyond it?"

"To me death seems like a door—black, if you will, but it is the blackness of carved ebony chased with silver. One knows that the other side is of gold, shining gold, studded with jewels; and beyond—oh, the unutterable glory! oh, the unspeakable joy!"

Maria spoke as from an irresistible impulse, with hands intuitively clasped, her large eyes filling with tears.

"That sounds beautiful," said Juliet, rather impressed by the emotion which she saw but could not understand. "But, oh, Miss Selden! just look down at that water—so awfully deep—the bottom may be thousands of feet below! Do you not shudder at the bare thought of sinking down—down—under these terrible waves?"

"No," said Maria, simply. "I remember reading of a lady to whom it was said after a storm, 'What if you had been drowned!' Her reply was this, 'I should but have fallen into my Father's hand, for it is written He holdeth the deep in the hollow of His hand.'"

"I could never feel like that," said Juliet. "But the fact is, that you and I seem to have different natures. I wonder if you ever were gay and thoughtless as I am?"

"Not so outwardly gay perhaps, for I was brought up by parents who lead a different kind of life. But I was—many years ago—sadly thoughtless about religion, which was all the worse in me, because I had heard so much of the Gospel."

"Then I suppose that there came some wonderful time of conversion (I think that's the word), such as one reads of sometimes in books," said Juliet, with a little curiosity to know her companion's antecedents. "Some one was struck dead by your side, or you had a dreadful illness, or you heard one of those exciting preachers who drive people into fits."

"No, there was nothing wonderful in the circumstances attending my change of views," said

Maria, who felt drawn into speaking of what had hitherto been a secret between herself and her God. "I was sitting one Sabbath evening in the twilight; it was too dark to go on with my book. I heard nothing but the nightingale's song far away. I repeated to myself a chant that I had been hearing in church. I had joined in it hundreds of times before, My spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour. I paused at the little word my, such a little, insignificant word; but it seemed to me, as I had never felt it before, the keynote of the whole sacred song. Could I appropriate to myself that little word my? Was Christ indeed my very own? Miss Erle, it was as if a gentle hand had been laid on my shoulder, and I turned and looked up, and saw a Face of unutterable love bent upon me, and I cried out in reverential joy, my Saviour! my Lord!" The eyes before moist, overflowed.

"And did that mere thought actually change the whole current of your views?" asked Juliet.

"Yes, I have ever since walked in the light of that happy, happy moment," said Maria, hastily dashing away the drops. "Oh! dear Juliet—Miss Erle—I feel as if I must tell you once—this once—on your birthday, what happiness there is in that religion whose very essence is love!"

"I believe—I see that you are really happier than I am," said Juliet slowly; "I know so little what it is to love. My parents died when I was little more than a baby; my half-sisters—well, we get on very well together generally, but I have never been needful to either. I have had foolish fancies, and fleeting friendships—but"—again Juliet made a pause so long that Maria had to finish the sentence.

"You are like a harp whose deeper, richer chords have not yet been sounded; there has been a light running over the upper strings, but the instrument has not been struck by a master's hand. The time may come when you will care no more for earth's passing songs of pleasure; the time may come when all your heart's music will be given to the Lord."

"Miss Selden," said Juliet, with a little vexation in her tone, "I wish that you would leave me to enjoy myself in my own way, and not try to mar my harmless pleasures by making me think them wrong. I like to have you as a friend, but—but I'm too old to have a governess. I am quite able to judge for myself, and intend to sing what songs I please. Ah! here comes Captain Fincham; I'm wanted for the rehearsal," she cried, as a gentleman wearing an embroidered smoking-cap, with mustache on lip, and gold-rimmed glass on eye, and a roll of music in his hand, came up the companion ladder.

"Why, Miss Erle, we are all waiting for you, disconsolate at the absence of our fair soprano," said Captain Fincham. "Carlisle has proposed a dress rehearsal; he's made such a capital bandit's hat with newspaper and bunches of borrowed ribbons. Could you manage to appear in costume?"

"Oh! I've everything ready!" cried Juliet, to whom it was a relief to escape to company more congenial; "in five minutes you'll see me reappear as a veritable Italian peasant. 'Tis to-morrow, 'tis to-morrow," she sang, as she descended the companion ladder, without looking toward Maria Selden, who was left almost the sole occupant of the deck, except the man at the wheel.

"I see that I have offended her, and yet I am thankful that I have spoken," thought Maria, as she slowly pursued her now solitary walk. "I fear that I have lost a friend by so doing, but words uttered in love and with prayer may, at a future time, recur to the mind of this bright young being. Juliet is too sweet, too winsome, to be left unwarned, to give herself up to the world. She seems made to love and be loved. Were she a Christian, what a bright gem she would be! I feel sorry at the thought of parting when we land, for our paths in life are scarcely likely to cross each other again. What a comfort it is that we can pray for those for whom we can do nothing else!"

Maria did not remain much longer on deck;
